

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. LAWYERS' REPORTS

ANNOTATED.

MICHIGAN SUPREME COURT.

Martin WALKOWSKI, Plff. in Err.,
v.
PENOKEE & GOGEBIC CONSOLIDATED MINES.

(.....Mich.....)

1. Negligence is not shown by the mere fact of employing a boy seventeen or eighteen years old to manage the brake controlling the passenger cage connecting with a mine.

2. Due care in employing a boy seventeen years old to manage the brake controlling the passenger cage connected with a mine is shown by the facts that the machinery is simple and easily managed and the employer makes due inquiry of the applicant's experience and ability, and receives satisfactory replies before employing him.

3. An employer is not chargeable with notice that one employed to manage the brake controlling the passenger cage connected with a mine has become incompetent.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Gogebie County to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by defendant's negligence. Affirmed.

Statement by Grant, Ch. J.:

The miners in defendant's employ were lowered into and raised out of the mine in iron cages about 12 feet square. These cages were attached to wire cables running over drums in the enginehouse, situated about 500 feet from the shaft, which was between 500 and 700 feet deep. The operation was as follows: If a cage is to be lowered, and its weight be insufficient to overcome the weight of the other cage, a gear (called a "friction gear") inside the drum is thrown into place, and the engine started, and, by hoisting up the lower cage, the upper one is lowered. If, however, the weight of the upper cage is sufficient to overcome that of the lower, so as to descend of its own volition, it is handled by a hand brake. This is a wheel set on a perpendicular screw, which tightens or loosens a band running around the drum. By loosening this band, the drum will revolve if the weight of the descending cage is sufficient. This band is controlled by a screw, and can be loosened or tightened at the will of the man controlling it. In 1892, and about seven months before the accident, defendant employed one William Ryan as brakeman, whose duty it was, by use of the brake, to lower the cage in one shaft. On October 18 of that year, the cage was descending in the usual manner, with Ryan managing the brake. He turned the screw in the wrong direction, releasing the pressure. As a result, the cage fell to the bottom, and plaintiff, as well as others, was seriously injured. Plaintiff brought suit to recover for his injuries, planting his right of action upon three grounds of negligence: (1) That Ryan was incompetent at the time of hiring, and that defendant did not use ordinary care in hiring him to ascertain his qualifications; (2) that Ryan was incompetent at the time of the accident, and that defendant had actual notice of such incompetency; (3) that defendant had not used reasonable care in ascertaining how Ryan was doing his work. At the conclusion of the evidence, the court directed a verdict for the defendant. The further essential facts will be stated in connection with the points raised.

Messrs. Button & Norris, for plaintiff in error:

An employer is bound to use such care in the selection of its employees as is commensurate with the duties and responsibilities of the position to be filled; ordinary care, but such as a careful prudent employer ought to exercise.

I. Introductory.

An act of an employer resulting in a personal injury to one of his servants may be either wilful and malicious or merely careless, but as cases involving acts of the former description do not offer any characteristic features specially distinguishing them from the cases in which the parties are strangers, there is no good reason why they should be referred to in the present disquisition. In the following note, therefore, the consequences of the employer's knowledge or ignorance will be discussed only in so far as they may bear upon his responsibility for negligent acts.

That knowledge is a constituent element of negligence under any of its aspects, will be sufficiently obvious to anyone who considers that a want of care can only be manifested in one of two ways, viz., either by a failure to make such inquiries as would have turned partial and merely constructive into complete and actual knowledge, or by a failure to act prudently with a full knowledge of the conditions. Any other theory would be inconsistent with that fundamental principle of jurisprudence which makes ignorance of facts a valid excuse for an injurious act, provided such ignorance is justifiable.

In the ordinary analyses of negligence, this aspect of the tort is somewhat obscured, for the reason that they lay the chief stress upon the standards by which its existence or non-existence is determined. In the two following well-known definitions, for instance, the element of knowledge is quite latent:

Negligence is the omission to do something which a reasonable man, guided by those considerations which ordinarily regulate the conduct of human affairs, would do, or doing something which a reasonable man would not do. Alderson, B., in Blyth v. Birmingham Waterworks Co. (1856) 11 Exch. 781, 25 L. J. Exch. N. S. 212, 2 Jur. N. S. 333.

Negligence is the failure to do what a reasonable and prudent man would ordinarily have done under the circumstances of the situation, or doing what such a person under the existing circumstances would not have done. The essence of the fault may be in omission or commission. The duty is dictated by the exigencies of the occasion. Swayne, J., in Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Jones (1877) 95 U. S. 439, 24 L. ed. 500.

In other definitions the presence of this element is more apparent, but is not very distinctly insisted upon.

Negligence, in its civil relations, is such an inadvertent imperfection, by a responsible human agent, in the discharge of a legal duty, as produces, in an ordinary and natural sequence, a damage to another. The inadvertency or want of due consideration of duty, is the injuria, on which, when naturally followed by the damnum, the suit is based. Whart. Neg. § 3.

Negligence is the want of such attention to the natural and probable consequences of the act or omission as a prudent man ordinarily bestows in acting in his own concerns. N. Y. Penal Code, § 10, subsec. 1.

In a third set of definitions the element of knowledge is put prominently forward, though it can scarcely be said that any of them indicate satisfactorily the true relation which it bears to that absence of care which constitutes the main element in the conception of negligence. The defect in such explanations as the following is that they fail to take account of the case in which negligence is predicated of acts done by one who is fully aware of all the circumstances with reference to which he is called upon to choose a course of action, and who also knows that there is a probability which, in some instances, approaches to a moral certainty, that the course of action which he does adopt will prove injurious to someone. Unless the familiar phrase "wilful negligence," is based upon a wholly false conception, no definition which fails to cover an act done by a person in this condition of enlightenment can be termed satisfactory.

Negligence is practically synonymous with heedlessness or carelessness, not taking notice of matters relevant to the business in hand of which notice might or ought to have been taken. II. Stephen, Hist. of the Criminal Law, p. 122.

An actor is negligent when he is ignorant of the consequences of his act, if his ignorance proceeds from thoughtlessness, recklessness, carelessness, want of due attention. Negligence is inadvertence to consequences to which a man might have adverted and to which he would have adverted had he been desirous to obey the law and perform the obligations which it imposes. Poste's Galus, p. 18.

Of the three gradations of misconduct towards others, fault or negligence (culpa) is an unlawful act in ignorance of the subject, the degree, the instrument, the consequences, when it was reasonable to expect the mischief; un-

Wabash R. Co. v. McDaniels, 107 U. S. 454, 27 L. ed. 605; Hilts v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 55 Mich. 437.

No one above Willie Ryan in authority ever paid any particular attention to him after the first day he worked, and the duty imposed by law upon the defendant was not fulfilled.

Hilts v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. 55 Mich. 445.

Mr. Charles E. Miller, for defendant in error:

The testimony as to what took place at the time of the hiring of William Ryan being undisputed, it was a question of law for the court to decide as to whether that testimony showed a state of facts which indicated negligence on the part of the defendant company.

Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Miller, 25 Mich. 274; Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 99; 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, lawful intention (dolus) is breach of law with knowledge of these elements, but without premeditation; malice or depravity is evinced by the resolution or deliberate intention of violating law. Aristotle's Eth. Nic. 3, 5, 8 (translated in Poste's Galus, p. 15).

It is clear that such explanations as these are peculiarly defective when considered with reference to the circumstances from which an employer's liability is predicated, for they cannot be made to comprehend the cases of actual or constructive knowledge of the existence. It would be doing violence to common sense to say that the liability in this instance is based upon his blameworthy ignorance of consequences. His fault really consists in nonaction or wrong action, with a full appreciation of the probable results of his conduct.

In other words, the law requires him to indemnify the injured servant because he knows or is presumed to know that his instrumentalities are in a dangerous condition, and also knows or is presumed to know that this dangerous condition must in the long run cause injury to anyone who uses, or is brought into proximity to, those instrumentalities as frequently and as constantly as is the case with a servant.

The reason why the above definitions and explanations of negligence are inadequate when applied as a measure and test of an employer's liability is simply this, that the special duty which, above all others, is imposed by the law upon him, is the duty of maintaining the instrumentalities of his business in such a condition that his servants will not be exposed to unnecessary peril.

This duty cannot be effectively discharged, unless he exercises reasonable care in seeing that the instrumentalities do not fall below a given standard of safety. The primary duty of an employer therefore, is to obtain such knowledge as is necessary to enable him to decide whether that normal standard is or is not satisfied at any given moment, while his duty to raise the instrumentalities to that standard, after he ascertains that they come short of it, is a secondary duty imposed by the law for the reason that he must be aware that, if this is not done, his servants will be likely to suffer injury. In short, the very essence of the principle upon which he is held liable is his knowledge, either of existing conditions or of the probable consequences of the continuance of those conditions.

p. 467, note 1; 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 56; Hoag v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 85 Pa. 293, 27 Am. Rep. 653; Cooley, Torts, p. 804; Pleasants v. Fant, 22 Wall. 116, 22 L. ed. 780.

The defendant company exercised all the diligence required of it at the time of the hiring.

There are no cases in the books which hold that it is negligent per se to employ a man seventeen years old to do this work, and, on the contrary, it has been frequently decided that the employing of such a person under circumstances like this is not negligent.

Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 737; Kansas & T. Coal Co. v. Brownlie, 60 Ark. 582; Molaske v. Ohio Coal Co. 86 Wis. 220.

Even if it were true that Ryan had been negligent in the lowering of cages in that he lowered them faster than was safe, and so fast as to indicate a reckless disregard for the safety of the persons riding in the cage

The criticisms of Cotton and Bowen, L. JJ., upon the general rule which Brett, M. R., undertook to formulate in Heaven v. Pender (1883) L. R. 11 Q. B. Div. 508, 52 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 702, 49 L. T. N. S. 857, 47 J. P. 709, probably forbid us to lay it down as a universal proposition, applicable to all civil relations, that, as has been laid down in Mastin v. Levagood (1891) 47 Kan. 36, "where any voluntary act may naturally result in the injury of another, the actor must see to it, at his peril, that injury does not follow."

But this doctrine undoubtedly expresses the conception which is the keynote of all the statements which we find in books respecting extent and character of the master's obligations to secure his servant against personal injury,—the conception, that is to say, of a duty to exercise a reasonably careful supervision with a view to eliminate unnecessary perils from the business.

A master must "exercise care and prudence that those in his employment be not exposed to unreasonable risks and dangers." Noyes v. Smith (1865) 28 Vt. 59, 65 Am. Dec. 222.

The legal implication is, that the employer will adopt suitable instruments and means with which to carry on his business. These he can provide and maintain by the use of suitable care and oversight; and if he fails to do so, he is guilty of a breach of duty under his contract, for the consequences of which he ought in justice and sound reason to be responsible. Snow v. Housatonic R. Co. (1864) 8 Allen, 441, 85 Am. Dec. 720. See also subd. VII., VIII., IX., post.

Or, to view the matter from a somewhat different standpoint, the qualifications ingrafted on the original rule that a servant assumes the ordinary risks of his employment are that a master shall not employ his servant in a work which the master is aware is of such a nature that no man could engage in it without incurring liability to the injury complained of. This appears to be a rational qualification of the rule which exempts the master from liability for injuries resulting from accidents to those in his employment, and involves the existence of knowledge on the part of the master of the dangerous nature of the employment. Potts v. Plunkett (1859) 9 Ir. C. L. Rep. 290, per Lefroy, Ch. J.

The obligation thus imposed upon the master is, it will be observed, the same in kind and degree as that incumbent upon all individuals or corporations who are under a duty towards a previous to the time of the accident, the plaintiff has not made out a case here. There is no proof that the accident resulted from the fact that Ryan lowered the cage too fast or started to lower it too fast, and what proof there is on that subject is directly opposed to that theory.

It is not enough in order for the plaintiff to recover in this case, to show that the accident resulted from the negligence of Ryan; it must appear that it was the direct result of the incompetency of Ryan.

Catlin v. Michigan C. R. Co. 66 Mich. 358; Thompson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 84 Mich. 281; 1 Bailey, Personal Injuries Relating to Master & Servant, § 1481; Core v. Ohio River R. Co. 38 W. Va. 456; McNally v. Colwell, 91 Mich. 528.

Where injury is not the result of inability to perform the duties devolving upon the servant, but is the result of momentary inattention and carelessness, such injury is caused by the negligence of a coservant, for which the defendant could not be held liable.

1 Bailey, Personal Injuries Relating to Master & Servant, § 1474; Harvey v. New York C. & H. K. R. Co. 88 N. Y. 481.

There is no claim, and no evidence in the case, that the defendant company ever had any actual notice of acts of carelessness or incompetency upon the part of Ryan.

So that if defendant can be held at all, it must be upon the assumption that the circumstances of Ryan's alleged carelessness were such as that the company ought to have known of it.

In order to make the company liable for not discharging an employee who has become incompetent during his employment, notice of the incompetency, or of the improper habit, must be brought home to the company, or the incompetency or habit must be so notorious as to charge the company with knowledge.

given class of persons to keep certain material substances in a safe condition. The most familiar example of this duty, apart from the relations of master and servant, is that which requires municipal corporations to maintain safe highways, etc., for the benefit of travelers. It is the accepted rule that no action can be maintained for a breach of this duty unless the corporation is proved to have had notice, actual or constructive, of the dangerous conditions which caused the injury. See 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. § 790.

This similarity of the principles involved, and of the results to which those principles lead, has not escaped the notice of the courts.

As was aptly remarked in Huffman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1883) 78 Mo. 50, "cases of this sort [i. e., where masters are sued by injured servants] are obviously analogous to those where a municipal corporation is sued for an injury arising from a defect in one of its streets, where one of two things must be shown to hold the city liable, either notice of the defect communicated to the city, or evidence that the defect had continued so long as to allow the inference to be drawn that notice of such defect had been communicated."

The same rule prevails as regards other relations in which a duty resembling that imposed on an employer is imposed on one of the parties.

Thus, the knowledge which the employer of an independent contractor possesses respecting the condition of the instrumentalities which he may be required, whether by express contract or by the custom of the business, to furnish for the use of the contractor's servants, is a material element in the determination of the question whether he has failed in the performance of his duty. Accordingly it has been said that the law is well established that a vessel is bound to furnish rigging and appliances reasonably safe for the use of those employed in receiving or discharging her cargo, although they may be in the immediate employ and pay of the stevedore, and that an action in rem will lie for damages arising from defects and imperfections in such appliances furnished, whenever the defect was such that a careful examination at the time could have detected it. The Para (1894) 23 U. S. App. 72, 60 Fed. Rep. 107, citing The Carolina (1886) 30 Fed. Rep. 199, The Rheola (1884) 19 Fed. Rep. 926; The William Branfoot (1892) 48 Fed. Rep. 914; The Protos (1891) 48 Fed. Rep. 919; The Serapis (1891) 49 Fed. Rep. 393.

Similarly where A contracts with the owners of a mine to excavate the ore, they agreeing to erect such supports and props as would render the miners safe, whenever notified by the contractor that the same were necessary, the owners, even in the absence of such notice, are liable to a servant of the contractor for injury caused by the lack of proper supports, if, having actual knowledge of the necessity for such supports, they failed to erect them. Kelly v. Howell (1884) 41 Ohio St. 438.

On the other hand, a ship is not liable for an injury to a stevedore by the fall of a bale of cotton, caused by the breaking from a latent defect of a hook used in raising and lowering cotton into the hold. The Benbrack (1888) 33 Fed. Rep. 687.

The same principles also inure to the advantage of the owner of premises who is sued for damages by a licensee.

Thus, a person who is injured by the fall of a plank of a roof which gave way under a man hired to do some repairs cannot recover unless he shows, either that the hirer knew or had the means of knowing, or was bound to take steps to know, that the roof was not sufficiently strong to support the workman's weight. Welfare v. London & B. R. Co. (1869) L. R. 4 Q. B. 606, 38 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 241, 20 L. T. N. S. 743, 17 Week. Rep. 1066.

They are also admitted as a restriction upon the liability of carriers for injuries to passengers, the extent of their duty, where freight is concerned, being determined upon the peculiar considerations which render them practically insurers of the safety of the goods conveyed.

The established rule in regard to the liability of a carrier to a passenger seems to be that the fact of the carrier's having employed an independent contractor to furnish the appliances or structures used in carrying on the business of transportation will not warrant him in trusting to the external appearance of the materials, or relieve him of the duty of carefully inspecting and testing those materials. Hutchinson, Carr. § 512, et seq.

The leading American case on this point is Ingalls v. Bills (1845) 9 Met. 1, 43 Am. Dec. 346, where the court, after an exhaustive discussion of the earlier authorities, stated its conclusions as follows: "The result at which we have arrived, from the examination of the case before us, is this: That carriers of passengers for hire are bound to use the utmost care and diligence

Lee v. Michigan C. R. Co. 87 Mich. 579; Oameron v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. 145 N. Y. 400.

The character and qualifications once possessed may be presumed to continue, and the master may rely upon that presumption until notice of change, or knowledge of such facts as would be equivalent to notice, or such at least as would put a reasonable man on his guard.

1 Bailey, Personal Injuries Relating to Master & Servant, § 1413; Chapman v. Erie R. Co. 55 N. Y. 579.

Grant, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

1. Ryan was seventeen years and five months old at the date of his employment. It is urged that it is negligence to employ one so young in such a responsible position, or, at least, that it is a question for the jury to determine. Young Ryan had had an experience of nearly two years in a similar position at another mine, where he had performed his work satisfactorily. He had performed his work satisfactorily and without accident, for between seven and eight months at the defendant's mine. It is conceded that he had sufficient physical ability, and was possessed of ordinary intelligence. Plaintiff's own testimony shows that he had the "appearance of being older than he was." Plaintiff cites no authorities to sustain his contention. The work was not difficult. There is nothing to show that it would be safer to employ for this work a person who was older. The fact that he had done his work safely and satisfactorily for over seven months is the best proof of his competency. There is no presumption of law that one seventeen or eighteen years of age cannot do such work as safely and as well as one older. There is no authority or reason in the proposition that one of that age is an improper person to employ for such work.

in the providing of safe, sufficient, and suitable coaches, harnesses, horses, and coachman, in order to prevent those injuries which human care and foresight can guard against; and that if an accident happens from a defect in the coach, which might have been discovered and remedied upon the most careful and thorough examination of the coach, such accident must be ascribed to negligence, for which the owner is liable in case of injury to a passenger happening by reason of such accident. On the other hand, where the accident arises from a hidden and internal defect, which a careful and thorough examination would not disclose, and which could not be guarded against by the exercise of a sound judgment and the most vigilant oversight, then the proprietor is not liable for the injury, but the misfortune must be borne by the sufferer, as one of that class of injuries for which the law can afford no redress in the form of a pecuniary recompense." [The doctrine laid down in this case has been adopted by all the American courts (See Hutchinson, Carr. § 507), and is also established law in England. See Readhead v. Midland R. Co. (1867) L. R. 2 Q. B. 412, 36 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 181, 16 L. T. N. S. 485, 15 Week. Rep. 831, 8 Best & S. 871, Affirmed (1869) L. R. 4 Q. B. 379, 38 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 169, 17 Week. Rep. 787, 9 Best & S. 519.]

The fundamental propositions which the foregoing discussion indicates to be controlling in every action brought by a servant to recover damages for an injury received in the course of his employment may be stated as follows:

(A) The servant's case is not completely made out unless he proves: (I.) That the instrumentality which caused his injury was in an abnormally dangerous condition; (II.) that the accident which occurred to the servant was such as might reasonably have been expected to result from the existence of that abnormal condition; (III.) that the master either actually knew of that condition, or would have known of it if he had made a proper use of the means of information which he possessed; (IV.) that the master, having this actual or constructive knowledge of the special risk to which the servant was exposed, omitted to take such steps as a prudent man would have taken for the protection of the servant by remedying the defect immediately, or, if that should not be feasible, by informing the servant of the existence of the risk and so placing him in a position to provide for his own safety; (V.) in cases where the master's failure to examine with reasonable care and frequency the condition of his appliances is the breach of duty specifically relied upon, the servant is also required to show that the abnormal condition which produced the injury would have been discovered by an examination of the kind which the law requires under the circumstances of the case.

(B) When the servant has established a prima facie right of action by proof of these particulars, the master may still escape liability by showing that the servant was himself aware of the danger to which he was exposed, and went on working under circumstances which charge him with an assumption of the risk or with contributory negligence.

All these propositions except the first under (A) are more or less germane to the subject of the present note, and we shall now proceed to review, under convenient headings, the cases by which they are illustrated.

Cases are not wanting in which the principle that fault cannot be imputed to the master unless he has knowledge of the existence of the conditions from which the servant's injury resulted seems to have been ignored, and liability imposed upon evidence which merely showed that those conditions existed. See, for example, the following: McCray v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (1896) 89 Tex. 168; Bonner v. Glenn (1891) 79 Tex. 531; Taylor, B. & H. R. Co. v. Taylor (1890) 79 Tex. 104; Texas P. R. Co. v. White (1891) 82 Tex. 548; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Crow (1893) 3 Tex. Civ. App. 266; Engstrom v. Ashland Iron & S. Co. (1894) 87 Wis. 166; Kennedy v. Lake Superior Terminal & T. R. Co. (1896) 93 Wis. 32; Darling v. New York, P. & E. R. Co. (1892) 17 R. I. 708, 16 L. R. A. 643; Gorham v. Kansas City & S. R. Co. (1892) 113 Mo. 408.

But doubtless the language in these cases is to be explained by the fact that no question was raised as to the master's possession of the knowledge demanded by the law, and the attention of the court was therefore fixed more particularly upon the material results of his negligence.

As illustrating the foregoing remarks, the cases in which the courts have laid down the doctrine that knowledge is an essential element of contributory negligence may usefully be noted. In one of these the rule was thus stated in the most general terms:

"Negligence can only be affirmed in respect of situations and conditions known to the party

The authorities appear to be uniform against the proposition. Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. 125 N. Y. 737; Kansas & T. Coal Co. v. Brownlie, 60 Ark. 582; Neal v. Gillett, 23 Conn. 437; Molaske v. Ohio Coal Co. 86 Wis. 220. In Sutherland v. Troy & B. R. Co. the telegraph operator, through whose negligence the accident happened, was a little over seventeen years old, had had over a year's experience, been in the employ of the company three months prior to the accident, and had discharged his duties intelligently and to the entire satisfaction of the company. It was held that the jury could not be permitted to infer that the operator was "incompetent . . . from his age only, or that the company was negligent in employing him, or to speculate whether, if the operator had been a man of mature years or judgment, he would have been less likely to have committed the mistake which Johnson did." In Molaske v. Ohio Coal Co. it was held negligence to employ a boy twelve years old in a responsible position, requiring constant watchfulness and attention. The court appears to have placed its holding upon the presumption of the common law, which fixes the age when the presumption of capacity arises at fourteen.

2. Did the company exercise due care in employing Ryan? One Richard Pascoe, the master mechanic of the defendant, was the authorized agent to employ him. Ryan's father had been a practical engineer, known to Mr. Pascoe for eighteen years. Mr. Pascoe was informed by his father of the experience his son had had, and was advised that he was capable of doing the work. Mr. Pascoe was familiar with the method of braking at the Michigamme mine, where young Ryan had had his experience, which was the same as in the defendant's mine. It further appears that the duties of the hand brakeman at the defendant's mine were more simple than at to whom it is imputed." Brown v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1895) 111 Ala. 275.

To the same effect see Mather v. Billston (1895) 156 U. S. 891, 39 L. ed. 464; Cleveland Rolling Mill Co. v. Corrigan (1899) 46 Ohio St. 283, 3 L. R. A. 385.

II. Actual knowledge.

a. Existence of actual knowledge, effect of.

The cases which furnish the simplest illustrations of the general principle discussed in the preceding subdivisions are those involving facts which justify the conclusion that the employer had actual knowledge of the abnormal conditions which caused the servant's injury.

"If there is personal negligence in the master he is liable, and if he knows the defects which caused the injury that is evidence of personal negligence." Meilors v. Shaw (1861) 1 Best & S. 437, 30 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 838, 7 Jur. N. S. 845, per Crompton, J. Compare Cumberland & P. R. Co. v. State, Moran (1875) 44 Md. 283 (arg.).

In the first named of these cases it was contended by counsel that, to render the master liable, there must be actual personal interference on his part so as to lay a trap for the servant in the particular matter, from which he received the injury. But Mr. Justice Crompton said: "I do not agree to that; I think it is negligence for which the master is liable, if he knows that the machinery or tackle to be used by the persons employed by him is improper or unsafe, and notwithstanding that knowledge sanctions its use, as in Roberts v. Smith (1857) 2 Hurlst. & N. 218; though there may be a doubt as to his liability, where the servant is aware of the defective state of the machinery, and so may be presumed to have taken upon himself the extra risk for the sake of extra wages."

The following decisions will indicate the operation of the general principle in different connections:

It is culpable negligence in a mine owner to neglect a rule which he has promulgated to insure the testing of the rope by which the miners are lowered into and raised from the shaft, and to keep in his employment a servant who to his knowledge habitually disregards that rule to his knowledge habitually disregards that rule. Senior v. Ward (1850) 1 El. & El. 335, 28 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 139, 5 Jur. N. S. 172, 7 Week. Rep. 261.

An employer is liable if, having received specific notice that a hoisting rope is rotten, he goes on using it. Perry v. Bicketts (1870) 55 Ill. 234.

In Keegan v. Western R. Corp. (1853) 8 N. Y. 175, 59 Am. Dec. 476, the plaintiff was injured by the explosion of the boiler of a locomotive engine on which he was employed by the defendants as a fireman. The boiler was defective and dangerous, and its condition in this respect was, and had for some time been, known to the defendants by the reports of the engineer made on five or six different occasions, which were entered on the books of the defendants kept for that purpose, and the injury to the plaintiffs resulted from the improper conduct of the defendants in using the engine in question thus known to be defective. Held, that on this statement of facts, no doubt could be entertained of the liability of the defendants.

So, the owners of a threshing machine are liable for personal injuries to a workman who, without knowledge that certain wheels and cogs usually covered are uncovered, attempts to oil the machine and has his hand caught in such cogs, when they operate the machine knowing it to be imminently dangerous in such condition. Mastin v. Levagood (1891) 47 Kan. 38.

So, it is negligence in a railroad company to continue to use a defective car coupling with knowledge of the defect, and a brakeman injured in consequence of the defect is entitled to recover damages. Bowers v. Union P. R. Co. (1885) 4 Utah, 215.

Where there is evidence showing that the master knows a boiler to be in a defective condition, it is not error to submit to the jury the question whether he was guilty of negligence in not providing suitable appliances. Glossen v. Gehman (1892) 147 Pa. 619; Essex County Electric Co. v. Kelly (1897; N. J. L.) 37 Atl. 619.

So, it is negligence on the part of a railroad company to allow a loose mass of rock to remain in a position above and near its track, in such a position as to slide or fall upon the track when detached, when the danger therefrom was known to such company or its officers. Bean v. Western N. C. R. Co. (1890) 101 N. C. 731.

So, it has been said to be "well settled that if proper persons are employed who afterwards become incompetent or unfit, from bad habits, to discharge their duties, and this is brought to the knowledge or notice of the principal or its

the mine at Michigamme. One McCall, an engineer, and witness for the plaintiff, testified that, "if a man had had a year's experience, he ought to be a very good man," and "I should consider two years' experience would make anyone all right." One John St. Cyr, another witness for the plaintiff, testified on cross-examination: "I should think that if Mr. John Ryan recommended a man, that he would be all right." These facts were undisputed. It therefore became a question of law for the court to determine whether the defendant had exercised due care in the employment of Ryan. The degree of care required is well stated in Wabash R. Co. v. McDaniels, 107 U. S. 454, 27 L. ed. 605: "It is such care as, in view of the consequences that may result from negligence on the part of employees, is fairly commensurate with the perils or dangers likely to be encountered." In this case the machinery used was simple and easily managed. Defendant made due inquiries, of one competent to judge, as to Ryan's experience and ability. The defendant therefore exercised due care in employing him.

3. There was no evidence that Ryan had become incompetent, or, if there were, that knowledge of his incompetency had been brought home to the defendant. When the master has exercised due care in the employment of a servant, he may rely upon the presumption of competency until he has notice or knowledge to the contrary. 1 Bailey, Personal Injuries Relating to Master & Servant, § 1413; Chapman v. Erie R. Co. 55 N. Y. 579. The only evidence plaintiff offered from which he claimed the right to go to the jury upon the question of notice was the testimony of one O'Donnell, who was at the time the engineer of the hoisting machinery for the defendant. He testified that he thought Ryan sometimes lowered the cage too fast. He also testified that they disagreed in regard to the speed at which men should be managing officers who have power to act in the premises, a failure or neglect promptly to discharge them will render the principal liable for injury caused thereby." Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1874) 55 N. Y. 579; S. P. Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1861) 38 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467; Alabama & F. R. Co. v. Waller (1872) 48 A. a. 459; New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hughes (1873) 49 Miss. 283; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Stupak (1889) 123 Ind. 210; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Collarn (1881) 73 Ind. 128, 38 Am. Rep. 134; Indiana Mfg. Co. v. Millican (1882) 87 Ind. 87; Pennsylvania Co. v. Roney (1883) 89 Ind. 453, 46 Am. Rep. 173; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Johnson (1886) 89 Tex. 519; Kean v. Detroit Copper & B. Rolling Mills (1887) 68 Mich. 277; Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Sullivan (1872) 63 Ill. 293; Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Musette (1894) 7 Tex. Civ. App. 169 Affirmed in (1894) 86 Tex. 708, 24 L. R. A. 642.

So, also, it has been held that a railroad company would be liable for injury to an employee through the mismanagement of a locomotive engine by a fireman, if the superintendent of engineers on, or superintendent of, the road knew that firemen were permitted to manage and control such engines, in the absence of engineers, about switches and stations, and failed or neglected to prohibit it. Harper v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1871) 47 Mo. 567, 4 Am. Rep. 333.

See also the cases (III. post), turning upon the effect of constructive knowledge.

In estimating the extent of the employer's liability the essential part to be settled is not whether he knew that certain conditions existed, but whether he knew that those conditions involved danger to the servant.

Proof, merely, of knowledge on the employer's part that steps by which a servant is required to descend into a cellar are movable, without any evidence to show that movable steps are unsafe in themselves or unsuitable for the place, or that defendants knew or had reason to suppose that the owner would leave them insecurely placed, is not sufficient to enable the plaintiff to recover on the theory that he was set to work in a place of peculiar danger without a caution to look and see that the steps were properly placed. Regan v. Donovan (1893) 159 Mass. 1. Compare the cases cited in V. post.

And the analogous rule by which the material question in cases where the defenses of contributory negligence or assumption of risks are raised is not whether the servant was aware of the abnormal conditions which produced the danger but whether he comprehended that there was such danger.

In an action for an injury occasioned by the alleged negligence of the defendant, the negligence, if any, of either plaintiff or defendant is to be measured by the condition of things at the place where the accident took place as they were known to exist by each of the parties at the time of the acts of each one complained of as being negligent; and these acts cannot be characterized one way or the other by the subsequent determination of conditions unknown at the time to both or either, except so far as that knowledge may properly affect the act of the one so informed. Ray, Negligence of Imposed Duties, 134, cited with approval in Murphy v. Great Northern R. Co. (1897) (Minn.) 71 N. W. 662.

If a railway company violates its duty by furnishing machinery and appliances which it knows to be defective, the danger to an employee who is required to use the appliances, in ignorance of their defective condition, is the same on one day as on another. The fact that they were being used on Sunday, therefore, when the servant was injured, will not enable the company to interpose as an excuse for its wrong a law enacted to secure the observance of Sunday. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Buck (1883) 116 Ind. 566, 2 L. R. A. 520.

The master may be held responsible on the ground of actual knowledge obtained through any channel, even though he has duly fulfilled the duty cast upon him by the law to see that the instrumentalities of his business are properly examined by competent agents, if not by himself in person.

In Indiana, I. & I. R. Co. v. Snyder (1894) 140 Ind. 647, the defendant's counsel place stress upon the fact that the lumber, out of which a defective car handle was constructed, was inspected before it went into the shops, and found to be clear and free of knots; but the court said: "An inspection is but the means employed by the master to discover defects. However, if, as in this case, he obtains notice through another representative agent of the insufficiency of the appliances in time to remedy the same, then the fact that an inspection was made by another of his agents, and noting as to the defectiveness in question ascertained, would not be available in favor of the lowered; that he did not know who knew the most about running the brake, Ryan or himself; that Ryan "had always attended to his business up to this time (the time of the accident)." The officers of the mine were frequently in the engine room, frequently rode up and down in the cages, had seen Ryan perform the work, and had never seen or had their attention called to any act of incompetency or fault otherwise than, as above stated, that one person thought that he ran too fast. An employee may frequently use machinery in a negligent manner, but if such negligent use leaves no trace behind it, which it is the duty of the master upon inspection to see, no presumption of knowledge on the part of the master arises. A switchman may for a long time frequently leave a switch open, and habitually violate the rules of the master, but no inference of knowledge on the part of or notice to the master will arise master. Where there is actual knowledge, the matter of inspection is not controlling."

It will be shown below that some courts hold that an employer may to a certain extent relieve himself of liability by delegating to a competent agent the duty of furnishing reasonably safe instrumentalities, but the operation of this principle is suspended wherever the employer had knowledge of the existence of the defects from which the plaintiff's injury resulted. Mansfield Coal & Coke Co. v. McEnery (1879) 91 Pa. 185, 38 Am. Rep. 662.

And generally it may be said that the master will often be held responsible, for the reason that he understood the conditions which exposed the servant to unnecessary danger, although, in other aspects of the case, the servant would have been unable to maintain his action.

Thus, the rule that a servant, when he accepts a certain employment, impliedly contracts that he possesses a certain degree of skill, does not avail to absolve the master from responsibility for injuries to a servant whose inexperience is put forward as a material ingredient in his right of action, where the master has actual knowledge of the extent of the servant's skill. Goins v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1889) 37 Mo. App. 221; Missouri P. R. Co. v. King (1893) 2 Tex. Civ. App. 122; Arizona Lumber & T. Co. v. Mooney (Ariz. 1893) 33 Pac. 400.

In other words it is negligence to set a servant to work at a special task where the employer knows that he lacks the strength and skill necessary to enable him to do it safely. Noblesville Foundry & Mach. Co. v. Yeaman (1892) 3 Ind. App. 521.

In certain cases, as will be shown in a note to be shortly published in this series, the master may escape the liability arising out of this state of facts by properly instructing the servant. But it will also be shown in the same note that his liability remains absolute if he knows that the servant lacks capacity to understand the dangers of the work, however much he may have been instructed.

[For an illustration of the converse of the doctrine just stated see Whittaker v. Coombs (1884) 14 Ill. App. 498; cited in the next section.]

It has, however, been held that the mere fact that the agent of the employer who hired a brakeman knew him to be inexperienced, will not make the employer liable as for negligence, the special reason assigned being that the employer cannot properly be deemed guilty of greater negligence in hiring him than he is in soliciting and accepting the employment. McDermott v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1896) 56 Kan. 319.

Other illustrations of the same general principle are these: The existence of proper regulations, and the fact that personal injuries to an employee occurred in consequence of violations thereof by an incompetent fellow employee, will not preclude recovery by the former, if the employer knew of the incompetence. Bonner v. Whitcomb (1891) 80 Tex. 178. The negligence of one fellow servant of an engineer in failing to report to the company his violations of a rule of the company will not relieve the company from an injury to another fellow servant caused by the negligence of the engineer, where the company retained such engineer in its employ although aware of his negligent acts. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Musette (1894) 7 Tex. Civ. App. 169, Affirmed in (1894) 86 Tex. 708, 24 L. R. A. 642. The right of an employee to recover for negligence of a corporation in hiring an incompetent servant over the protest of some of its officers who are aware of his incompetence is not affected by the failure of another employee to give notice of subsequent neglect and unfitness of such servant. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Musette (1894) 86 Tex. 708, 24 L. R. A. 642, Aff'd (1894) 7 Tex. Civ. App. 169. The servant's breach of a rule formulated for the safety of employees will not be imputed to him as contributory negligence, where such rule has been habitually violated with the knowledge and consent of the master or his representative. Boess v. Clausen & P. Brewing Co. (1896) 12 App. Div. 866. Contrast Cameron v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1895) 145 N. Y. 400, cited in the next section.

[This subject will be fully developed in a note to be published at an early date in this series, and it will be unnecessary in the present connection to do more than make a passing reference to it.]

Agreeably to the principle by which a tortfeasor is required to indemnify the injured person for all the damage suffered by him, although other causes for which he is not responsible may have contributed to the result, a master cannot escape liability for injuries caused by instrumentalities which he knows to be defective, on the ground that the injuries were in part due to the act of a fellow servant of the plaintiff.

ter & Servant, § 1474; McNally v. Colwell, 91 Mich. 527; Thompson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 84 Mich. 281.

5. Plaintiff sought to show talk among the men that Ryan lowered the cage too fast. This was ruled out. It had no tendency to prove general reputation for incompetency. Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co. 20 Mich. 105, 4 Am. Rep. 364; 1 Bailey, Personal Injuries Relating to Master & Servant, § 1501. Not only is there no evidence that the accident was due to too great speed, but there is affirmative evidence from plaintiff's own witness O'Donnell that the cage was descending at its "natural speed." This testimony could therefore have had no bearing upon the issue. Ryan was lowering the cage as he had done hundreds of times before, at the same or less speed. The speed, therefore, had nothing to do with the accident. Core v. Ohio River R. Co. 38 W. Va. 456; 1 Bailey, Personal Injuries Relating to Master & Servant, § 1481; Thompson v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. 84 Mich. 281, and McNally v. Colwell, 91 Mich. 528.

6. It follows from what has already been written that defendant was not guilty of negligence in failing to watch Ryan, and ascertain how he was doing his work. It exercised due care in employing him, and its engineer watched and instructed him when he commenced to work. The law imposed no further duty upon defendant until it had received notice of conduct which denoted incompetency.

The judgment must be affirmed.

The other Justices concur.

Thus, a railroad company is not relieved from liability to a sectionhand resulting from the use of a hand car with an insufficient brake, of whose insufficiency it had notice, by the fact that the section foreman in charge of the car was a fellow servant of the person injured. Northern P. R. Co. v. Charles (1892) 7 U. S. App. 859, 51 Fed. Rep. 562, 2 C. C. A. 330.

Nor will the fact that the plaintiff was injured partly through the negligence of a coservant in failing to block an engine with a leaking throttle valve, which was apt to move of its own accord, operate as a bar to the action, if the employer has also been negligent in allowing such engine to be kept in use with knowledge of its condition. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holt (1883) 29 Kan. 149.

Where a foreman of a stevedore, having full charge of the loading and unloading of a vessel, called the attention of the mate of the ship to the unsafe character of a sling furnished by the vessel, and used in lowering cotton, the fact that the man at the gangway, whose duty it was to warn the men below when the cotton was on its way, failed to do so, was not, in admiralty, matter in discharge of the liability of the vessel, but only in mitigation of damages. The Phoenix (1888) 34 Fed. Rep. 760.

Still less can the master be absolved on the ground that a coservant of the plaintiff might, by exercising an unusual degree of care, have obviated the consequences of the master's negligence. Thus, where a locomotive the valves of which have been leaking for several months to the knowledge both of the company's superintendent and of the engineer, is left unattended by the latter without his taking certain precautions which would, as he knew, have prevented the escape of steam into the cylinder, the company is liable for injuries received by a car repairer as a result of the locomotive's being set in motion by such an escape of steam. Cone v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1880) 81 N. Y. 206, 37 Am. Rep. 401.

The above rule, however, is applicable only in cases where the master's negligence is, in the proper sense of the word, a concurrent cause of the injury. Upon familiar principles, it is clear that the master's knowledge of the incompetency of the culpable servant is immaterial where the efficient cause of the injury is the negligence of the plaintiff himself in voluntarily and knowingly exposing himself to the dangers created by the act of the incompetent servant. Sheets v. Chicago & I. Coal R. Co. (1894) 139 Ind. 682, where a brakeman was killed in coupling cars which he knew to be moving at a dangerous rate of speed, and it was held that the master was not liable at all. I. R. A.

though he knew that the engineer was unfit for his position.

b. Absence of actual knowledge, effect of.

The converse of the rule stated in the preceding section does not hold good in all respects, for, as will be shown in the next subdivision, the employer may be held liable although no actual knowledge on his part is established, if it appears that by the use of ordinary care he could have ascertained that the conditions existed which caused the servant's injury.

The only effect of its being shown that the master had no actual knowledge is that the burden of proving that his ignorance was culpable is cast upon the servant.

It is true that statements of the courts as to the effect of a want of knowledge on the master's part sometimes omit a formal reference to constructive knowledge, but, with a few exceptions to be presently noticed, such statements were not made in cases in which the question whether there was any difference between the legal consequences of actual and of constructive knowledge was fairly raised.

No special importance, therefore, is to be attached to the fact that we find in the books such remarks and rulings as these.

"As the declaration contains no charge that the defendant knew any of the defects mentioned, the court is not called upon to decide how far such knowledge on his part of a defect unknown to the servant would make him liable." Priestley v. Fowler (1873) 3 Mees. & W. 1, Murph. & H. 305, 1 Jur. 987.

It is not negligence in the master if a tool or machine breaks, whether from an internal original fault, not apparent when the tool or machine was first provided, or from an external apparent one produced by time and use, not brought to the master's knowledge. Baker v. Allegheny R. Co. (1890) 95 Pa. 211.

A seaman cannot recover damages from the owner of his ship on the ground of her being unseaworthy, unless he alleges and proves that such owner was aware of her condition. Couch v. Steel (1854) 3 El. & Bl. 408, 2 C. L. Rep. 940, 23 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 121, 18 Jur. 515.

A verdict for the defendant is rightly directed where there is no evidence of knowledge on the employer's part. Skellenger v. Chicago & N.W. R. Co. (1883) 61 Iowa, 714.

The evidence is insufficient to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff, where it does not prove that the defendant knew of the defect. Arcade File Works v. Juteau (1896) 15 Ind. App. 461.

A servant not hired for any special duties, who is directed to couple two cars, and receives an injury because he undertakes to do this on the inside of a curve, cannot recover damages on the theory that he was unskilled in such work, where there is no evidence that his want of skill was known to the master or the master's representative. Whittaker v. Coombs (1884) 14 Ill. App. 498. Compare Mahoney v. Vacuum Oil Co. (1894) 76 Hun, 579; Fisk v. Central P. R. Co. (1887) 72 Cal. 43; Johnson v. Armour (1883) 18 Fed. Rep. 490; Illinois Steel Co. v. Paschke (1893) 51 Ill. App. 456; Acme Coal Min. Co. v. McIver (1894) 5 Colo. App. 267; Behm v. Armour (1883) 58 Wis. 1.

It will be found, on referring to the cases cited in the following subdivisions, that all the courts which have expressed themselves in this manner have fully recognised the doctrine that the two kinds of knowledge are equivalent in law, so far as the master's liability is concerned.

The only cases, it is believed, in which this doctrine has been explicitly rejected, are McMillan v. Saratoga & W. R. Co. (1855) 20 Barb. 460; Anderson v. New Jersey S. B. Co. (1867) 7 Robt. 611; and perhaps Kuns v. Stuart (1865) 1 Daly, 481. That these rulings are of no authority need scarcely be said.

III. Constructive knowledge.

a. Generally.

The principle that the obligations of the master to the servant can be fulfilled only by the exercise of due care in providing that suitable instrumentalities are provided for the operation of his business is applied in a somewhat different manner according as the plaintiff's theory and the evidence adduced to support it bring into greater prominence the question whether the master was negligent in allowing certain abnormal conditions to remain unremedied, or the question whether he was negligent in remaining ignorant that such abnormal conditions existed.

In cases in which the former is the main issue presented, the essential object of the investigation is to ascertain whether the instrumentality which produced the injury was abnormally dangerous to persons using it or working in proximity to it, and the master's knowledge or ignorance of its dangerous condition is treated as material only for the reason that the existence of that condition cannot be imputed to him as negligence unless it was known to him either actually or constructively. To this conception are referable such statements of the extent of the master's liability as the following:

The master may be negligent in not exercising ordinary care to provide suitable and safe machinery or appliances or in making use of those which he knows have become defective, but the defects in which he does not explain to the servant, or in continuing ignorantly to make use of those which are defective, where his ignorance is due to a neglect to use ordinary prudence and diligence to discover defects. Cooley, Torts, p. 556, quoted with approval in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr (1882) 84 Ind. 50.

"The master is bound to use ordinary care in providing suitable structures and engines and proper servants to carry on his business, and is liable to any of their fellow servants for his negligence in this respect. This care he can and must exercise both in procuring and in keeping or maintaining such servants, structures, and engines. If he knows, or in the exercise of due care might have known, that his servants are incompetent, or his structures or engines insufficient, either at the time of procuring them, or at any subsequent time, he falls in his duty." Gilman v. Eastern R. Co. (1866) 13 Allen, 433, 440, 90 Am. Dec. 210, per Gray, J.

"The rule has long been established, and it is founded in justice and reason, that it is the duty of railroad companies to keep their road and works, and all portions of the track, in such repair and so watched and tended as to insure the safety of all who may lawfully be upon them, whether passengers or servants or others. They are bound to furnish a safe road, and sufficient and safe machinery or cars. The legal implication is, that the roads will have and keep a safe track, and adopt suitable instruments and means with which to carry on their business. They can provide all these by the use of requisite care and foresight, and if they fail to do so, they are guilty of a breach of duty, and are liable for the consequences. . . . Under this rule it is held that the companies are liable for the existence of all defects which they knew, or by reasonable care and diligence might have known." Lewis v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. (1875) 50 Mo. 495, 21 Am. Rep. 385.

The liability of an employer for defective machinery does not depend on the fact that the defects are latent or patent, but on the question of proper care in selecting the machinery and keeping it in repair. Gunter v. Grantville Mfg. Co. (1881) 15 S. C. 443.

Another form in which the rule is expressed is that the employer is not liable for an injury caused by a "latent" defect; that is to say, one which is not discoverable by a reasonable inspection. Essex County Electric Co. v. Kelly (1894) 57 N. J. L. 100; Throckmorton v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1896, Tex. Civ. App.) 39 S. W. 174.

Or, to express the same idea in another way, the duty of a master to provide for the safety of his servant includes the obligation to protect him from latent or unseen defects, so far as that end can be attained by reasonable care. Edward Hines Lumber Co. v. Ligas (1896) 68 Ill. App. 523.

In another class of cases the essence of the negligence imputed to the master is his failure to adopt such measures as a man of ordinary prudence would have adopted under the circumstances for the purpose of keeping himself acquainted with the condition of the instrumentalities of his business. The main problem to be then solved is whether the master has discharged his duty of inspection, and his duty to maintain in safe condition is relegated to the background. Hence we find in the reports such statements as the following:

"It is incumbent upon a railway corporation, in the discharge of its duty as master, not only to provide machinery and instrumentalities for its employees which are suitable and safe, but also to use reasonable diligence to keep them so. Necessarily incident to these obligations is the duty of frequent inspection, and the corporation, acting by its servants in the discharge of such duty, is liable for their negligence." Tierney v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1885) 33 Minn. 311.

The duty of a master to his servant to exercise reasonable care and skill in furnishing suitable machinery and appliances for carrying on the business for which the servant is employed, and in keeping such machinery and appliances in repair, includes the duty of making inspections and tests at proper intervals. Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebregsten (1894) 57 N. J. L. 400.

"It is the duty of the company to exercise reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in providing and keeping in repair reasonably safe machinery and appliances for the use of its servants; and this is a continuing duty, requiring the company to exercise reasonable diligence and care in supervision and inspection." Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Kneirim (1894) 152 Ill. 458.

The master should take notice of the liability of the parts of machinery to wear out and become defective. Hence the duty of the master to provide safe machinery and appliances is a continuous one. He must supervise, examine, and test his machinery as often as custom and experience require. Wabash & W. R. Co. v. Morgan (1892) 132 Ind. 430.

"Engines and other appliances used in operating a railroad are liable to wear out, to break, become defective and dangerous, and a railroad company employing such agencies is charged with notice of this fact, and consequently is bound to exercise a degree of watchfulness over them commensurate with the nature of the business in which they are employed and the consequences incident to neglect. Therefore, if a company fails to make frequent examinations of its engines, machinery, and appliances, or fails to take other measures of precaution necessary to prevent such appliances and machinery from becoming defective and dangerous from natural causes; and if from such defects which might have been known by the use of ordinary care or diligence, an employee suffers injury without his fault, negligence may be predicated thereon, as such omissions would be regarded as negligence." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holt (1883) 29 Kan. 149, 152.

It is error to give an instruction implying that, "having furnished suitable and proper machinery and appliances, the master can thereafter remain passive, so long as they work well and seem safe." The duty of inspection is affirmative, and must continuously be exercised. Houston v. Brush (1894) 66 Vt. 331.

[The general principle to which these statements refer will be discussed at length in later subdivisions of this note. See especially, VII., VIII.]

These two types of cases in which the distinctive issues are the failure to remove a defect of which the master ought to have known, and the failure to ascertain that such a defect existed, are not always differentiated by trial courts as clearly as is desirable.

As both these issues are involved in every action of the class under consideration, although the main controversy may centre itself upon one rather than the other, it seems proper that each should be submitted to the jury by separate instructions rather than in one instruction, as is now the more common practice.

We shall now proceed to give the substance of a number of rulings and judicial statements in which the principle is recognized that for the purposes of affecting the master with or relieving him from, liability, constructive knowledge is equivalent to actual knowledge.

b. Liability predicated from constructive knowledge.

1. General statements of the rule.

The question is not whether the master believes that the materials furnished by him are free from defects, but whether he is justified in such a belief. Roberts v. Smith (1857) 2 Hurlst. & N. 213.

It is not enough that the master did not know of the danger, if, by reasonable care, he might have known, and if, reasonably, he ought to have known, and to have taken the proper means of knowing." Webb v. Rennie, (1865) 4 Foat. & F. 608, per Cockburn, Ch. J.

"It is the master's duty to be careful that his servant is not induced to work under a notion 41 L. R. A.

that tackle or machinery is staunch and secure, when in fact the master knows, or ought to know, that it is not so. If from any negligence in this respect damage arise the master is responsible." Paterson v. Wallace, 1 Macq. H. L. Cas. 748, 751. [Quoted as "recognised law" in Herdler v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. (1896) 136 Mo. 8.]

In Feltham v. England (1885) 4 Foat. & F. 460, where one of the pieces supporting a tramway collapsed, Cockburn Ch. J., charged the jury that "although it may be that the defendant had no actual knowledge . . . [of the inadequacy of the supports] the question is whether he might not and ought not to have had personal knowledge, and whether it was not negligence in him to allow the tramway to remain with the pieces in that insufficient state."

"Ignorance itself is negligence in a case in which any proper inquiry would have obtained the necessary information, and where the duty to inquire is plainly imperative." Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co. (1870) 20 Mich. 124, 4 Am. Rep. 364, per Cooley, J.

"Where knowledge is essential to charge the master, negligent ignorance is equivalent to knowledge." Schmidt v. Block (1886) 76 Ga. 823, referring to 2 Thomp. Neg. p. 994; Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 93; S. P. Ocean S. S. Co. v. Matthews (1890) 86 Ga. 418.

A master is liable for furnishing appliances which he knew, or ought to have known, to be unsafe. McGhee v. Bell (1897) 38 S. W. 702, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 267.

"The master is chargeable, not only with such knowledge as he actually has, but also with that which he ought to have by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence on his part in the performance of his duties as master." Houston v. Brush (1894) 66 Vt. 331.

"The law will imply notice of any defect which, by the use of ordinary care, might have been known to the master." Consolidated Coal Co. v. Haenni (1893) 146 Ill. 614; Goff v. Toledo, St. L. & K. C. R. Co. (1887) 28 Ill. App. 529.

The master's liability to his servant extends not only to such unnecessary and unreasonable risks as are in fact known to him, but to such as he ought to know in the exercise of proper diligence, i. e., diligence proportionate to the occasion. Cook v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1885) 34 Minn. 45.

"Knowledge may be established by showing actual cognizance of the defect, or knowledge imputed from the opportunities for actual knowledge arising from the duty to observe its machinery and appliances for the safety of 'ts workmen." Evanville & T. H. R. Co. v. Ducl (1892) 134 Ind. 156.

"A master cannot screen himself from liability on the ground that he did not know of the defects in the machinery, or of the incompetency of his servants, if he might have known of them by the exercise of due care." Consolidated Coal Co. v. Haenni (1893) 146 Ill. 614.

Ignorance by the master of defects in the instrumentalities used by his servants, in performing his work, is no defense to an action by the employee who has been injured by them, when in the exercise of proper care and inspection the master could have discovered and remedied the defects, or avoided the danger incident therefrom. Benzing v. Steinway (1886) 101 N. Y. 547.

A master is chargeable with notice of a disorder or deficiency in anything which it is his duty to his servant to keep in reasonably safe condition, if a proper inspection would disclose its existence. Chesson v. John L. Roper Lumbar Co. (1896) 118 N. C. 59.

If the instrumentality which causes the servant's injury is a vicious animal belonging to the category known as "domestic" the master cannot avail himself of the rule which disables strangers from recovering damages from the owner of such an animal, unless he is shown to have had actual knowledge of its evil propensities.

That rule is based on the fact that the owner was not instrumental in placing the injured party in danger, and does not apply to a servant because he is not a mere volunteer. He is required by his master to assume the danger which the existence of vicious and uncured propensities implies, and if the master could, by the exercise of reasonable care, know of the existence of such propensities, his actual ignorance of them is no excuse in law. George H. Hammond Co. v. Johnson (1893) 38 Neb. 244.

From the principles stated in the cases above cited it follows that an instruction is erroneous which absolves an employer from liability "unless he knew of the defects" which caused the injury. Bier v. Standard Mfg. Co. (1889) 130 Pa. 446; Houston v. Brush (1894) 66 Vt. 331.

Conversely, an instruction is correct which declares that a servant has a right to recover on proof that the injury was occasioned by the use of defective machinery, and that the master was aware of the defect, or that the exercise of reasonable care would have disclosed it. Elliott v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. (1878) 67 Mo. 272.

Or that, if the jury "believe from the evidence that the defendant knew of the defects, if any existed and are proved by the evidence, and that the existence of such defects constituted negligence on the part of the defendant, and in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence the defendant could have known of and repaired them, then the defendant is liable therefor." Peoria, D. & E. R. Co. v. Hardwick (1892) 48 Ill. App. 562.

A demurrer to the evidence should not be sustained where there is some evidence tending to show that the defendant might, by the exercise of ordinary care, have discovered and remedied a defect prior to the accident of which it was the cause. Harter v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1896) 55 Kan. 250.

Where there was no distinct evidence that defendant or its agents knew of the defect, but there was evidence tending to show that the implement was made of bad material, which could have been discovered by the use of ordinary care, and not discoverable by ordinary use, a demurrer to such evidence is properly overruled. Corey v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1885) 86 Mo. 635; S. P. Coonts v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1894) 121 Mo. 662.

Where the evidence tends to show that the master's representative did not carefully perform his duty to see that an appliance was in good condition before it was delivered to the servants, and that the plaintiff's injury resulted from this dereliction of duty, a nonsuit is error. Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebregsten (1894) 57 N. J. L. 402.

Where it is proved that a car-coupler gave way suddenly and injured a brakeman, but there is no evidence adduced to show that the company had knowledge of the existence of any defect, or that it had been derelict in regard to its duty of inspection, the plaintiff is properly nonsuited. Fenderson v. Atlantic City R. Co. (1894) 56 N. J. L. 708.

As illustrating the effect attributed to the neglect of a master to use care in keeping himself acquainted with the condition of certain specific instrumentalities of his business, the following rulings may be referred to:

2. As to the condition of the place of work.

The duty of an employer to use reasonable diligence in seeing that the place where the work of his servant is to be performed is safe for that purpose extends, not only to such risks as are known to him, but to such as he ought to know in the exercise of due diligence, and includes keeping the edge of a pile of ore in such condition that it will not fall upon those ordered to work at its base. Illinois Steel Co. v. Schymanowski (1896) 162 Ill. 447.

An employer who ought by the exercise of reasonable diligence to discover the existence of a defect in the place where the employees are required to work is chargeable with such knowledge. Linton Coal & Min. Co. v. Persons (1894) 11 Ind. App. 264.

A railroad company is liable for an injury to an employee caused by the falling of a tower in which he was employed, by the striking of a car which has run off the track because of a defect therein, although it did not have actual notice of such defect, if it might have known thereof by the exercise of reasonable diligence. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Conway (1896) 87 Ill. App. 155.

The risk of finding a snow drift on the track is one of those assumed by trainmen in climates where snow falls; but a snow-slide, being usually mingled with gravel and rock, is an essentially dangerous obstruction on the track, and if it derails a train the company will be liable to the servant injured by the derailment, unless it can show that it was reasonably careful in discovering the defect, and warning its servants of the danger. Fisher v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. (1892) 22 Or. 533, 16 L. R. A. 519.

A jury is warranted in finding that a railway company was negligent in the maintenance of its tracks, where it had left a derrick dangerously near an overhanging bank of earth, which, as might have been readily seen by anyone who had casually examined it the day before the accident in suit, was liable to fall at any moment, and it actually did fall, knocking down the derrick and bringing a guy which extended across the track into such a position that it swept over the top of a passing train and injured a brakeman. Holden v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1890) 129 Mass. 268, 37 Am. Rep. 343.

A railroad company is guilty of a want of ordinary care to maintain its roadway in good order, if its agents, charged with the duty of inspecting and repairing a bridge, have notice of defects in it, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence would have learned of them, and omit to make repairs; in consequence of which the bridge falls and an employee is injured. Locke v. Eloux City & P. R. Co. (1877) 46 Iowa, 109.

Actual notice to a railroad company that the blocking of a guard rail has become defective through wear is not necessary to render it liable for injury to a switchman through such defect, as it owes him the duty of vigilant and careful inspection. Paine v. Eastern R. Co. (1895) 91 Wis. 340.

A ship is liable for injuries to a stevedore employed by a charterer to discharge her, from the fall of a stanchion whose fastenings were so insecure that upon the removal of the cargo some slight vibration caused its fall, when its conditions were known to those having the vessel in charge, or could have been discovered upon proper inspection, which was not made. The William Branfoot (1892) 8 U. S. App. 129, 62 Fed. Rep. 390, 3 C. C. A. 155.

An employer is responsible to his employee for an injury sustained by the latter from a defect in the building where he works, which the former knew of, or might have known of by the exercise of ordinary care. Clefield v. Browning (1894) 9 Misc. 98.

2. As to the condition of machinery and apparatus.

A master is liable for injuries resulting from defective appliances, where he "knew or might have known, by the exercise of reasonable skill," that they were defective. Union P. R. Co. v. Snyder (1893) 152 U. S. 684, 38 L. ed. 597.

A railway company is liable, as for culpable negligence in allowing machinery to remain out of repair when its condition is brought to its notice, or by proper inspection might be known. Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1885) 116 U. S. 642, 26 L. ed. 755.

An employer is liable for an injury caused by the defective condition of machinery, "if he knew of the defect, or if, under all circumstances, as a reasonable man, he should have discovered, though he did not, their defective condition, or if he negligently remained ignorant of their defective condition." Jones v. Yeager (1872) 2 Dill. 64 (charge to jury).

Where the agents of the employer prior to the accident had received such reports in regard to defective appliances as ought to have put them on their guard, and to have led, by the use of proper diligence, to a knowledge of the facts, the employer must be held to the same liability as if his agents had had actual knowledge. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Shannon (1867) 43 Ill. 338.

In Walsh v. Whiteley (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 371, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 586, 36 Week. Rep. 876, 53 J. P. 38, where the machine which caused the injury had been in use for several years, and it appeared that another form of machine had been brought into use, it was held to be a question for the jury, whether the machine was defective in the sense of being dangerous to the workmen using it, and if it was so defective, whether or not the master, by the exercise of ordinary care, would have known it to be dangerous.

A verdict against a railroad company is properly given where the evidence goes to show that the injury was caused by a defective tool, and that the defect ought to have been known to the company's foreman. Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Blevins (1891) 46 Kan. 370.

Where the evidence tends to show that a brakeman fell from a car owing to the breaking of one of the rungs of a climbing ladder, and the broken rung appears to have been bent by a blow at some previous time, a jury is entitled to find that the bend should have indicated to the company the propriety of examining it, and, if necessary, replacing it. Jones v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1882) 28 Hun. 364.

Where there is evidence tending to prove that a car had been in an unsafe condition for several years before the accident; that the company had set aside the car for repairs on several occasions, and knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have discovered, that the timbers beneath the floor were decayed and rotten, and that the car was unsafe,—a verdict for the plaintiff will not be disturbed. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Branyan (1894) 10 Ind. App. 570.

A railroad company is liable for negligence in permitting a car to be used from which the reach-rod was absent from the brakebeam in front of the wheels, causing the beam to hang lower and farther forward than it otherwise would have done, making it dangerous to brakemen going between cars to uncouple them, where the absence was known, or might have been known, to the company. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Buck (1888) 116 Ind. 566, 2 L. R. A. 520.

In a suit by a brakeman against a railroad company to recover damages for injuries received by the giving way of a defective ladder attached to a car, said accident occurring while he was in the discharge of his ordinary duties as such brakeman, the plaintiff cannot recover unless knowledge of the defect must have been brought home to the defendant, or proof made that it was ignorant of the same through its own negligence or want of care. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Platt (1878) 89 Ill. 141.

An employee of a smelting company cannot recover for an injury resulting from the breaking of a wire cable within a hook socket by which the cable was fastened to a car, which was thereby lowered to and raised from a pit, where the breaking of the cable was due to a defect which could not be seen either before or after the cable was placed in the socket. Quintana v. Consolidated Kansas City Smelting & Ref. Co. (1896) (Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 869.

Whatever may be the responsibility of the manufacturer a master is not liable for injuries to a servant resulting from his selection from an adequate stock of suitable appliances an appliance which was unsuitable for the purpose for which he intended to use it, if such unsuitableness was the result of a defect which could have been detected and provided against with reasonable care on the part of the master. Toohy v. Equitable Gas Co. (1897) 179 Pa. 437.

If a car-brake be so defective as not to operate effectually with proper use, a brakeman injured while setting it, in ignorance of the defect, is entitled to recover of the railway company, if the officers knew, or should, in exercise of proper diligence, have known, of its existence. Texas P. R. Co. v. McAtee (1884) 61 Tex. 695.

A brakeman who while performing his duties was injured by reason of a defective step on a car may recover damages from the company if its officers knew or ought to have known of the defect. Texas P. R. Co. v. Wisenor (1886) 66 Tex. 674.

A master is chargeable with knowledge of a latent defect in a steam drill which might have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable diligence upon his part. Salem Stone & L. Co. v. Tepps (1894) 10 Ind. App. 516.

A finding that an employer was negligent in furnishing an improper or defective jackscrew by the breaking of which his employee was injured is justified by proof that the break had begun before the jackscrew was given, that an inspection would have disclosed it, and that the inspection was not made. Kennedy v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1894) 57 Minn. 227.

A master who carries on an imminently dangerous undertaking—such as the generation and distribution of electricity—is bound to know the character and extent of the danger, and to notify the same to the servant specially and unequivocally, so as to be clearly understood by him. Myhan v. Louisiana Electric Light & P. Co. (1889) 41 La. Ann. 964, 7 L. R. A. 172.

It is the duty of an employer before using a highly dangerous explosive to ascertain and make known to his employees the dangers to be reasonably apprehended from its use; and his ignorance is no excuse if knowledge can be obtained by the exercise of reasonable diligence. Bertha Zinc Co. v. Martin (1895) 93 Va. 791.

4. As to the capacity of servants.

See also IX. post.

The general principle that a servant assumes the risk of injury from the negligence of a fellow servant is subject to the qualification that the master cannot avail himself of this defense where he is himself guilty of negligence in respect to the employment of the defaulting servant. It is a well-established rule that "a master is liable to his servant for an injury caused by the incompetency or want of skill of a fellow servant, whether it existed when the fellow servant was hired, or has come upon him since the hiring, the fellow servant having been in the first instance hired, or afterward continued in the service, with notice or knowledge or the means of knowledge of this lack." Laning v. New York C. R. Co. (1872) 49 N. Y. 521, 10 Am. Rep. 417.

"If, acting through appropriate officers, a railroad company knowingly or negligently employs incompetent servants, it is liable for an injury occasioned to a fellow servant by his incompetency. If it continues in its employment an incompetent servant after his incompetency is known to its officers, or so manifest that its officers, using due care, would have known it, such continuance in its employment is as much a breach of duty and a ground for liability as the original employment of an incompetent servant." Gilman v. Eastern R. Co. (1866) 13 Allen, 433, 90 Am. Dec. 210.

"The same care requisite in hiring a servant in the first instance must still be exercised in continuing him in the service; otherwise the employer will become responsible for his want of care or skill. The employer will be equally liable for the acts of an incompetent or careless servant, when he continues in his employment after a knowledge of such incompetency or carelessness, or when, in the exercise of due care, he should have known it, as if he had been wanting in the same care in hiring." Shanny v. Androscoggin Mills (1876) 66 Me. 420.

Absence of knowledge of the fellow servant's incompetency is not, in itself, an answer to an action for injuries caused by such incompetency, the master's true obligation being to use due care in selecting the servant. Skerritt v. Scallan (1877) 11 Ir. Rep. C. L. 380.

The master's knowledge of the bad reputation for intemperance of a person employed as brakeman on a train is not necessary to render him liable for injuries caused by the brakeman's untidiness, if he was negligent in not knowing of such reputation. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover (1894) 79 Md. 253, 25 L. R. A. 710.

In Hilts v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (1885) 55 Mich. 437, the trial judge was alleged to have erred in instructing the jury as follows, to wit: "There is another ground which I submit to you, as jurors, to say whether or not defendant is liable, and that is whether or not the engineer had been guilty of such acts, showing his intemperance, that the company was negligent in not knowing his bad habits;" but the appellate court denied that there was any error, saying: "The instruction was based upon the well-settled principle of law that it is a duty which masters owe to servants employed by them, that the master will exercise due care in the employment of servants to select those who are competent; and that failure to do so is negligence. In the master, which will render him liable for injury caused by the negligent act of the servant, if occasioned by such incompetency. And this principle extends to the act of the master in retaining an incompetent servant in his employment after knowledge comes to him of the untidiness of the servant for the service in which he is engaged, or of whose untidiness he might have known by the exercise of due diligence or ordinary care."

Ala. 459; New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hughes (1873) 49 Miss. 258; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Harrington (1884) 62 Tex. 597; Texas & P. R. Co. v. Mallon (1885) 65 Tex. 115; American Wire Nail Co. v. Connolly (1893) 8 Ind. App. 398; Nelson v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. (1886) 85 Mo. 599; Kerlin v. Chicago, P. & St. L. R. Co. (1892) 50 Fed. Rep. 185.

In Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co. (1870) 20 Mich. 105, 4 Am. Rep. 364, the court made the following remarks: "From the language employed in some cases it might be supposed that the notice of unfitness, which was to charge the employer, must be nothing else than actual notice; but we are not disposed to question in the least the correctness of the doctrine advanced in the case of Gilman v. Eastern R. Corp. (1866) 10 Allen, 233, 87 Am. Dec. 635, and which put upon the employer the responsibility of negligently employing an unfit person, generally known and reputed to be such, notwithstanding the employer may in fact have been ignorant of such unfitness. The ignorance itself is negligence in a case in which any proper inquiry would have obtained the necessary information, and where the duty to inquire was plainly imperative."

In Cayser v. Taylor (1857) 10 Gray, 274, 277, 69 Am. Dec. 317, the following instruction was held correct: "It is contended that the defendant was negligent in the selection of an incompetent engineer, and negligent in continuing him in his employment. There are two inquiries here: 1. Was the engineer competent or incompetent? 2. If he was not, had the master reason to know it? If he had reason, and if he knowingly, or having good reason to know, and without due care and prudence, employed or continued in his employment such incompetent person, and the accident happened or injury arose by reason of such incompetency, and the plaintiff has satisfied you of this, the burden being on him, he is entitled to recover. If he was not negligent in this respect, or had not reason to know of this incompetency, and the injury did not arise from incompetency, he is not liable on this ground. If it was the careless act of an incompetent engineer, negligently and knowingly employed by the defendant, he would be liable; if it was the careless act of a competent engineer he would not be liable."

In an action by a brakeman against his employer to recover damages for personal injuries caused by the negligence of the conductor of a log train upon which plaintiff was employed, a verdict and judgment for the plaintiff will be sustained, where the evidence tended strongly to show that the conductor was a manifestly incompetent servant for the duties he had to perform, and that the fact of his incompetency was known or ought to have been known to the defendants when they employed him as conductor. Huntsinger v. Trexler (1897) 131 Pa. 497.

1. General statements.

The complement of the principle laid down in the cases cited in the preceding section is that the master is not liable for injuries which his servant receives through an imperfection in the instrumentalities of the business unless he knew or ought to have known of the existence of that imperfection. This rule which makes proof of knowledge on the master's part, or its equivalent, culpable ignorance, a prerequisite to the maintenance of an action by the servant, is a necessary deduction from the doctrine that the standard to which the question whether the master is derelict in regard to his duties is referable is that of ordinary care. The master, in other words, does not insure the servant against injury from the perils of the employment. Gutridge v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 94 Mo. 408.

In Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1871) 61 Ill. 162, the court said: "The rule is settled that, while a railway is bound to use the degree of diligence just stated in furnishing to the public a safe roadbed, yet it is not an absolute insurer, and cannot be held liable for defects of which such diligence would not inform it. Actual knowledge of the defect is not necessary. It is sufficient if the company might have been informed by the use of such diligence as the law imposes upon it, but where it did not know and could not have informed itself of the defect, we do not see how it can be held responsible."

The master merely stipulates that he will use due diligence in seeing that the appliances of his business shall not be of such quality that a prudent man would abstain from using them.

"An employer does not undertake absolutely with his employees for the sufficiency or safety of the implements and facilities furnished for their work, but only for the exercise of reasonable care in that respect, and where injury to an employee results from a defect in the implements furnished, knowledge of the defect must be brought home to the employer, or proof given that he omitted the exercise of proper care to discover it." Devlin v. Smith (1882) 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311.

"If the injury arises from a defect or insufficiency in the machinery or implements furnished to the servant by the master, knowledge of the defect or insufficiency must be brought home to the master, or proof given that he was ignorant of the same, through his own negligence and want of proper care; in other words, it must be shown that he either knew or ought to have known the defects which caused the injury." Wright v. New York C. R. Co. (1862) 25 N. Y. 582.

"The rule is unquestioned that, in order to charge a master with the consequences of an injury resulting to the servant from the use of defective machinery or other appliances with which the servant is at work it must appear that the master knew of the defective character of such machinery or appliances, or in the exercise of reasonable or ordinary care and diligence ought to have known of the same." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Swarts (1897) 55 Kan. 235.

"If the servant claims damages from the master for injuries received on account of defective premises, buildings, machinery, or appliances, he must allege and prove that the unfitness or the defect which caused the injury was known to the master, or was such as, with reasonable diligence and attention to his business, he ought to have known." Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Adams (1896) 103 Ind. 151.

"When there is no notice to the master of defects, and no blame imputable in not discovering them, he is not liable, if injury results to his employee therefrom." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Harper (1884) 44 Ark. 524.

"The condition of the implements or the premises must be such as to suggest to an ordinarily careful man that there is danger before an employer can be charged with negligence in not providing against it." Nelson v. Allen Paper Car-Wheel Co. (1880) 29 Fed. Rep. 840.

"Where an employee seeks to recover damages for injuries resulting from insufficiency of any of the machinery or instrumentalities furnished by the railroad company, it will not only devolve upon such employee to prove such insufficiency, but it will also devolve upon him to show either that the railroad company had notice of the defects, imperfections, or insufficiencies complained of, or that, by the exercise of reasonable and ordinary care and diligence, it might have obtained such notice." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wagner (1886) 33 Kan. 606.

Injuries resulting from defective appliances are regarded as unforeseen accidents where the appliances were originally selected with care and there was no reason to suspect that they had deteriorated. Kelley v. Forty-second Street, M. & St. N. Ave. R. Co. (1890) 58 Hun, 93.

It is also a general principle that an employer cannot be held liable as for a breach of his duty to instruct unless he knew, actually or constructively, that the servant was unable to comprehend the danger of his work without instruction. Klochinski v. Shores Lumber Co. (1896) 93 Wis. 417. [See note on the Master's Duty to Instruct a Servant, to be shortly published in this series.]

The right to damages in actions brought by servants for injuries resulting from use of defective implements depends on proof that injury was caused by their use, and that defendant was aware of the defect, or reasonable care was not exercised to disclose the defect. Covey v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1885) 86 Mo. 635.

The following passage from 2 Thompson, Neg. p. 992, has been quoted with approval in Stiles v. Richie (1896) 8 Colo. App. 393: "If the master knew, or ought to have known, and the servant did not know, and was not bound to know of its existence [the danger] the liability of the master—the servant having been otherwise in the exercise of due care—is fixed, and it is equally true, in every case, that unless the master knew of the defect which subsequently produces the injury, or was under a duty of knowing it, he cannot be held liable; for, in the absence of such knowledge or duty of knowing, there is nothing of which negligence can be predicated."

In the following cases, also, constructive and actual knowledge are coupled together in stating the rule as to the facts which must be established by the servant in order to render the employer liable: Hobbs v. Stauer (1885) 62 Wis. 108; Toonan v. Brockway (1864) 3 Robt. 74 (1864) 28 How. Pr. 472; Golts v. Milwaukee, L. & W. R. Co. (1899) 76 Wis. 136; Klupp v. United Ice Lines (1891) 39 N. Y. S. R. 782; Myers v. American Steel Barge Co. (1896) 64 Ill. App. 187; Bannon v. Sanden (1896) 68 Ill. App. 164; Columbus, C. & I. C. R. Co. v. Troesch (1878) 68 Ill. 545, 18 Am. Rep. 578; Ohio Valley R. Co. v. McKinley (1895) 17 Ky. L. Rep. 1028; Wells v. Coe (1886) 9 Colo. 159; Doling v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. (1893) 73 Hun, 270; Prentiss v. Kent Furniture Mfg. Co. (1896) 63 Mich. 478.

The same principle prevails, even though from the nature of the accident it may readily be concluded that some defect did in fact exist. Sack v. Dolse (1890) 35 Ill. App. 636; Statling Effect of De Graff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1879) 70 N. Y. 125.

Thus, where a corporation believed, and was justified in believing, that a certain quantity of grain could be safely stored on a floor of its building, the fact that the floor gave way without warning, is not sufficient to render the corporation liable in damages to one of its employees who was injured by the fall. Dillon v. Sixth Ave. R. Co. (1882) 16 Jones & S. 283.

So, the mere fact that a millowner furnishes an employee operating a circular saw with some timber that is uneven and knotty, in sawing which the employee is killed, does not constitute negligence on the part of the employer, unless he knew or should have known by the exercise of ordinary care that the timber was dangerous to be used. Hooper v. Snead Iron Works (1890) 12 Ky. L. Rep. 488.

In The France (1894) 20 U. S. App. 212, 59 Fed. Rep. 479, 8 C. C. A. 185, (Rev'g (1893) 53 Fed. Rep. 843), a steamship was held not liable for injuries to a fireman engaged in filling and hooking bags of ashes to a chain for removal from the stokehole, from the giving way of the handle of an ash-bag, where the bag was new, apparently sufficiently strong, and no defect had been observed in it by anyone, but which was fastened to the chain by passing one of its two handles through the other and hooking that handle to the chain without any reason why the hook should not be passed through both, and the chain slipped off the drum of the winch, jerking the bag violently so that the handle gave way. The court based its decision on, (1) the general principle that the existence of a defect is not necessarily inferable from the failure of the appliance; (2) the failure of the plaintiff to prove that the defendant knew that there was any danger; and (3) that the cause of the accident was apparently the unnecessary strain put upon the appliance by the plaintiff's co-servants.

Instructions are erroneous which permit a jury to infer that a verdict for the plaintiff may be based merely upon the fact of the injuries having been received without proof of negligence. Lincoln Street R. Co. v. Cox (1896) 48 Neb. 807.

Where a servant is injured by the collapse of a wooden bridge which is alleged to have been caused by a decayed condition of the timbers, the defendant is entitled to an instruction that, in order to charge him with liability, it is necessary for the plaintiff to show that the decay in the bridge, if it fell from decay, was known, by some notice or otherwise, to the president and directors of the road. Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468.

Compare Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1871) 61 Ill. 162, where the following instruction given for the plaintiff was declared to be erroneous: "In this case if the jury believe from the evidence that John Conroy was a fireman in the employ of the defendant, and was in the line of his duty on an engine crossing the bridge in question; and if they further believe from the evidence that the timbers of the bridge were decayed and unsafe and for that reason broke down, and that the death of John Conroy was occasioned by injuries received by the breaking of said bridge, and that the said John Conroy left next of kin,—then the defendants are liable and the jury should find for the plaintiff."

An instruction to the effect that "if the evidence shows that the plaintiff was injured through any defect in the construction of the pipes in consequence of their being out of repair or in an unsafe condition, then he is entitled to recover, if he used due care while attempting to blow out the pipe," is erroneous for the reason that it ignores the principle that to charge appellant it is essential to show knowledge, or that knowledge might have been obtained, by the use of reasonable diligence, of the defect in the pipe which caused the injury." East St. Louis Pkg. & P. Co. v. Hightower (1879) 92 Ill. 130.

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Platt (1878) 80 Ill. 441, an instruction was held erroneous because it omitted to state that knowledge of the defect which was the efficient cause of the injury was a necessary ingredient of negligence on the part of the employer.

In Columbus, C. & I. C. R. Co. v. Troesch (1873) 68 Ill. 545, 18 Am. Rep. 578, an instruction which declares that the master impliedly warrants the fitness of his appliances, and ignored the question whether he knew or ought to have known of the condition of the appliances, was pronounced erroneous.

But such an instruction is not a ground for reversing a judgment for the servant, where other instructions are given which state the law accurately. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Ingraham (1875) 77 Ill. 309.

Where there is no evidence of knowledge, actual or constructive, on the master's part, a demurrer to the evidence is properly sustained. Carruthers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1895) 55 Kan. 600.

A demurrer to the evidence should be sustained when the testimony fails to show any actual notice to any servant, whose duty it is to look after the place of work, or any negligence in not discovering the existence of the danger which caused the injury. Burnes v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (1895) 129 Mo. 11.

In Humphreys v. Newport News & M. V. Co. (1899) 33 W. Va. 135, it was held that a demurrer to the evidence should have been sustained where there was no testimony to show how long before an injury was received through the breaking of a rope it had been so weakened by wear as to be unsafe, nor whether the company had omitted the necessary inspection.

The complaint should be dismissed where the master had no knowledge of the defect, and there is nothing to charge him with knowledge. Nelson v. Dubois (1882) 11 Daly, 127.

Where there is no evidence from which the master's knowledge of the dangerous condition can be inferred, the plaintiff should be nonsuited. Clough v. Hoffman (1890) 132 Pa. 626.

Or a verdict directed for the defendant. Melchert v. Robert Smith India Pale Ale Brewing Co. (1891) 140 Pa. 448.

Where there is no evidence that a master employed incompetent persons to put in a steam-pipe, or, by the exercise of reasonable care, ought to have discovered that it was insecurely put in, the plaintiff should be nonsuited. Hobbs v. Stauer (1885) 62 Wis. 108.

A servant is properly nonsuited in an action to recover for injuries from the bursting of an emery wheel in the latter's works, where there is no evidence of improper construction or setting up the machine, nor of any defect in the wheel known, or which ought to have been known, to the master. Simpson v. Pittsburgh Locomotive Works (1890) 139 Pa. 245.

Evidence which merely shows that one of the defendants superintended the work of putting into place a steam-pipe from which the plaintiff's injury resulted is insufficient to support a finding that he knew the condition in which the pipe was left. Hobbs v. Stauer (1885) 62 Wis. 108.

A judgment for plaintiff should be reversed where no evidence has been given that a proper inspection was not made. Essex County Electric Co. v. Kelly (1894) 57 N. J. L. 100; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Gaines (1885) 46 Ark. 555; De Graff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1879) 70 N. Y. 125. In the last case the court said:

"We may imagine several causes, (1), from an original defect in the iron, or (2), in its manufacture, or (3), by reason of weakness, and ordinary decay by use, or (4), by getting misplaced on the trip on which the accident occurred. There is no evidence that ordinary care and observation would have discovered all and either of these defects if they had existed, and they must have so found, as they could not have singled out a defect which ordinary care would have discovered, because the particular defect was entirely unknown."

In De Graff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1879) 76 N. Y. 125, the court, in setting aside a verdict on the ground that it was not proved what the defect was, nor that a proper examination had not been made, nor that an examination would have discovered the defect which caused the breaking, said: "Upon the next proposition, that the exercise of ordinary care would have discovered the defect, and that the defendant neglected to exercise such care, a careful examination has failed to satisfy me that the evidence was sufficient to warrant a verdict. In the first place, assuming a defect, there is no evidence what it was or the nature of it. The car was in a train going west, and it does not appear that anyone ever saw the chain afterwards, except the person who took the plaintiff's place after the accident, and he only looked at it with a lantern at a station, and saw that it was broken. There is some evidence, although slight, that the car did not belong to the defendant. There was an entire absence of evidence as to the nature and character of the defect, or the cause of the breaking."

In Cherokee & P. Coal & Min. Co. v. Britton (1896) 8 Kan. App. 292; a general verdict for a plaintiff injured by the fall of the roof of a tunnel was held to be inconsistent with a special finding (1) that there was no evidence to show that the rock was known to be loose, and (2) that the miners and other employees considered the place safe.

In an action by an employee against his employer for injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, a special finding that no agent of the employer knew of the latter's unfitness and recklessness, will not defeat a general verdict in favor of the plaintiff, inasmuch as such a finding does not rebut the presumption that notice will be presumed, where the employee is so grossly and notoriously unfit that not to know of his unfitness is negligence. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. v. Doyle (1877) 18 Kan. 58.

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Swarts (1897) 58 Kan. 235, it was contended "that the evidence failed to establish negligence upon the part of the railroad company, and also that, by two special findings of the jury, it was acquitted of negligence. These findings are as follows: 'Q. Did it not (referring to the hole), by its appearance indicate that it had been in that condition for a considerable time? A. We cannot determine how long. Q. Did defendant have any knowledge of defect in the track or hole, if any there was, at the time of the accident? A. We do not know.' The court, however, declared that these answers, under former decisions construing others of a like kind, were to be taken as negative to the existence of the facts necessary to charge the company with liability, and were therefore equal in effect to an affirmative finding that the company had no knowledge of the hole in its track, and also that such hole had not been there for such length of time as to charge the company with negligence in allowing the same."

Pursuing the same plan as that adopted in the preceding section, we shall now proceed to cite a number of cases illustrating the effect of the general principle in its application to the various special duties of the master.

2. As to place of work.

In Feltham v. England (1866) 1 L. R. 2 Q. B. 33, 36 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 14, 15 Week. Rep. 151, 7 Best & S. 676, one of the grounds of the decision was that no evidence was produced which showed that the defendant knew, or ought to have known, that certain piers, one of which fell and hurt the plaintiff, were insufficient for the use to which they were applied.

A railway servant, in order to recover damages for an injury caused by a defective road-bed, must show that the officers charged with the duty of seeing that it was in good condition had notice that it was defective, and having such notice neglected to repair it. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Dunham (1878) 49 Tex. 181; S. P. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Binkopaki (1897) (Ill. App.) 2 Chicago L. J. Wkly. 438.

"An imperfect connection of the track may have existed in consequence of internal and invisible defects in the materials employed which have escaped the closest scrutiny and set at naught the exercise of the utmost care and diligence of the company." Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Love (1858) 10 Ind. 554.

In Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Adams (1886) 105 Ind. 151, the court said: "If the case before us is to rest alone upon the alleged negligence of appellant as connected with the alleged defective rail, then it must be shown that the rail was so defective when put in place by appellant, or, if it afterwards became worn and defective, that appellant knew of the defective and dangerous condition, or that it was defective and dangerous for such a length of time, that appellant might and ought to have known of it by the exercise of reasonable attention, care, and diligence."

A railroad company is not liable for an accident by which an employee's foot is caught by a splinter on the inside of a railroad track or rail, "unless it had notice of the defect, or, in the exercise of reasonable care, should have known of it, or have apprehended it to be dangerous." Doyle v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1889) 42 Minn. 79.

Where there is no conflict of evidence as to the care and skill used in the construction and maintenance of a bridge, the inspection to which it was subjected, the adequate skill and competency of the employees engaged in that specified duty, the experience of defendant, both in the construction and duration of such structures, and the absolute want of any notice to defendant or any of its employees, of any defect, real or suspected, in a bridge which broke down, the conclusion is inevitable, that the defendant was not guilty of the want of such care in respect to its employees, as it was their duty to bestow upon its officers, and it is the duty of the court to take the case from the jury, and hold that, on the established facts, the plaintiff cannot recover. Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, 474.

Where the evidence does not show that any particular method of moving the large driving wheels of locomotives is generally known and practised in machine shops, or known to the defendant himself, it is error to leave it to the jury to say whether the defendant was negligent in not instructing the plaintiff how such a wheel could be moved with safety. Richmond Locomotive & Mach. Works v. Ford (1897; Va.) 27 S. E. 509.

A railroad employee assumes the risk of a plank at a crossing gradually working loose and striking the footboard of an engine upon which he is riding, where the defective condition of the plank progressed unnoticed until the moment of injury. Peoria, D. & E. R. Co. v. Hardwick (1893) 53 Ill. App. 161.

In Skidmore v. West Virginia & P. R. Co. (1895) 41 W. Va. 293, a section hand while engaged with other section hands in clearing away a wreck under the supervision of a section boss and the overseer of the road was injured by the falling out of the bottom of an overturned tender in consequence of the fracture of the bolts which held it in its place. The court held that the plaintiff could not recover, for the reason that the supervisor or boss could not have discovered the existence of such a danger without finding some means of actually reaching the fractured bolts, and that they were manifestly ignorant of the existence of any such danger, inasmuch as they had been working in the place occupied by plaintiff when he was injured, a few moments before the accident occurred.

A railroad engineer is not negligent towards a switchman on a switch engine, so as to charge the company with liability for injuries to the latter, in running by an oil box near the track but far enough away to permit the engine to pass safely, unless he knows or has reason to believe that the switchman is in such a position that he may be injured in passing such box. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Bouldin (1895) 110 Ala. 185.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries received by an employee engaged in the removal of trestles, due to the insecurity of timber apparently solid and fixed, over which the employee was obliged to pass, and which, giving way, threw him to the ground below, in the absence of knowledge, actual or constructive, of such insecurity on the part of the company. Moore v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1895) 167 Pa. 495.

An action by an employee injured by the giving way of a wooden slat in a ladder which he was descending should be dismissed where the evidence does not indicate what the defect was or that the ladder was not safe when built, and does not show any defect in the slat or its fastening which would have been revealed upon inspection. Schorning v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. (1891) 38 N. Y. S. R. 27.

Where, in an action for personal injuries sustained by an employee by falling into a well-hole, there is no evidence that the lid of the latter was left in an unsafe condition at the time of the accident, by the defendant, or by anyone for such a length of time before the accident that the defendant ought to have known its condition, the verdict should be in defendant's favor. Clough v. Hoffman (1890) 132 Pa. 626.

A journeyman baker cannot recover against his employer for an injury caused by the falling in of a recently built oven, constructed by the lessor of defendant, and of whose defective condition defendant had no knowledge, actual or constructive. Nason v. West (1886) 78 Me. 253.

In order to charge the owner or operator of a coal mine with negligence because of the falling of loose rock or earth from the roof of the mine, he must have had previous knowledge of the defective condition of the roof, or "by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence," have been able to discover such defective condition. Cherokee & P. Coal & Min. Co. v. Britton (1896) 3 Kan. App. 292.

Owners of a coal mine are not liable for the death of an employee caused by the falling of a quantity of coal and slate from the roof of an entry or lateral tunnel, where the falling took place without the warning signs and dropping of coal that usually precede it, and those who made the usual and necessary tests deemed it suitable and safe, although it was deemed unsafe by some of the employees who kept their 41 L. R. A.

opinions to themselves. Southwest Improv. Co. v. Andrew (1889) 86 Va. 270.

Injuries received by a miner through striking his pick against a piece of giant powder in the loose rock thrown down by a blast, must be regarded as the result of an unforeseen and unavoidable accident, where the presence of the powder could not have become known to the employer's representative in the exercise of reasonable diligence. Kelley v. Cable Co. (1889) 8 Mont. 440.

A master is not guilty of personal negligence rendering him liable for injuries to an employee from an explosion of a blast which he was justified in believing had been before exploded, because he sent the employee to work about the hole which was being excavated, and sent another employee who had supervision of the work to another place, although the latter was apparently reluctant to leave the hole, the defendant having no reason to suppose that the safety of anyone was dependent on his continuing the work. O'Neill v. O'Leary (1895) 164 Mass. 387.

A master cannot be rendered liable on the ground of negligence by showing that the work which the servant was directed to do was essential to the safety of a ship on which the servant was employed by the master, and that he permitted the ship to leave port without its being done, and without having on board a skilled machinist to do it, and that it was outside the scope of the servant's employment, and that he was unfit to do it, unless it is also shown that the work was dangerous, and that the master knew or ought to have known that it was so. Smyly v. Glasgow & L. Steam Packet Co. (1868) 16 Week. Rep. 483.

A contractor for the building of a sewer is not liable for the death of a workman caused by the caving in of a bank, which resulted from the bursting of one or other of two water pipes running parallel with and within 2 feet of the sewer, filling the trench with water, where the existence of one of such pipes was altogether unknown to the defendant, and he was not aware that the other, although laid by him, was defective, and there was no negligence in the manner of bracing the bank. Hoskins v. Stewart (1890) 57 Hun, 380.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries to an employee from being exposed to poisonous gases generated by coal fires in its roundhouse, whose effect is enhanced by the admission of extreme cold air, where it was ignorant of the unwholesome and dangerous condition of the building, and could not by the exercise of ordinary care have known of the danger. Maitland v. Cleveland, L. & W. R. Co. (1896) 3 Ohio Leg. News, 289.

An employer is not liable for an injury to an employee sent to remove a cap from a force pump used in applying whitewash to premises, caused by whitewash blown into his face and eyes by the compressed air after he had removed the cap, where the pump was selected by a person having experience in the use of such apparatus, and was apparently in good condition. Kelley v. Forty-second Street M. & St. N. Ave. R. Co. (1890) 58 Hun, 93.

The owner of a vessel is not liable for the death of a member of the crew by falling into the water from an opening in the ship's side because of defective appliances to close it, in the absence of knowledge of the defect or of facts equivalent to such knowledge. Geoghegan v. Atlas S. S. Co. (1893) 3 Misc. 224.

A railroad company is not liable to an employee for injuries caused by defects in a bridge unless the company "was ignorant of its condition through its negligence or want of proper care." Faulkner v. Erie R. Co. (1867) 49 Barb. 324.

An employer is not liable for an injury to a servant caused by the breaking of an electric-light pole due to a defect therein, where the most careful scrutiny would not have disclosed the defect. Essex County Electric Co. v. Kelly (1894) 57 N. J. L. 100.

An instruction is correct which tells the jury that the plaintiff can recover if he was placed under the orders of defendant's foreman and directed by him to ascend a ladder which the foreman knew, or, by the exercise of ordinary care, would have known, to be insecurely braced, and the plaintiff himself neither knew, nor by the exercise of ordinary care could have known, of such insecure bracing. Herdler v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. (1896) 136 Mo. 3.

In some cases the principle that an employer is not liable for exposing a servant to unknown perils in the place of work has been considered with special reference to the servant's want of capacity for performing the work he is directed to do.

Crowley v. Appleton (1888) 148 Mass. 98, was an action to recover for personal injuries occasioned to the plaintiff, while in the defendant's employ, by being placed by him in a position of peculiar danger. Evidence was given that the plaintiff was subject to epileptic fits, and was ignorant of the fact. The judge, after instructing the jury that the plaintiff must show that he was subject to such fits, that he did not know this, that the defendant did, and further that the defendant "knew or had cause to know that plaintiff did not know anything about it," amplified the last clause, stating that, whether the defendant knew that the plaintiff was ignorant of his malady might be proved by circumstantial, as well as by direct, evidence. The plaintiff excepted to this statement, and, without asking for any instruction as to the defendant's duty if only he "had cause to know" the plaintiff's ignorance, requested an instruction making the defendant responsible if the plaintiff was ignorant of, and the defendant was acquainted with, the malady, without regard to the inquiry as to whether the defendant knew or had cause to know the plaintiff's ignorance. Held, that the instruction as given was correct, and that the one requested was properly refused.

In Lalor v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1869) 52 Ill. 401, 4 Am. Rep. 616, the declaration alleged that the deceased was employed about the depot grounds and freight house as a common laborer, specially for the purpose of loading and unloading the freight cars, at monthly wages, and for no other or different purpose whatever; that, while he was engaged in loading a freight car he was ordered by the superintendent, who directed affairs of the company about the depot, to couple a freight car with other cars attached to a locomotive, contrary to the special engagement of the deceased, and to do which he was unversed and inexperienced, which fact was well known to the superintendent; and that while so engaged, having to go between the cars for the purpose, the engine was so carelessly managed as to bring the cars together with great force, and while he was so between them, by means of which he was crushed to death. The court held the complaint not to be demurrable, saying: "The deceased engaged to perform work only ordinarily hazardous; he was compelled to do other work extrahazardous, by which he lost his life, the superintendent knowing he was unskilled and unacquainted with the manner of doing such work when he ordered deceased to perform it. Admitting the deceased was in the same general service as the superintendent, his sphere, however, was a special one, and so subordinate as to compel him to yield implicit obedience to the command of the superintendent. The company was constructively present, by and through this officer, and must be charged accordingly. It was, then, by the direct command of the company, the deceased was exposed to this peril, and one out of the line of the business he had contracted to perform."

Compare also the ruling that the owner of a blast furnace is not liable for injuries to an employee from the inhalation of gas not sufficient in quantity to affect an ordinary man, because the lungs of such employee were over-sensitive from previous illness, where his employer had no reason to suppose that he was not sufficiently strong to endure the gas without risk. Farlin v. Finfrouck (1895) 85 Ill. App. 174.

3. As to machinery.

To support an allegation of negligence on the part of the employer with reference to insufficient strength or construction of some portion of a machine, and its being unskillfully applied to the purpose of sustaining a weight, "it is necessary, not only to show that the machine was insufficient and that this deficiency did not arise from any inherent, secret defect, but that it was known, or might by the exercise of due skill and attention have been known, to the employer." Weems v. Mathieson (1861) 4 Macq. H. L. Cas. 25.

As between a railroad company and its employees, the railroad company is not necessarily negligent in the use of defective machinery, not obviously defective, but it is negligence in such cases only where it has notice of the defects, or where it has failed to exercise reasonable and ordinary diligence in discovering them, and in remedying them. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wagner (1885) 33 Kan. 666.

The right of the servant to recover for injuries incurred in the use of defective machinery depends on proof that the injuries were so incurred, and that "the master was aware of the defect, or that the use of reasonable care on his part would have disclosed the defect." Covey v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1885) 86 Mo. 635; Following Elliott v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. (1878) 67 Mo. 272.

A railroad company is not liable to a yard switchman familiar with the duties and dangers of coupling because of an injury resulting from a defective spring in a draw-bar, of which neither it nor any of its employees had knowledge, actual or constructive. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wagner (1885) 33 Kan. 660.

The employer of a charwoman who cut her hand upon a piece of glass in a washtub was held not liable without proof that he knew or had reason to suspect that the glass was in the tub, where she herself procured the tub from the washroom and poured some of the water into it, although the employer's wife also brought water from a stove and poured it into the tub. Flynn v. Beebe (1868) 98 Mass. 576.

An employee assumes the risk of an accident resulting from a cause not discoverable in advance, when there is no visible defect in any part of the machinery, or knowledge of defect on the part of those using it, or of his employer. Bradbury v. Kingston Coal Co. (1893) 157 Pa. 231.

A master is not liable for injuries to a servant who fell into a vat of boiling dye, because of the breaking of a fork which he was using to press down the material in process of dyeing, where the defect could not be seen on examination, and the fork would have been considered by a careful man safe to use at the time. Mc-

Avoy v. Pennsylvania Woolen Co. (1891) 140 Pa. 1.

The mere fact that the brakes on a coal car were out of order at the time an employee thereon was injured is insufficient to render the employer liable, unless he had an opportunity for knowledge of such defects, or should have known of them. Mixter v. Imperial Coal Co. (1893) 152 Pa. 395.

A master is not liable for injury to an employee caused by the breaking of machinery or tools, due to a defect therein, unless he either knew or ought to have known of such defect. Myers v. American Steel Barge Co. (1896) 64 Ill. App. 187.

A shipowner is not liable where an eye-bolt countersunk in the deck of a ship, and apparently in sound condition, gives way owing to a fracture below the surface of the deck. The Flowergate (1897) 31 Fed. Rep. 762.

An employer is not liable for an accident to a servant resulting from the use of a defective tool, where it was originally in good condition, in the absence of notice that it subsequently became unsafe. Louisville, E. & St. L. Consol. R. Co. v. Allen (1893) 47 Ill. App. 465.

A master is not liable for the breaking of a rope, where it is not discolored and there is nothing whatever in its appearance to suggest a suspicion of its unsoundness. Erskine v. Chino Valley Beet-Sugar Co. (1895) 71 Fed. Rep. 270.

In Bradbury v. Kingston Coal Co. (1893) 157 Pa. 281, the breaking of a wire pin which caused an engineer to lose control of the throttle of his engine, resulting indirectly in an injury to a miner descending the shaft of a mine was held to be one of the ordinary risks of employment by the workman, where the pin was not known to be defective, but for seven years had continuously and successfully served its use without any change, repair, substitution, or visible defect, and gave no external indication of defect up to the time of the accident.

In the following cases the absence of constructive knowledge is relied upon in connection with two other defenses:

A railroad company is not liable for injuries to a fireman through the turning of a step upon the engine while he was carefully alighting from the moving engine, where the accident resulted from his unnecessarily leaving the engine while in motion, or the defect was not discoverable on inspection, and the employer had no notice thereof, or the accident was due to the failure of the engineer to discover or report that the step was out of order. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Patton (1894) 61 Fed. Rep. 259, 9 C. C. A. 437.

A street-car company is not liable for injuries to a boy in its employ engaged in driving horses attached to a car, by his falling upon the track, owing to the horses and those of a team met becoming excited and the negligence of a motorman handling such car, where he was not required or expected to ride upon the car, and the lines were not defective for driving upon the ground, and it had no notice or knowledge that the horses were likely to become excited. Consolidated Street R. Co. v. Maier (1893) 9 Ohio C. C. 268.

4. As to servants.

To render a master chargeable for retaining a careless servant, it must be shown that the master knew of the acts of carelessness, or was culpably ignorant thereof. Huffman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1883) 78 Mo. 50.

Or, as the rule has also been stated, incompetence of an employee whose negligence causes the death of a fellow servant does not render the employer liable at the time of the hiring, unless he knew that the servant was incompetent, or retained him in the service after notice of such incompetency. Reiser v. Pennsylvania Co. (1892) 152 Pa. 38.

"Railroad companies are not required to employ skilled engineers as firemen, and, if it is the prevailing custom of engineers to leave the firemen in charge of their engines when switching or similar work is to be done, then it is to be presumed that brakemen, when they engage or continue in their employment with the knowledge of the custom, assume the additional hazard which the custom involves, and can be entitled to a compensation from the company for injury caused by a fireman's incompetent management of an engine only when his fitness was below what ought to be required of firemen, and when the fact of unfitness was known, or ought reasonably to have been known, to the master mechanic or other like representative of the company." Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kelly (1894) 24 U. S. App. 103, 63 Fed. Rep. 407.

The law presumes that the duty of the master in selecting proper servants was performed; and before a servant can recover he is bound to prove, not only that the fellow servant by whose negligence he was injured had previously been negligent in the discharge of his duties, but that the defendant knew of his negligence, or was negligent in not ascertaining it. Wall v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1889) 54 Hun. 454.

A steam-ferry company is not liable for the death of an officer of the machinery on a ferry boat, caused by the alleged negligence of the engineer and his starting the machinery without warning the deceased, on the ground that the engineer, although skillful and competent, was at times unreliable because of drinking liquor, unless the company knew or had the means of knowing of his habits and consequent unreliability. Stevens v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. (1893) 100 Cal. 554.

To the same effect, see Kindel v. Hall (1896) 8 Colo. App. 63; Crew v. St. Louis, K. & N. W. R. Co. (1884) 20 Fed. Rep. 87; Stevens v. San Francisco & N. P. R. Co. (1893) 100 Cal. 554; Bogard v. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. (1885) 100 Ind. 491; S. P. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Stupak (1890) 108 Ind. 1; Cincinnati, H. & I. R. Co. v. Maine C. R. Co. (1879) 70 Me. 60, 35 Am. Rep. 297.

It has been held error to refuse an instruction to the effect that an employer is not liable for injuries due to the incompetence of a fellow servant unless he knew, or ought to have known, of such incompetence. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kelly (1894) 24 U. S. App. 103, 63 Fed. Rep. 407.

A locomotive engineer's opinion, that if he had obeyed the order of the yard master to place his engine on the main track when a coming train was past due he would have gotten into trouble, is inadmissible to show that the company was negligent in keeping the yardmaster in its employment, unless the case had been brought to the knowledge of its officers. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert (1881) 46 Mich. 176.

The Pennsylvania mine law of 1885, providing that a person employed at an engine shall be a sober and competent person, has not changed the common-law rule that an employer's liability, in so far as it depends on the incompetence of a servant, is referred to the question whether he was aware of such incompetence or not. Mulhern v. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. (1894) 161 Pa. 270.

IV. Rule when the dangerous condition is due to the act of a stranger or of a fellow servant or to the operation of some abnormal physical force.

The cases cited in the last subdivision relate to perils arising out of imperfections which either existed at the time the instrumentalities were brought into use, or which supervened after such use began, as the result of a gradual or sudden deterioration in the quality of the instrumentalities themselves. The same principles are a fortiori, applicable where that dangerous condition is created by the positive act of some responsible agent, whether a stranger to the contract of service or not, or by the operation of physical forces beyond the master's control.

On the one hand, the fact that the abnormal conditions are due to the act of a stranger is no defense, where the master has full knowledge thereof, and the danger which is threatened, for a considerable time before the servant received his injury. Erslew v. New Orleans & N. E. R. Co. (1896) 49 La. Ann. 86, where a steam-railway company was held to be negligent in permitting an electric street-car company to so construct and maintain over its tracks a guy wire that it endangered the lives of its servants and employees.

It is the duty of a railroad company to see that its locomotive engines after their runs are left in a place of safety. If left where they are liable to be put in motion by the careless, negligent, or wilful act of outside parties, it is as much the duty of the railroad company to see that they are properly guarded to prevent accidents from occurring as it is to see that a sufficient number of employees are put on board the trains set in motion by its own orders. Southern P. Co. v. Lafferty (1893) 15 U. S. App. 193, 57 Fed. Rep. 536, 6 C. C. A. 474.

Hence, a railroad company is equally liable for suffering a structure to remain in dangerous proximity to its track, after notice of its position, as if its own agents had originally placed it there. Chicago & I. R. Co. v. Russell (1878) 91 Ill. 298, 33 Am. Rep. 54.

So, the failure of a railway company to discover and remove within a reasonable time a dangerous object overhanging or projecting near its track is its negligence, and will render it liable for injuries to a brakeman resulting therefrom, although the projection was placed there by the negligence of a fellow servant. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Hohn (1892) 1 Tex. Civ. App. 36.

In this case the refusal of a special charge that, if plaintiff was struck by timbers of a temporary scaffolding erected by the employees of defendant in order to rebuild or repair a tank, and no part of the permanent structure, then the jury would find for the defendant, because the negligence of the employees who constructed the temporary scaffolding was the negligence of fellow servants was held proper. The court said the company owed duties to its employees, not only in the construction or repair of the tank, but also in the keeping of its track cleared of dangerous obstructions. And that whether the negligence of which the workmen were guilty in putting the timber so near the track was originally imputable to the company or not (as a failure to observe its duty to furnish to its servants a reasonably safe place at which to work), it would be culpable negligence in the company to allow so dangerous a contrivance to remain in such position after it had discovered its presence, or ought, by the exercise of proper care, to have done so.

So, a master may be liable for injury to a servant by an obstruction placed in a walk which the servant was required to use, by an independent contractor, if the master, or any servant whose duty it was to look after the safety of the way, had notice of it, or if it had been there so long that reasonable care in the inspection of the way would have disclosed it. Burnes v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (1895) 129 Mo. 41.

So, a railroad company is not relieved from liability for personal injuries to an employee, occasioned by the defective condition of a bridge, by the fact that such condition was caused by an unusual flood which could not have been ordinarily and reasonably anticipated, when it has had time, in the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, to discover the injury to the bridge and to prevent the accident. Knahtia v. Oregon Short-Line & U. N. R. Co. (1891) 21 Or. 136.

On the other hand, a railroad company is not liable for the unlawful acts of third parties in placing obstructions upon its track without its knowledge or consent, unless its negligence has in some way induced the placing of obstructions on the track. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Slatery (1890) 57 Kan. 490.

So, a master is not liable to his servant for injuries caused by a temporary obstruction placed on a walk which the servant was required to use, by one with whom the master had contracted for the performance of certain work, unless the master had notice of the obstruction, or it was necessarily required by the performance of the work. Burnes v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (1895) 129 Mo. 41.

So, a railroad company is not chargeable with negligence in allowing a team and wagon belonging to and used by other parties in drawing coal from its cars to stand so near the track that there is not sufficient room for a brakeman to stand between the wagon and a car after making a coupling, where such wagon had not previously been left so near the track except on one occasion, two weeks before, of which the company had no actual notice. Connors v. Elmira, C. & N. R. Co. (1895) 92 Hun, 339.

So, a railroad company is not liable for injury to an employee, due to the faulty construction of a cattle pen built by a third person owning land adjoining the right of way, in consequence of which cattle escaped upon the track and caused the wrecking of a train, although such pen projected a little upon its right of way by the mistake of the person building it, and without his knowledge or that of the company. Newsom v. Kimball (1897) 42 U. S. App. 282, 78 Fed. Rep. 94, 35 L. R. A. 135, 23 C. C. A. 669. On the contention that it was the duty of the railroad company to provide and maintain a safe roadway, and a safe place to work at, as well as safe instruments to work with, and that by permitting the use of a defective pen, and by hauling cattle thereto, and allowing them to be unloaded therein, the company failed in its duty to its employee, and rendered itself liable for the damages caused thereby, the court said: "This is, we think, an entire misconception of the well-established principle referred to, of the duty of the employer to the employed, in the particulars mentioned; and the endeavor to apply the same to this case, in the absence of proof that the roadbed was defective, the cars unsafe, or the train unskillfully or negligently run, is, though ingeniously presented, absolutely untenable; and to hold these defendants liable for Carter's negligence, if negligent he was, would be to ignore all the authorities, and disregard the undisputed facts, as developed on the trial of this cause in the court below."

So, a yard master is not chargeable with negligence in failing to notice that cars have been shunted by an engineer of another company onto a track which is reserved for the cars of that company, and have been left dangerously close to another track, where the shunting was only completed a few minutes before the position of the shunted cars caused an accident. Martin v. Louisville & N. E. Co. (1894) 95 Ky. 612. The court said: "The yardmaster of the owner cannot during every minute of time see that those who bring cars upon the yard leave them in their precise and proper places. We do not doubt that if these 'dead' cars had remained in their dangerous position such length of time as would have afforded the yardmaster a reasonable opportunity of discovering the danger, and he had failed to take steps to protect the workmen, negligence would be attributable to him and through him to his principal. Only a few minutes, however, elapsed from the time of the lodgment of the cars on track No. 1 before the accident occurred, and we are not disposed to regard this agent as neglectful of his duties."

So, a railroad company is not subject to an action by a brakeman injured by coming in contact with a sagging wire maintained by a third person over its tracks, where it has not consented to nor taken any part in the stringing of the wire across its property, and there is no evidence sufficient to charge it with notice that the wire had been insecurely strung in the first instance, or that it was in such a position at the time of the accident as to be dangerous to trainmen. Richmond v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1896) 8 App. Div. 382, Distinguishing Vosburgh v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1884) 94 N. Y. 374, 46 Am. Rep. 148.

Where a servant is suing for injuries received through the collapse of a staging the supports of which have been weakened by a collision with a wagon driven by a person for whose acts the employer is not responsible, it is error to give an instruction authorizing the jury to find for the plaintiff if they believe the staging to have been improperly constructed, and that such improper construction contributed in any degree to his injuries. Such an instruction ignores the principle that the employer is not liable for the consequences resulting from the acts of third persons in breaking down the platform unless those consequences naturally followed from the manner in which the platform was constructed, and ought to have been foreseen in the light of attending circumstances. Selleck v. Langdon (1889) 56 Hun, 10.

The acceptance of the doctrine that the master has discharged his full legal duty as to the place of work when he has employed persons of competent skill and experience to keep it in such a condition as to be safe and fit for any of the purposes for which it may be necessary to use it is deemed to involve the corollary that any accident which occurs, owing to the want of proper repairs, is regarded as attributable to the negligence of a coservant unless the dangerous conditions have existed for so long a time as to show absolute negligence on the part of the master himself. Cooper v. Hamilton Mfg. Co. (1867) 14 Allen, 193.

"It is the duty of a railroad corporation to use reasonable care and diligence to keep its tracks in a safe condition for its employees to work upon. So far as the work of keeping its tracks in repair is left to its servants, it is its duty to exercise reasonable supervision to see that the work intrusted to them is properly done. How far into details this supervision must go before the domain which belongs exclusively to the master is passed and the domain which may be left to servants is entered, depends upon what it is reasonable to require of a master who is charged with the duty of providing safe works, machinery, tools, and appliances for his employees. In some cases this may be a difficult question to decide. But undoubtedly a jury may find that a railroad corporation should so far supervise the work of its servants in repairing its tracks as to see that a pile of sleepers 3 or 4 feet wide is not left for a long time within 18 inches of the rails in the freight yard of an important station." Babcock v. Old Colony R. Co. (1890) 150 Mass. 467.

Hence the master is not liable for an injury attributable to a temporarily unsafe condition of the place of work which was produced by the act of a fellow servant, unless he has received actual notice of the existence of that condition or it has existed for such a length of time that the law will imply notice. Loranger v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1895) 104 Mich. 80.

Cases of this type may also be considered independent of the doctrine of common employment or of the limits of the assignability of the master's duties, and his liability referred to the question whether he himself or his representative contributed by some concurrent negligence to the injury complained of. This negligence may consist in a failure to take such steps as prudence would indicate after he has obtained notice of specific dangers which exist as a result of the acts of the plaintiff's fellow servants.

Thus, a corporation is liable for personal injuries sustained by an employee by the fall of a shed in which he was at work because of the weight of debris and snow which its agents with knowledge allowed to remain upon the roof, although such debris was originally placed there by his coservants.

The master is not relieved in such a case by the fact that the shed was well built, or that he exercised no supervision over its construction, but employed good materials and skilled workmen in erecting it. Johnson v. First Nat. Bank (1891) 79 Wis. 414.

See further, on this aspect of such cases, XI. post.

V. Imputed knowledge of probable future events.

a. Introductory.

The liability of an employer, so far as it is dependent upon his knowledge, may, it is manifest, be referred entirely to the duty which is incumbent on him, as a prudent man, not merely to observe existing conditions, but also to forecast to a certain extent future occurrences.

In the first place, the whole body of rules which define the limits of his responsibility to his servant may be deduced from the principle by which he is charged with knowledge that if he allows the instrumentalities of his business to fall below a certain standard of efficiency, his servants who use or are brought into proximity with them in the course of their employment will probably be injured. This is merely to enunciate in a form appropriate to the special relation of master and servant the doctrine that a tortfeasor is presumed to intend the natural and probable consequences of his acts. To charge the employer with responsibility, the injury need not be anticipated in the particular case; it is sufficient if such an injury might be reasonably expected to result in the long run from a series of similar negligences. Clifford v. Denver, S. P. & P. R. Co. (1886) 9 Colo. 333.

"It was not enough to entitle plaintiff to recover to show that his injury was in fact the natural consequence of the act or omission of the defendant, but it must have appeared that under all the circumstances it might reasonably have been expected that such an injury would result. A mere failure to ward against a result which could not reasonably have been expected is not negligence. (Atkinson v. Goodrich Transp. Co. (1884) 60 Wis. 141, 156, 50 Am. Rep. 352.) The plaintiff was not entitled to recover merely because the injury he had received was in consequence of the defendant's track and roadbed having not been maintained and kept in repair. In order to warrant a recovery it must have appeared that its failure in this respect was the result of negligence on its part, and that a person of ordinary intelligence and prudence might have expected as the result of such negligence, that such an injury would have occurred. It is only by proof of these indispensable facts that an unbroken connection between the wrongful act and the injury can be established and so constitute a continuous succession of events so connected as to make a natural whole, and show that the defendant's negligence and the injury of the plaintiff stand in the relation of cause and effect. The gist of the action is negligence on the part of the defendant, and such relation of cause and effect could be established only by thus showing that the negligent act or omission of the defendant caused the injury and was its proximate cause." McGowan v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1895) 91 Wis. 147.

"An essential element of negligence is a knowledge of facts which renders foresight possible, and the circumstances necessary to be known before the liability for the consequence of an act or omission will be imposed must be such as would lead a prudent man to apprehend danger. All are bound to foresee what experience will teach them is likely to follow from the existence of a given state of facts. In a given case action must be dictated by experience." Hope v. Fall Brook Coal Co. (1896) 3 App. Div. 70, citing McNish v. Peekskill (1895) 91 Hun, 327, to the point, "where there is no knowledge of facts which would lead to an apprehension of danger, there can be no imputation of foresight or blameworthiness, and these two ingredients are necessary to constitute negligence."

"Negligence is the cause of an accident, in the legal sense, only when it is of such a character that men of ordinary prudence, judgment, and experience ought reasonably, in the light of the attending circumstances, to have foreseen that it was likely to produce such an accident." Ryadorp v. George Pankratz Lumber Co. (1897) 95 Wis. 622.

Where, therefore, a servant is injured by such an occurrence as the caving in of a ditch, the question for the jury is not whether the employer omitted to do something which would have prevented the accident, but whether he "exercised ordinary care and prudence in conducting the excavation in view of the probable consequences which would result from the falling of the overhanging earth while the servant was in the ditch." Leonard v. Collins (1877) 70 N. Y. 90.

In Tissue v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1886) 112 Pa. 91, 56 Am. Rep. 310, where the plaintiff was injured by the explosion of a dynamite magazine, the court said: "Ought the company's superintendent to have known that in placing the magazine where it was placed ne was exposing the men engaged in operating the road, as well as others, to a danger to which they ought not to have been exposed? The question is not whether he did have knowledge of the peculiar properties of the material which he was intrusted to handle, for his ignorance in this particular would be no excuse for the company, but whether the agent thus intrusted ought to have been one who knew that dynamite was, from its nature, liable to accidental explosions such as could not be ordinarily foreseen or provided against. We would, indeed, be unwilling to assume that either Yardley or Armstrong knew that he was subjecting these laboring men to a danger so frightful. They may, like the men themselves, have entertained the common idea that dynamite could not be exploded but by the ordinary method of percussion. But, as we have said, this ignorance, if ignorance it was, will not excuse the company, for there was a duty resting upon it to know, as far as it was possible to know, the character of the material which it placed in the hands of its agents. In this we are not to be understood as pronouncing upon the chemical characteristics of dynamite, for about it we know little or nothing, or as charging negligence on the company or its agents. The act of putting the magazine where it was may have been prudent, or at least not unreasonably imprudent, and the explosion may have been the result of an accident which no ordinary human foresight could provide against, hence, one for which no one can be held responsible. But, however this may be, the matter is, under all the evidence, for a jury, and to a jury it must be referred."

In the second place, the master is bound to take notice of the fact that machinery and other inanimate appliances, after the lapse of a certain period of time, longer or shorter according to the nature of the material, will certainly deteriorate in quality, as the normal result of wear and tear incident to their use, and that animate appliances undergo a similar deterioration in a sufficient number of cases to render it his duty to conduct his business with a view to the probability that danger will occasionally arise from this cause. The obligations entailed upon the master by his presumed possession of the latter's description of knowledge will be treated in the subdivision relating to the duties which the law imposes on him in respect to active supervision and inspection. (Post, VII.) In the present subdivision we shall confine our attention to the effect of the doctrine which requires him to take notice of the probable consequences of his acts. As in the case of the knowledge of existing conditions, the rulings illustrate the affirmative as well as the negative aspect of the doctrine.

b. Accidents which might reasonably have been anticipated.

An employer is liable for all consequences which might have been foreseen and expected as the result of his acts or omissions. Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Kiefer (1887) 26 Ill. App. 466.

The danger of having the cage of a freight elevator so hung that when it has reached the level of the highest floor of the building its top is within an inch of the beam from which the cable is suspended is obvious, and the employer is under such circumstances bound to foresee that an engineer operating the hoisting machinery from a position in which he is unable to observe accurately the height to which the cage has ascended will sooner or later make a miscalculation and allow it to strike the beam and as a probable consequence break the cable. Stringham v. Stewart (1885) 100 N. Y. 516.

Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Kiefer (1887) 26 Ill. App. 466, holds that if a structure erected by a brewing company is being used by its permission by an ice-machine company doing business on the same premises, it is a probable contingency that the employees of the ice-machine company will be obliged to work on or about the tank, and, if the structure is insufficient and unsafe, it is a consequence to be apprehended that the tank will fail, and in its fall carry down and injure those at work on or about it.

In Ryan v. Fowler (1862) 24 N. Y. 410, 82 Am. Dec. 315, the plaintiff was injured by the fall of a privy built out from her employer's factory, and the facts tended to charge the employer with actual knowledge of the irregular action of a wheel upon a wall in his factory and the probable consequence of the weakening and vibration of the said wall upon the safety of the privy. It was also proved that he personally directed a millwright to pry up the pillar-blocks into gear, and to put pegs and wedges between the blocks and the wall; and that he was personally cognizant of the acts of the millwright, which probably caused the privy to fall. One witness testified: "I told Mr. Fowler that it was a hard job to force up the block in that way. He said he thought it would do." The court said that, if the loosening of the foundation and structure of the privy was the consequence of acts directed by and known to the defendant,—of which the jury were the proper judges,—he was responsible for the injuries. "Not that he knew that these acts would, in fact, necessarily render the privy insecure, or would weaken or impair its foundation, but that such might be the consequence. He is chargeable with knowledge of the probable consequence of the acts he directed, or of which he was cognizant."

Failure of a railway company to place a wire strung across a side track high enough to avoid an employee or mechanic making repairs on the roof of a passenger car is negligence, if it can be reasonably anticipated by the company that at some time a passenger car may pass under the wire while such repairs are being made. Stoltenberg v. Pittsburg & L. E. R. Co. (1895) 165 Pa. 377. The rationale of the decision being that though the maintenance of the wire at the height in question was not negligence as regards brakemen working on the tops of freight cars, the company was bound to anticipate such a conjunction of circumstances as that which caused the accident.

A master is liable for the death of a servant caused by an explosion of escaping gas, where the place is unsafe and the event absolutely certain on account of the absence of the necessary appliances. Nichols v. Brush & D. Mfg. Co. (1889) 53 Hun, 137.

A jury may properly find an employer guilty of negligence if the evidence shows that workmen moving heavily loaded trucks across a platform were unnecessarily endangered by requiring them to be wheeled over a slight jog which was apt suddenly to stop their progress, and a careful man would have foreseen such danger. Nelson v. Allen Paper Car-Wheel Co. (1886) 20 Fed. Rep. 840.

A master is liable for injuries to a servant from the falling of an elevated footway which he used in his work, the support of which had been forced out of place by a passing wagon, when it was so constructed that such accidents were reasonably and fairly to be expected. Selleck v. Langdon (1889) 53 Hun, 19.

A railroad company which has notice that the flanges of the wheels of a tender are so worn that there is danger of its running off the track is liable for injuries resulting by the wreck of a train which the evidence shows to have been caused by the derailment of the tender. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Pirtle (1893) 47 Ill. App. 438.

A railroad company is liable for the death of an employee by the breaking of an engine through a bridge whose piers have been displaced by ice driven against them by a storm greater than usual but no greater than a person acquainted with the climatic conditions of the country might have expected. Carney v. Carquet R. Co. (1890) 29 N. B. 425.

In Hoskins v. Stewart (1890) 57 Hun, 880, a case in which the peculiar circumstances which finally rendered the place of work unsafe were unknown to the defendant, the court remarked in the course of its opinion that the protection afforded the servant was adequate, judging from the fact that the trench had been safely used until the accident happened, that the cause of the accident was outside the danger which could reasonably have been expected, and the event was one which could not have been foreseen.

In Southwest Improv. Co. v. Andrew (1899) 86 Va. 270, the fact that the roof of a tunnel in a coal mine fell without the warning signs that usually precede it, was enumerated among the circumstances from which the employer's nonliability might be predicated, where the evidence showed that the usual tests had been made without disclosing any unsafe conditions.

In Ryan v. Los Angeles Ice & Cold Storage Co. (1896) 112 Cal. 244, 32 L. R. A. 524, the plaintiff had been injured by the explosion of a gas generator while he was tightening the nuts of the bolt in it, a kind of work which he was not hired to perform, and in which he had had no experience. The defendant contended that it was not liable unless such result should reasonably have been foreseen, but the court said: There was evidence tending to show that it was unsafe for a skilled engineer or machinist to tighten up these nuts while the pressure was on, though it may be conceded that the preponderance of the evidence was that it could be done by skilled men with reasonable safety; but there was little conflict in the evidence tending to show that it was dangerous for unskilled or inexperienced men to do it. In order to fix the liability of the master, it is not necessary that he should know that injury will inevitably follow, for that would exhibit express malice or intent to injure; nor that he knew or believed that it would probably occur, for that would be recklessness scarcely less criminal.

c. Accidents which could not reasonably have been anticipated.

An employer is not liable for the results of an accident such as no one could be expected to foresee. Sjogren v. Hall (1894) 53 Mich. 274; Richards v. Rough (1884) 53 Mich. 212; Trinity County Lumber Co. v. Denham (1892) 85 Tex. 56.

Employers "are not liable for accidents occurring by which injury ensues, when skill and experience are not able to foresee and avoid them." Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1873) 68 Ill. 560.

An employer is not liable for accidents so improbable and due to causes of such rare occurrence that his obligation to exercise reasonable care is fulfilled without providing against them. McKee v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1891) 89 Iowa, 616, 13 L. R. A. 817.

An employer is not bound to anticipate and provide against risks of accident to his workmen which are not apparent and do not become apparent until after the accident. Nelson v. Allen Paper Car-Wheel Co. (1890) 29 Fed. Rep. 840 (Blodgett, J., in charge to jury).

So, it has been said that a servant assumes the risk of injury from causes unforeseen and not within reasonable apprehension. Mancuso v. Cataract Constr. Co. (1895) 87 Hun, 519. [Here the risk was the presence of an unexploded charge in a rock in which plaintiff was ordered to drill holes, the fact of the charge being there not being due to any negligence on the employer's part.]

"After an accident has occurred it may be easy to see what would have prevented it; but that, of itself, does not prove nor tend to prove that reasonable or ordinary care would have anticipated and provided against it." Consolidated Coal Co. v. Scheller (1891) 42 Ill. App. 610.

Where an employee has provided a safe passageway for his men, who are engaged in transporting bundles of paper weighing 50 pounds, about twenty-five bundles being piled upon a truck, and the passageway has been used without injury, the master is not bound to anticipate and provide against accidents to his men from a defect which occurs from use of the way, which is not apparent and does not become apparent until after the accident has happened. Nelson v. Allen Paper Car-Wheel Co. (1890) 29 Fed. Rep. 840.

In Kelley v. Forty-Second Street, M. & St. N. Ave. R. Co. (1890) 58 Hun, 93, it was remarked in regard to the place of work, that under the circumstances there was no cause for apprehension, and therefore no negligence in not taking precautions.

In Nolan v. Shickle (1877) 3 Mo. App. 300, the theory of plaintiff was that a plank in a scaffold slid or worked off from its supports and that the injury was thus caused. And it was reasoned that, if the plank had been nailed to the scantlings, it would not have worked off. The court, however, said: "There is a plain distinction between the suggestion of a possible precaution by which an injury might probably have been avoided, and the adducing of evidence which shows that the injury was caused by negligence of the defendants. Probably scarcely a mishap occurs where the wisdom which comes after the event cannot suggest some expedient by which, through the exercise of a more abundant caution, the accident might have been prevented. It is for the plaintiff to show that the effective cause of the injury was the negligence of defendants, and to exclude the case from that class of occurrences which are often designated accidents, the word being used in this connection to characterize events the real cause of which cannot be traced or, at least, are not apparent. As the supreme court said in Schultz v. Pacific R. Co. (1893) 36 Mo. 82, in the absence of affirmative and positive proof of negligence, the simple fact of an accident and injury would rather be attributable presumptively to misadventure, inevitable fate, or other causes for which the defendant would not be liable.

"Ordinary care does not require that every possible contingency must be anticipated and guarded against, but only such as are likely to occur. That a railroad company should anticipate that a train may for some necessary purpose be stopped at a place other than the usual stopping places, is possibly true; but at what place, cannot be anticipated, and therefore they, in the exercise of ordinary diligence, are 41 L. R. A.

not required, as we have said, to plank every bridge or cattle guard and have the whole track so guarded as to prevent accidents to employees. The hazardous nature of the business is such that accidents occur for which the company is not responsible; and this is one of them." Koontz v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1884) 65 Iowa, 224, 226, 54 Am. Rep. 5.

An injury received by a trackwalker, who, while standing beside the track to allow a train to pass, was struck by a piece of coal which fell from the tender, belongs to the category of mere mischance or accidents out of the common course of things against which the company in the exercise of common care and prudence, or of such care as all other companies exercise in such case, is not bound to provide. Schultz v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1887) 67 Wis. 616, 68 Am. Rep. 881.

Where a line of telegraph poles stood along the right of way of a railroad, and one of the wires struck the head of an unusually tall brakeman standing on the top of a freight car which was somewhat above the ordinary height, and the blow broke the insulator of the telegraph pole, causing the wire to fall and coil about the body of the decedent, who stood, in the line of duty, on a flat car on a side track, dragging him from the car and causing instant death,—it not being shown that the railroad company had omitted any precaution which prudent persons engaged in a like business would have taken, it is not liable. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Locke (1887) 112 Ind. 404.

The servant of a railway company who is injured by a rare and peculiar accident, such as being struck in the eye by a flake of iron knocked from a swage worked on by other servants and shown to have been in average condition, cannot recover damages from the company for such injury, his place of labor being elsewhere than at the place where the swage was located, but his call being to procure a bolt needed in his department. McNally v. Savannah, F. & W. R. Co. (1890) 86 Ga. 262.

In Groff v. Duluth Imperial Mill Co. (1894) 58 Minn. 383, the court held that even if the defendant was negligent in having a shaft with a set screw projecting so far as to be dangerous to a servant whose work required him to be in close proximity to it, there could be no liability for an injury received by a servant who was oiling the machinery at some distance away, where the chances of his falling against the shaft were so slight and remote that they could not reasonably have been anticipated.

Where an injury to a minor employee occurred from an accident which no human being could have thought of as possible to occur, resulting from an apparently safe act, it cannot be said that it arose from any lack of knowledge on his part, even though he received no instructions. Hickey v. Taffie (1887) 105 N. Y. 26. [Here an employee's finger caught in the button hole of a collar, and was dragged between the rollers of a mangel before it could be extricated.]

An employer is not liable for injuries to a boy who, while engaged in cleaning a machine not in motion, in whose use he has been fully instructed, is injured by the machine suddenly starting from an unexplained cause and catching his hand in the steel teeth projecting from iron rollers, where the machine is a safe and proper one in its construction, and such as is used in other factories of a like nature, and is not out of repair. Ash v. Verlenden Bros. (1893) 154 Pa. 246.

Placing wing fences at a cattle guard, 3 feet 10 inches from the rails at the bottom, and in clining slightly outward at the top, is not negligence which will render a railroad company liable for the death of a brakeman while hanging low on the side of a freight car looking under it to discover what was causing stones to fly therefrom, where no such accident had ever happened before on the road or been anticipated, and no complaint had been made of the fences. The combination of circumstances from which the injury resulted in this case was possible but improbable. McKee v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1891) 83 Iowa, 618, 13 L. R. A. 817. Beck, J., dissented on the ground that it was an unjust discrimination to excuse the defendant because the accident was so improbable that the company could not be regarded as negligent in maintaining the fence so near the track, and to hold the plaintiff negligent because he did not know the danger. He also thought that it could not be said, as a matter of law, that such an occurrence as a brakebeam getting out of order and trailing along the track was such an unusual occurrence that it could not have been anticipated, and if such occurrence was one incident to the operation of the road, the company was bound so to construct its track, cars, and cattle guards, that trainmen might with safety make investigations in the only way in which that could be done, viz., by looking underneath the car from the position which would naturally be taken for that purpose. The view of the majority that the flying of stones from under a car did not indicate any unusual danger, and that as it was the duty of the brakeman to report to the conductor if he noticed that anything was amiss with the train, his conduct showed that he did not anticipate any danger, was also combated. The trailing of timbers under the car was thought to be a highly dangerous occurrence, and the brakeman, if he had reason to suspect that this was the cause of the flying of the stones, was performing his duty in promptly ascertaining what had happened.

In Moore v. Great Northern R. Co. (1897; Minn.) 69 N. W. 1103, the plaintiff, a brakeman, was injured while coupling cars, owing to the fact that a cloud of smoke of unusual density had settled on the track after the passage of a train. Upon this state of facts the court commented as follows: "When the foreman gave the order to back the train, and when it actually started, the smoke had not settled down, for the locomotive from which it came had not yet reached the bridges. Nor could the foreman anticipate that a greater or denser volume would settle there than was an every-day occurrence. And if he could have foreseen this, upon what hypothesis, or upon what evidence in the case, can it be maintained that it was negligence, either to start the train, or to keep it moving after it had started. Trains belonging to defendant and other companies passed through this yard every few minutes, many at a high rate of speed. There was no grade crossing on which to catch the traveler upon the public ways, and none but employees in the yard itself could be expected to be there; and they assumed the ordinary risks incident to the employment. There was no evidence that it had ever been the custom in this or any other yard to stop the operations of trains when smoke made them invisible, or obscured the vision so that objects upon the tracks could not be seen by the employees. In fact, it would paralyze the business of railroading if trains were to be stopped under such conditions. And this is especially true with reference to this particular yard, where, as we have seen, the smoke set-led upon the tracks almost continuously as the trains went by."

In Hope v. Fall Brook Coal Co. (1896) 3 App. Div. 70, the plaintiff's contention was that the track where he was coupling cars was rendered dangerous "upon the instant" by an unusually thick cloud of steam from a defective valve, and that this vapor from the defective valve was of such density, irrespective of the vapor from the relief valve, as to greatly impair his vision, and the jury, accepting this explanation, had then drawn the conclusion that the vapor was the immediate or proximate cause of the plaintiff getting his hand between the buffers. The court, however, said: "This vapor was not the cause of the accident, but was a condition under which it occurred, and that condition was wholly unexpected and not likely to be foreseen;" also that "the discharge of steam is a usual or necessary concomitant of the use of the engine; and a switchman must be expected to be enveloped in more or less steam, irrespective of any defect in the valves."

An employer is not liable to an employee for injuries caused by a flying stick from some unexplained source getting between a pulley and a belt which another employee was adjusting thereon, and causing the belt to fly off, catch a plowshare lying upon the floor, and then in its movements catch such employee and draw him around the shaft. Freeberg v. St. Paul Plow Works (1892) 48 Minn. 99.

A railway company is not liable for personal injuries to a hand employed to help lay a railway track, caused by an attack upon the hands of such company, made by the employees of a hostile company in an attempt to prevent it from laying its tracks, where the employing company did not know, or have reason to believe, that any such attack was contemplated. Kelly v. Shelby R. Co. (1893) 15 Ky. L. Rep. 311.

A railroad company is not liable to an employee for an injury sustained by the throwing of a mail-bag from a train by a postal agent at a place where it had never been thrown off before, the train not being propelled, at the time, at an unusual rate of speed. Muster v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1894) 61 Wis. 325, 59 Am. Rep. 141, 49 Am. Rep. 41, note.

The failure of a foundryman to place a guard around the place where castings were broken by the dropping of a heavy weight upon them, to arrest flying pieces of iron, does not authorize a finding of negligence on his part rendering him liable for injuries to a servant struck by a flying piece of iron, while 25 or 30 feet away, where ordinarily the pieces of iron did not fly more than 10 feet, and had never been known to fly so far before. Wood v. Helges (1896) 83 Md. 257.

Ale brewers to whom no notice is shown to have been given of the previous bursting or exploding of bottles are not chargeable with knowledge of the actual fact of such exploding, and of the latent danger thereof to their employees. Melchert v. Robert Smith India Pale Ale Brewing Co. (1891) 140 Pa. 448.

A mine owner is not an insurer against unforeseen accidents which are liable to happen from the action of the weather, or the unanticipated slipping of earth, slate, coal, or stone from the wall or roofs of the mine. Cherokee & P. Coal & Min. Co. v. Britton (1896) 3 Kan. App. 202.

One of a bridge gang employed to make repairs of railroad bridges, assigned to the duty of pulling down an elevated watertank, cannot recover for an accident which could not have been foreseen, at least by anyone except himself and the other members of his gang, who were his fellow servants. Easton v. Houston & T. C. R. Co. (1889) 89 Fed. Rep. 65.

An employer is not liable for an injury to an employee caught in an open gearing 6 feet 4 inches above the floor, unless it appears that it was dangerous in such position, or that it might reasonably be anticipated that an employee might be injured thereby. Eckles v. Chicago Ship Bldg. Co. (1896) 63 Ill. App. 436.

The fact that only an hour before a heavy mass of gouge fell upon a mine from the roof of a tunnel, the foreman and the servant engaged in blasting had tested the place with a pick, and striven vigorously but in vain to bring down the mass, shows that its fall was not an occurrence which the mine owner could have foreseen and reasonably anticipated. Finlayson v. Utica Min. & Mill Co. (1895) 32 U. S. App. 143, 67 Fed. Rep. 507, 14 C. C. A. 492.

In Del Sejhore v. Hallinan (1897) 153 N. Y. 274, Reversing (1895) 36 N. Y. Supp. 1124, the plaintiff was killed by the fall of a mass of earth which slipped into a trench he was engaged in digging for a contractor. The mass was part of a strip of material a few feet in width between the trench where he was working and one which had been excavated for the construction of a sewer some years before, but the existence of which was not known to the defendant, except in so far as he might be deemed to have had constructive notice from the fact that there were several catch basins next the curb from which pipes led into the sewer. Defendant had provided appliances for shoring up the trench, and had instructed his employees to use them at once upon their discovering any crack in the sides of the trench to collapse. A careful watch had also been kept, and nothing had been observed which indicated the approaching catastrophe. Nor had the civil engineer appointed to superintend the contractor's work seen anything which indicated that the banks were liable to cave in. It was held that the defendant was not liable, as, under the evidence, the accident was of such a character that prudent men proceeding with reasonable caution would not ordinarily have foreseen or anticipated it.

For a similar ruling in a case in which the facts were almost identical, see Burns v. Pethcal (1894) 75 Hun, 437.

A weaver injured by a wire flying out of a carpet loom cannot recover of her employer, where it appears that there was no lack of inspection and no defects in the wire, and that in spite of the greatest care wires would fly out, to the knowledge of such weaver, whose duty it was to watch and replace them. Daly v. Alexander Smith & Sons Carpet Co. (1893) 69 Hun, 77.

A brakeman cannot recover for injuries received by being struck by a bolster on a passing car, which was designed to allow timbers longer than the cars room to play while rounding curves, and was properly devised and inspected, but suddenly worked out and struck the caboose where the brakeman was. Knox v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1893) 69 Hun, 93.

The owner of a blast furnace is not liable for injuries to an employee from the inhalation of gas not sufficient in quantity to affect an ordinary man, because the lungs of such employee were oversensitive from previous illness, where his employer had no reason to suppose that he was not sufficiently strong to endure the gas without risk. Parlin v. Finfrouck (1895) 65 Ill. App. 174.

Where defendant railroad company used on its car-wheels the same kind of oil that was generally used upon cars, and had no knowledge, and by the exercise of ordinary care would not have obtained any knowledge, that any poisonous substance formed on the brasses in consequence of its use, an employee cannot maintain an action for being poisoned through handling the oil. Kitteringham v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. (1883) 62 Iowa, 285.

"In order to render an employer liable for an injury caused by an explosion occasioned by a defect known by him to exist in the boiler, the defect must be one which he could, by exercising skill, have ascertained to be likely to produce the explosion. There may be defects, and these may produce an explosion, and they may have been known, and yet they may have been such as no amount of care and caution on the part of the employer would have disclosed to be dangerous, and to be guarded against as dangerous." Morris v. Gleason (1877) 1 Ill. App. 510.

In Kerrigan v. Hart (1886) 40 Hun, 389, a laborer shoveling dirt stood between the tail of his cart and the edge of a bank. Owing to a defect in a hook in the harness, the horse got his head cramped, which made him back, forcing the laborer over the bank. It was held that on no theory could the master be charged with liability, the court saying: "Assuming the hook was not properly made, it is clear that the defect was not the proximate cause of the injury. No human foresight could anticipate that a horse would throw his head around so far as to catch his bridle upon this hook and back straight back and squeeze a man against a bank. That such a thing is possible is proved by the happening of the accident in this case, but that such a thing was probable or likely to occur is absurd."

A railroad company is not liable for injuries to an engineer occasioned by the unexpected going out of a lantern which was apparently in good order. Elgin, J. & E. R. Co. v. Mainaney (1894) 59 Ill. App. 114.

Another phase of the doctrine is that an employer cannot be held negligent for failing to take precautions against the acts of servants or third parties which there is no reason to anticipate.

Thus, the failure of an employer to repair a steam gauge attached to a boiler after notice that it was defective will not render him liable for injuries from the escape of steam from the safety valve, to an employee who went upon the boiler to examine where alterations could be made, believing such gauge to indicate the steam pressure, where he could not have anticipated that employees would go upon the boiler when under steam. McCallum v. McCallum (1894) 58 Minn. 288.

Nor is the owner of a sawmill in which is a saw the upper portion of which is covered by a sleeve which is raised by a jackscrew and levers so as to make an opening, through which a man's arm can be thrust, intended for the use of levers in regulating the tension, required, as matter of law, to foresee that an employee might thrust his arm through such opening and the sleeve fall because of a defective nut, where other openings have been provided through which one's arm could be put with safety. Rysdorp v. George Pankrats Lumber Co. (1897) 95 Wis. 622.

Nor is the owner of a chair factory guilty of negligence in leaving the opening into an elevator shaft unguarded at night, where it has no knowledge that anyone will go into the room opening into such shaft. Jorgenson v. Johnson Chair Co. (1896) 67 Ill. App. 80.

Nor is an employer liable for injury to a girl of fifteen years from her hand dropping into an opening and coming in contact with a heated roller, because she became unconscious while her hand was resting over such opening, through having gone to work without food, where he has exercised proper care in respect to the machinery. Montreal Steam Laundry Co. v. Demers (1896) Rap. Jud. Quebec, 5 B. R. 191. The court based its decision on the principle that an employer who surrounds his servants with all the protection which human foresight can naturally suggest cannot be held responsible for injury resulting from physical weakness, or from any accident which the exercise of ordinary care on the part of the employee would have prevented.

In Burke v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Co. (1893) 60 Hun. 21, a railroad company employed in charge of a telegraph station at a single-track siding and highway crossing a robust boy of seventeen, who was familiar with railroad tracks and switches. It was his duty to report trains, receive and carry out telegraphic instructions, flag the crossing, and operate a "safety Wharton switch," which connected the main track with the siding. He had become familiar with the operating of this switch, which was simple, the switch, of itself, keeping the main track closed, and requiring the lifting of a heavy iron ball on a lever to open the siding. He had managed the switch for about two and a half months. Then on a certain occasion, when a train which should have been kept on the main track was approaching, he was suddenly seized with the thought that the switch was set wrong, and impulsively, and with a view of preventing a catastrophe, rushed to the switch and raised the lever, sending the train upon the siding, where it collided with a waiting train, causing the death of the engineer of the moving train, whose legal representative sued the company for damages. The court held the company not liable, saying: "Upon the occasion of the injuries no duty rested upon Clark to open the switch. His act in raising the ball and breaking the main track was voluntary, thoughtless, and mistaken. Nothing appears in the case showing that he had not physical power to perform all the acts and duties required of him at the station, or that he was not mentally fit for the position assigned to him by the defendant. Judged by the rule laid down in Coppins v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1890) 122 N. Y. 557, the evidence fails to show a want of competency on the part of Clark to perform the duties required at the station. The observations made by the learned counsel for the respondent seem appropriate and pertinent where he says: 'The defendant could not make a psychological examination of Clark, or delve into the secret recesses of his brain to ascertain whether, at some future period, he would for an instant become the prey of a delusion and work destruction. It was no more bound to anticipate this unnatural occurrence than it would have been the act of Clark, had he in a moment of temporary aberration drawn a pistol and killed the plaintiff's intestate.'"

Especially is the master not bound to anticipate that the servant will act imprudently in exposing himself unnecessarily to a patent danger.

On this ground it has been held that a verdict for the defendant was rightly directed where an engine wiper placed his bare hand upon a splinter attached to the driving wheel of an engine, 6 inches long and projecting from $\frac{1}{2}$ to 1 inch beyond the tire, for the purpose of supporting himself in cleaning the engine, when the smooth surface of all the other parts of the 41 L. R. A.

engine were open to his use for the purpose. McCain v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1896) 40 U. S. App. 181, 76 Fed. Rep. 125, 22 C. C. A. 99.

It is not the duty of an employer to anticipate that an inexperienced employee will put his hand under the cap covering the knives of a planing machine. Huffer v. Herman (1896) 66 Ill. App. 481.

In Mad River & L. E. R. Co. v. Barber (1856) 5 Ohio St. 541, 67 Am. Dec. 312, it is said of a hazardous employment that the employer does not insure against accident or those unforeseen perils which due and proper care and diligence cannot provide against. Injuries from accidents which the utmost stretch of human skill and foresight cannot provide against, are incident to all situations and conditions in life.

As the servant assumes all the risks of his employment which are not due to the master's negligence, it is obvious that another terminology based upon this doctrine may be used to express the effect of the general principle discussed in this subdivision. The rights and liabilities of the parties from this point of view are clearly explained in the following paragraph.

A railroad company is not negligent in leaving an ordinary push car a safe distance from the track and blocking it there in the ordinary method to prevent its moving toward the track, although some boys not connected with the company afterwards attempted to put it on the track and left it so close to the track that an employee riding on a switch engine was injured by collision therewith. A push car is not an object specially attractive to children in such a sense that the company is bound to take precautions against their meddling with it. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Slattery (1896) 57 Kan. 499.

Where a railroad servant has been injured by a sudden subsidence of the track, it is error to refuse to submit to the jury the special question, "Did the defendant have any reason to apprehend such a sinking of the roadbed and track thereon?"—where in a special question actually asked there is nothing which is calculated to elicit a finding upon that issue. A question in answer to which it is found that the defendant could by the exercise of ordinary care and prudence have discovered and repaired the cause of the accident before the accident occurred is not of itself sufficient, inasmuch as it leaves the question of proximity of cause untouched and still at large. McGowan v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1895) 91 Wis. 147.

It should be noted that the master is liable where injury is caused by the concurrence of an accident with his negligence. Musick v. Jacob Doid Pkg. Co. (1894) 58 Mo. App. 332.

The cases which permit the employer to rely to a certain extent upon the efficiency of instrumentalities which have been tested by a prolonged use are other illustrations of the principles exemplified in the foregoing cases. (VI. f, 1, post.)

VI. Circumstances charging an employer with knowledge of the condition of his instrumentalities.

See also XVII. a, 6, post.

Want of knowledge may be imputed to an employer on the ground that a person who unites with the ordinary measure of intelligence which is imputed by the law to every responsible citizen the special skill and experience possessed by those engaged in the same business could not, supposing him to have made a reasonably careful use of his faculties, have failed to ascertain the existence of the abnormal conditions to which the servant's injury was due.

"The master or the foreman whom he places charge of the business is presumed to be familiar with the danger, latent and patent, incident to that business. Smith v. Peninsular Car Works (1890) 60 Mich. 501.

"The employee will be presumed to be familiar with the dangers, latent as well as patent, ordinarily accompanying the business in which he is engaged." Wagner v. H. W. Jayne Chemical Co. (1892) 147 Pa. 475.

Compare Consolidated Coal Co. v. Haenni (1893) 146 Ill. 614, where it was said that a master or a superintendent whom he places in charge of the business is presumed to be familiar with the dangers, both latent and patent, which accompany the use of an apparatus for hoisting a large smokestack to be used in the business.

The obligation imposed upon him by this principle requires him to take notice, not merely of the operation of the various physical and mechanical laws by which the condition of his instrumentalities may be affected, but also of the manner in which those instrumentalities perform their functions from day to day, and to keep his eyes and ears open to any occurrences which indicate that they are not fit for the purpose for which they are used.

The duty incumbent on an employer to exercise care in furnishing reasonably safe appliances and substances to be used in his business requires him to take notice of the quality and fitness of the coal used on his engines. The condition of coal so inferior that it causes flames to burst through the furnace door is not a latent defect that cannot be discovered by ordinary diligence. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Walker (1894; Tex. Civ. App.) 28 S. W. 513.

The boundary line between the constructive knowledge which may be attributed to the master from this standpoint and from the standpoint of his duty in regard to the active examination of the instrumentalities is not always easy to define. But the exigencies of a logical classification seem to render it expedient that the duty to observe the daily operation of the instrumentalities, and to estimate the relation of certain extraneous scientific facts to that operation, should be distinguished from the duty to institute a minute investigation into the actual condition of those instrumentalities with a view to ascertaining whether they are or are not efficient. The necessity for some such differentiation is shown by the fact that the law will sometimes deduce an obligation to make an inspection from the fact that the employer, availing himself of the sources of information to which the former duty requires him to have recourse, has arrived at the knowledge of certain matters which would put a careful man upon inquiry.

The present subdivision, therefore, will be devoted to a review of the cases which deal with the various circumstances which bear upon the employer's liability for injuries caused by dangerous conditions, of which he is presumed to have notice, without taking any positive steps in the matter of inspection. His duty in regard to inspection will be considered afterwards.

b. Notoriety.

One method of establishing notice or knowledge of a fact is by proving the notoriety of the fact. Crane v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1885) 87 Mo. 589.

Most of the cases which illustrate this principle relate to the reputation of servants, and are collected in subdivision IX. post. Here we shall merely refer to the rulings in which the principle is applied to charge the master with a knowledge of the condition of inanimate agencies.

In Crane v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1885) 87 Mo. 588, it was held that the trial judge had not erred in receiving evidence tending to show that a locomotive car made by a certain manufacturer had, on account of its being dangerous, been abandoned, not only by railroad companies generally, but by the defendant itself.

In Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. v. Fredericks (1874) 71 Ill. 294, a railroad company was held liable, where the proof showed that there was a very radical defect in the manner of the construction of a particular coupling which caused an injury, and that its reputation among the operatives in the yards was so notorious that its dangerous character ought to or could have been known by the exercise of reasonable diligence by the officers of the company whose duty it was to build and repair machinery.

So, also, in an action to recover damages caused by the explosion of a certain locomotive engine, the testimony of the employees of the company using it that among them such engine had always been considered unsafe is competent for the purpose of showing that the person having care of the machinery of the road knew, or might have known by reasonable diligence, that it was not safe. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Shannon (1867) 43 Ill. 338, 339.

But proof of general notoriety, although generally admissible as tending to prove notice of a fact, when such notice is a material inquiry, is never competent to prove the fact itself. Hence it is not competent testimony, on the inquiry whether a certain low bridge over a railroad track had ever before been the means of killing a brakeman. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hall (1888) 87 Ala. 708, 4 L. R. A. 710. (See also IX., d, post.)

c. Opportunities of master to observe defect.

"Where it is proved that there was a defect, and that defect was obvious, and on its face showed that it had existed long enough before the injury to have been discovered by the master in the exercise of ordinary diligence, it is at once apparent that if the master did not know of it he might have known, and that he failed in his duty to inspect and know." Ocean S. S. Co. v. Matthews (1890) 86 Ga. 418.

Hence a vessel is liable to an employee of a stevedore for injuries suffered by the giving way of a shackle holding a block used in unloading the vessel, because of its unsafe condition from a previous excessive strain, where its unsafe character was evident. The Para (1893) 56 Fed. Rep. 241.

And a railroad company is chargeable with negligence toward its employees in sending out a car with the handhold necessary for the safe and prompt performance of the duties of a brakeman in coupling and uncoupling in an obviously defective condition. Settle v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1895) 127 Mo. 336.

A bolt in the brakebeam of a car which projects to an unnecessary extent is an obvious and palpable defect which the railway company is bound to remedy. Therefore it is not error to refuse an instruction that, if the car became defective in this particular after it was put in use, the company is not liable for injuries resulting from the defect, unless it neglected to have it remedied after it had notice of the same.

Wedgwood v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1878) 44 Wis. 44.

A railroad company is liable for injuries caused by a deadwood worn so short as to make the work of coupling dangerous, such a defect being plainly visible on examination. King v. Ohio & M. R. Co. (1882) 14 Fed. Rep. 277.

In Erskine v. Chino Valley Beet-Sugar Co. (1895) 71 Fed. Rep. 270, the court used some language which would, if taken literally, justify the inference that it supposed that the converse of this principle also held good, for it denied the right of the plaintiff to recover on the ground that the defect in the appliance (a rope) was not "open to visual observation." Such a doctrine can scarcely be reconciled with the rule which imposes on the master the duty of active inspection. But presumably the decision was rendered upon the theory that this duty had actually been discharged a reasonable time before the rope gave way.

That the master is liable on the ground that the danger was obvious cannot be asserted where the evidence on behalf of a defendant company is to the effect, not only that the support made in a tunnel which collapsed was not obviously defective or imperfect, but that, in the opinion of the superintendent, it was amply sufficient, and that it was skillfully and mechanically constructed. Kearney Electric Co. v. Laughlin (1895) 45 Neb. 391.

Evidence that a machine had a tendency to throw the belt from the loose to the tight pulley, and thus to start up the machine, is sufficient to warrant a finding of negligence on the part of an employer in failing to provide reasonably safe machinery, and that a due examination of the machinery would have disclosed its imperfection. Donahue v. Drown (1891) 154 Mass. 21.

A mining company which put into service, where it must be connected with the same steam pipe that other larger and stronger boilers are connected with, an old boiler that had been repaired eleven months before, with the express purpose of using it for about six months for a special purpose which did not require its connection with other boilers or the use of high pressure, is liable for an injury to an employee caused by its explosion the first day after such connection. Johnson v. Boston & M. Consol. Copper & S. Min. Co. (1895) 16 Mont. 164.

A finding that defendant knew of the presence of a solution of potash in a waste pipe from which he directed plaintiff to remove an obstruction is sustained by evidence that defendant was present before and at the time of the accident to plaintiff caused by coming in contact with such solution, and had been personally concerned in directing the removal of the obstruction, although he denies having had any knowledge of its presence. Dunn v. Connell (1897) 21 Misc. 295, Affirming 20 Misc. 727.

The rule that the case is for the jury wherever the evidence is conflicting as to the question at issue involves the corollary that when there is some evidence of the defendant's knowledge of the defect which caused the injury, the plaintiff is entitled to go to the jury on the question of the employer's negligence. Mellors v. Shaw (1881) 1 Best & S. 437, 30 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 333, 7 Jur. N. S. 845. (This rule, of course, is to be understood with due reference to the construction now put by most courts upon the meaning of the word "some," a mere scintilla of evidence not being sufficient to justify the submission of the case to the jury. See Bailey, Personal Injuries Relating to Master and Servant, chap. XXVI.; 1 Beven, Neg. 148 et seq.)

d. Length of time defect has existed.

See also IX. c. 4.

1. Generally.

In considering whether notice of the dangerous condition of an instrumentality would have been discovered if the master had been reasonably careful in the length of time during which that condition had existed is obviously a material question, and is constantly adverted to in cases of the type under review as a fact tending to show that his ignorance was excusable or culpable.

For convenience sake we shall collect at this place both the decisions in which the underlying idea is that the employer would or would not have learned of the defect merely by the passive use of his faculties of observation, and those which rely upon the theory that by a proper performance of his duty of active inspection he could have discovered the existence of the danger.

This circumstance has been relied upon to charge the master with liability in the subjoined rulings.

Where the master, instead of furnishing safe and suitable hoisting appliances, provided such as were obviously unsafe and unfit at and before the time of the injury, and had been so long enough for their unsafe condition to have been discovered by the master in the exercise of ordinary care, the presumption that he knew of their condition is proper. Ocean S. S. Co. v. Matthews (1895) 86 Ga. 418.

A railroad company is liable for injuries caused by a broken ladder-handle which had been broken long enough to be weather-beaten, and to appear as an old break. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Moore (1883) 78 Va. 93.

No matter whose duty it may be to keep a foreign car in repair, or to prevent its coming into a railroad yard in a damaged and dangerous condition, if these duties were neglected and the car permitted to come into the yard for so many consecutive days that the company, in the exercise of a high degree of care, might have known of its damaged and dangerous condition in time to avoid any injury therefrom, it is liable to its employees for any damage occasioned thereby without any fault of theirs. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Avery (1880) 8 Ill. App. 133.

An employer is not excused from liability for injuries to an employee caused by machinery being out of repair, by the simple fact that the condition thereof was not known to him, if it was obvious and had existed for such a length of time that he was chargeable with negligence in not knowing of it. Monmouth Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Erling (1894) 145 Ill. 521, Affirming (1892) 45 Ill. App. 411.

A railroad company which does not ascertain the condition of a caboose which has been repeatedly condemned and marked as out of repair, and has remained for a long time in that condition, thereby fails to exercise reasonable and ordinary care and diligence, rendering it liable for an injury to an employee resulting from such neglect. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Higgins (1890) 53 Ark. 458.

It is error to take the case from the jury where the evidence tends to show that the machinery which caused the injury was defective, and that the defect had existed so long that the employer should have known of it. Radmann v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1890) 78 Wis. 22.

Where a defect is, in its nature, one which is open to observation, and there is evidence going to show that it has been suffered to exist for a considerable time, the jury may fairly infer.

knowledge on the part of the master. Bridges v. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. (1879) 6 Mo. App. 330.

Where both the evidence and the examination by the jury of timbers used for a scaffold tend to prove that their unsafe condition shortly before the injury should have been detected by the inspection of a competent person, and also tend to prove that this faulty condition had existed for such a length of time that, by reasonable care and diligence on the part of defendant, he could have ascertained the condition of the timbers, a verdict for the plaintiff will not be set aside. Oberfelder v. Doran (1889) 26 Neb. 118.

In an action for damages by a brakeman, evidence that plaintiff was employed by the defendant, and, while coupling cars, sustained an injury to his hand owing to the defective condition of the draft timber holding up the drawhead on one of the cars; that the bolt sunk down into the timber, and let the drawhead down 4 inches lower than it should be; and that the defect was old and not known to the plaintiff,—is sufficient to sustain a verdict against the defendant. Seese v. Northern P. R. Co. (1889) 39 Fed. Rep. 487.

Evidence that a railway-car derrick, by the breaking of which plaintiff's intestate—foreman of the car—was killed, and had been in unsafe condition for several years; that defendant had set it aside for repairs on several occasions, and knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care could have discovered, that the timbers underneath the floor were decayed and rotten, and that the car was unsafe,—is sufficient to sustain a verdict that defendant was guilty of negligence in furnishing the car to plaintiff's intestate. Chicago & E. R. Co. v. Branyan (1894) 10 Ind. App. 570.

The same general principle is also recognized in Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. McHenry (1894) 10 Ind. App. 525; Rice v. King Philip Mills (1887) 144 Mass. 225, 59 Am. Rep. 80; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Adams (1886) 105 Ind. 151; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holt (1883) 29 Kan. 149; Burnes v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (1895) 129 Mo. 41; Clough v. Hoffman (1890) 132 Pa. 626; Ashman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. (1892) 90 Mich. 567; McDonald v. Chicago, St. P. M. & O. R. Co. (1889) 41 Minn. 439.

On the other hand, the fact that the danger has arisen so recently that the master is not fairly chargeable with knowledge of its existence is relied upon in the following cases:

A railway company is not liable for damages resulting to an employee from the derailment of a train, caused by the spread of a reasonably safe track by the passage of another train, so immediately preceding the accident that the trackman could not have had notice of the defect in the track, but it is liable if the defect causing the injury was in rotten and unsafe ties. Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Pettis (1888) 69 Tex. 689.

In Consolidated Coal Co. v. Maehl (1888) 31 Ill. App. 252, the defendant was held liable where the attention of the corporate officers had been called to the defect "some time previous" to the accident.

A railroad company is not liable for an injury to an employee caused by defects in the switch tracks in its yards, unless it had actual knowledge of such defects, or they had existed for such a length of time that knowledge might be inferred. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Swarts (1897) 58 Kan. 235.

To enable the plaintiff to recover damages for injuries caused by the fall of a pile of lumber, which, as the evidence tends to show, was 41 L. R. A.

safely piled in the first place, but became unsafe in subsequent removal from the pile, to recover for the injury sustained by the falling of the pile, "It is incumbent on him to prove that defendant, through some responsible officer or agent, had actual notice of the defect, or that it had existed for so long a time that he should have discovered it in the exercise of reasonable diligence," the court remarking that notice of subsequently accruing defects could not arise out of anything which the employer had to do with original construction. Baldwin v. St. Louis, K. & N. R. Co. (1885) 68 Iowa, 37.

A railroad company is not liable to an employee for injuries received in attempting to make a coupling, by stumbling over a pile of cinders on its track, or from a defective drawhead, where both the cinders and the defect are recent, and it has no knowledge thereof. Welch v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1892) 43 N. Y. S. R. 958.

A railroad company is not chargeable with negligence by reason of a defect which suddenly appears in a tool or instrumentally furnished an employee, unless it has been remiss in testing the same or ought to have known of the defect. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Napole (1895) 55 Kan. 401.

A railroad company is not liable for the death of an employee resulting from personal injuries caused by a defective appliance furnished to him, unless the company knew of the defect, or it was of such a nature or had existed for such length of time that in the exercise of ordinary care the company should have discovered it. Carruthers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1895) 55 Kan. 600.

The lessee of a building is not liable for a personal injury to his employee by the falling of a freight elevator because it had no safety clutch, where he was moving into the premises which had been in his possession for a short time only, and he did not know that there was no clutch, and its lack was not so obvious as to be readily seen on examination,—such as would ordinarily be made by one who is looking over premises with a view to living there. Hansen v. Schneider (1890) 58 Hun, 60.

A master is not liable for injuries to a servant from the fall of heavy iron castings, due to the dangerous position in which they were piled, where he did not know that they were in such a position, and they had not remained in such position for so long a time that he ought to have known. Reed v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1895) 164 Mass. 129; S. P. Clough v. Hoffman (1890) 132 Pa. 626; Baldwin v. St. Louis, K. & N. R. Co. (1885) 68 Iowa, 37; Carruthers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1895) 55 Kan. 600; Haskins v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1894) 79 Hun, 159.

In O'Mellia v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. (1893) 115 Mo. 205, an instruction was approved which directed the jury to find for the plaintiff, if the defendant railroad company knew, or by the exercise of ordinary care might have known, that the footboard on an engine-tender which caused the injury was defective, sufficiently long before the accident to have enabled it to make repairs.

In Wabash & W. R. Co. v. Morgan (1892) 132 Ind. 430, an instruction to the jury as to notice on the part of the defendant of the defective engine, that they might find such notice to be proved, if it might be rightfully and reasonably inferred from the evidence given in the case, although there might be no direct testimony as to such notice, is held proper where there is an averment in the complaint that the defendant had long known of the dangerous and defective condition of the engine.

It is not error to permit defendant's foreman to testify as to what he knew of the condition of a scaffold three hours before it gave way, for, in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the presumption must be indulged that it remained in the same condition up to the time of the accident. Doyle v. Missouri, K. & T. Trust Co. (1897) 41 S. W. 255.

In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Avery (1884) 109 Ill. 314, 322, a requested instruction that a railroad company is not responsible for injuries to its employees, caused by the ordinary wear and tear of cars, until it has been notified of the defects caused thereby, or has had time and opportunity to learn thereof, and to have the same repaired, was modified by adding "or such defects shall have existed for such a length of time as to give the proper authorities opportunity to learn of such defect in the due discharge of their duties." It was said this merely enlarged on the effect of the time of the continuance of the defect, in implying notice, and expressed the idea in the instruction as drawn, in a more wordy form.

In Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kent (1889) 84 Ga. 351, 355, a railroad washout due to a sudden and tremendous rainfall, unprecedented in that locality, caused injury to a locomotive engineer on a train that reached the place within an hour and a half or two hours after the rainfall. The court said: "If the company knew or could have known of this washout, by the exercise of ordinary and reasonable care and diligence, it would seem from the authorities that it would be liable to the plaintiff for damage he sustained. But if it did not know of it, and there was no negligence on the part of the company's servants in not knowing or trying to know, the company would not be liable.

2. Rulings as to specific periods.

What period must elapse before it is justifiable to regard the master as affected with knowledge of an existing defect in an instrumentality is, of course, usually a question of fact, to be decided, like other questions of that sort, by a jury.

"There is no arbitrary rule of law that charges the master with constructive notice of the negligent omissions of duty on the part of a servant, after the lapse of a certain time, under all circumstances. The doctrine of constructive notice is founded on just and reasonable consideration, and the mere lapse of time is not always the test of negligence on the part of the master." Cameron v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1896) 145 N. Y. 400.

But it will be useful to collect the rulings in which appellate courts have expressed a specific opinion as to certain periods.

A railroad company which allowed a telegraph pole to stand for three years within 18 inches of passing cars, so that a brakeman was struck as he was climbing down the side of the car without any negligence on his part, is guilty of culpable negligence. Chicago & I. R. Co. v. Russell (1878) 91 Ill. 298, 33 Am. Rep. 54.

In Monmouth Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Erling (1894) 148 Ill. 521, the employer was held liable where a nut which kept an eye-bolt in place had been missing two weeks.

A jury is justified in finding that an employer is chargeable with constructive notice of a defect in a kettle used by an employee, through which pitch heated therein runs down into the fire below so as to cause an explosion, where the defect has existed for six or eight weeks. Stapp v. Loewer's Gambrinus Brewing Co. (1896) 1 App. Div. 405.

A jury is warranted in finding that a railroad company which has had a foreign car in its yard for about one week is chargeable with notice of a defect in its coupling attachments which is readily discernible by a proper inspection. Fay v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1883) 30 Minn. 231.

In Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Fry (1891) 131 Ind. 319, it was insisted by plaintiff's counsel that the fact that a foreign car had been in the possession of the company for nearly two weeks was of itself sufficient to charge the company with notice, and was cited in support of this proposition. The court, however, pointed out that the case did not go to any such length, as the jury had found that the company had notice of the defect, and the court said in its opinion the "defect in the car was readily discernible upon proper inspection." Fay v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1883) 30 Minn. 477.

Where there is evidence that an obstruction has remained near a railroad track for more than a year previous to the accident due to it, the case should be left to the jury. Bessex v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1878) 45 Wis. 477.

A yardmaster is not guilty of negligence in failing to discover that the cars of another company which is allowed to use the yard are left too close to the track upon which a train is running so as to render his employer liable for an injury to an employee on such train, where the cars were placed in position only a few minutes before the accident. Martin v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1894) 95 Ky. 612.

Knowledge of the defective condition of a switch will not be imputed to a railway company, when it was to all appearance safe for the passage of trains about one hour before it caused the derailment of a train. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Stites (1886) 20 Ill. App. 648.

An employer is not liable for an injury to a servant caused by the falling of a post, on the ground that it was his duty to furnish a safe place for the servant to work, where the post had been put in place only two days before, and was well stayed and secured in its position, and there is no evidence that the employer had either actual or constructive notice of any defect or unsafe condition. Mickee v. Walter A. Wood Mowing & R. Mach. Co. (1894) 77 Hun, 559. On the former appeal, it had been held that, as there was no evidence to show that the post had been guyed or secured in any way, it was error to nonsuit the plaintiff. (1893), 70 Hun, 456.

That a mining company must have known that the roof of one of its tunnels was in a dangerous condition is not a necessary inference from the fact of its having been in that condition for two weeks before the accident. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Scheiler (1891) 42 Ill. App. 619.

Constructive notice of the presence of a block of wood on a rail upon which a transfer table travels cannot be inferred from evidence which tends to show that it had been placed there by some person unknown a few hours before it caused an injury. Murphy v. Great Northern R. Co. (1897) (Minn.) 71 N. W. 662.

In Doing v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. (1893) 73 Hun, 270, the plaintiff was held to be properly nonsuited for the reason that there was no evidence that a car had been out of repair a sufficient length of time to justify the jury in finding that the defendant knew of its condition, or was negligent in not ascertaining it. The court of appeals, however, said that, as the defendant had notice on Saturday that the car was out of order, the fact that an accident occurred from its use on the following Monday was some evidence of negligence.

e. Scientific facts; what knowledge of, imputed.

The following cases illustrate the ideas of various courts as to the extent of information which an employer must at his peril possess as to some common scientific facts. The bearing of his imputed knowledge of the universal law that inorganic instrumentalities will constantly tend to deteriorate while they are being used, will be considered in the subdivision relating to his duty of inspection. [VII. post].

"Latent defects are such as the master, by the exercise of care, might have discovered, and must not be confounded with hidden defects, which even great care on the part of the master would not disclose to him. To hold the master responsible for injuries resulting from hidden defects, as distinguished from latent defects, would in fact subject him to the liability of an insurer, yet, for errors in the principle of construction, or a want of knowledge of the strength of material, as determined by physical laws, the master may be held responsible, on the ground that such principles and laws may be ascertained by care, and it is the duty of the master to ascertain them." Flynn v. Union Bridge Co. (1890) 42 Mo. App. 531.

In Twomey v. Swift (1896) 163 Mass. 273, where the plaintiff was injured by the breaking of a plank in a scaffold on a cold and blustering day, there was evidence that the only materials furnished by the defendants were hemlock boards of the thickness of $\frac{1}{4}$ of an inch, and that these are not suitable material for the construction of stagings; that such boards are usually of coarse grain; that in cold wet weather they readily fill with moisture and freeze, and become very brittle; that they are not as strong as spruce or pine, or many other kinds of lumber, and are not commonly used for staging, particularly in cold weather. A verdict for the plaintiff was sustained, the court saying: "It probably is true that hemlock lumber may be selected large enough, and of such quality, as to make a reasonably safe staging in any season of the year, but there was evidence not objected to that a carpenter of ordinary skill might not know the great danger of using hemlock boards as supports in the construction of stagings."

In Flynn v. Harlow (1892) 46 N. Y. S. R. 872, it was testified that a floor which gave way was subjected to more than twice the weight that the superintendent of buildings testified would bring the strain up to a breaking point. The court said: "This was, clearly, such an oversight, on the part of the defendant, . . . of existing and well-ascertainable facts, as to constitute negligence. The defendant was not warranted in ascertaining the full capacity of the floor as to strength by actual use in piling materials thereon. He must be presumed to have had a fair and reasonable knowledge of the business in which he was engaged, which includes a knowledge of at least the approximate strength of the floor timbers he had placed in the building, and a knowledge of the approximate weight of twelve or thirteen thousand bricks and a quantity of mortar that he had accumulated upon the floor."

It is the duty of one employed to superintend the construction of a shed to know what weight the roof will bear, and to remove snow and rubbish, which, if permitted to accumulate, is likely to cause it to fall. Johnson v. First Nat. Bank (1891) 70 Wis. 414.

The fact that a girder did fall from the beams of a building in course of construction affords some evidence that it was lying in such condition and position upon the beams that it was liable to be precipitated below, where the plaintiff was at work, if a moving body came in contact with it; and where the servants of the defendant knew it was there, and were fully advised it was loose, and that the irons which supported it were frosty and slippery, the fact that it actually fell should not be excluded from the jury in the consideration of the question of the alleged negligence of the defendant. Wight Fire Proofing Co. v. Poczekal (1889) 130 Ill. 139.

It is an obvious deduction from mechanical principle that the oscillating motions produced by the operation of a pile driver upon a trestle bridge must be highly detrimental to the structure, and a corresponding degree of care in the matter of frequently testing its strength and stability is incumbent on one who hires servants for such work. Bowen v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. (1888) 95 Mo. 268. Compare Ryan v. Fowler (1862) 24 N. Y. 410, 82 Am. Dec. 315, epitomized in subd. V. b, ante.

The fact that turpentine, into which the servant of a manufacturer of household utensils is required to plunge spoons just taken out of boiling grease, has never caught fire, will not relieve the master from liability, as the danger of ignition is one which should have been anticipated by a person having the technical knowledge which the manufacturer must have possessed. Latorra v. Central Stamping Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 145.

The owners of a quarry are not liable for injuries to an employee of a contractor to haul a load of stone from the quarry, from the breaking of a hook forming part of hoisting machinery furnished by them, where it was apparently sound and its defects could not have been discovered by an examination, and it was apparently sufficient for the purpose for which it was used, and had frequently been used for lifting blocks of the same size, and the breaking was caused by crystallization of the iron. Lyons v. Knowles (1893) (Cal.) 32 Pac. 883.

In Moynihan v. Hills Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 596, the fact that an iron rod had been subjected to a strain which tended to crystallize it was one of those which, when taken together, were held to justify the submission to the jury of the question whether the defendant was negligent.

In Tissue v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1886) 112 Pa. 91, 56 Am. Rep. 310, where the plaintiff was killed by the explosion of a dynamite magazine, the court stated the question for solution to be this: "Ought the company's superintendent to have shown that in placing the magazine where it was placed he was exposing the men engaged in operating the road, as well as others, to a danger to which they ought not to have been exposed?" and proceeded to discuss it as follows: "The question is not whether he did have knowledge of the peculiar properties of the material which he was intrusted to handle, for his ignorance in this particular would be no excuse for the company, but whether the agent thus intrusted ought to have been one who knew that dynamite was, from its nature, liable to accidental explosions such as could not be ordinarily foreseen or provided against. . . . There was a duty resting upon it to know, as far as it was possible to know, the character of the material which it placed in the hands of its agents. In this we are not to be understood as pronouncing upon the chemical characteristics of dynamite, for about it we know little or nothing, or as charging negligence on the company or its agents. The act of putting the magazine where it was may have been prudent, or at least not unreasonably imprudent, and the explosion may have been the result of an accident which no ordinary human foresight could provide against, hence, one for which no one can be held responsible. But, however this may be, the matter is, under all the evidence, for a jury, and to a jury it must be referred."

A railroad company which constructs a line skirting a mountain range and crossing numerous gulches and ravines is bound to know that sand, gravel, and other materials will be washed down these channels during the rainy season, and will probably accumulate on the upper side of the track to such an extent as to cover it, unless openings are provided for the purpose of allowing the debris to pass under the roadbed. Union P. R. Co. v. O'Brien (1892) 4 U. S. App. 221, 49 Fed. Rep. 538, 1 C. C. A. 354. Affirmed (1895) 161 U. S. 451, 40 L. ed. 766.

The master is chargeable with knowledge of everything that may happen under a favorable conjunction of circumstances, as a result of familiar natural laws, even though such result be unusual. Thus, a railroad company is liable to an employee killed through its negligence in failing to guard against the danger of ice being forced upon its track at a point where the stream has several times risen to the top of the tracks in floods, and where the track has once been washed away, although no ice has previously been washed upon the track. Scagel v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1891) 83 Iowa, 380. In Beardsley v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. (1895) 54 Minn. 504, 506, the court said that the defendant was bound to know that, with a low dasher in front, the almost inevitable result of bucking would be to suddenly hurl the motoneer upon the ground in front of the car, and thus to greatly imperil his life.

The fact that the timbers supporting a wash-tub, being constantly in a damp condition, will be apt to grow rotten, is sufficient notice to an employer of the necessity for watchfulness and for frequent inspections with a view to ascertain whether those timbers are capable of sustaining the strain to which they are subjected. Malone v. Hathaway (1875) 6 Thomp. & C. 1, 3 Hun, 553. This case was reversed in (1876) 64 N. Y. 5, 21 Am. Rep. 578, but merely on the ground that the carpenter charged with the duty of looking after the structure was a fellow servant of the plaintiff.

1. Previous operation of instrumentalities.

1. Efficient operation, inference from.

In view of that tendency to deterioration already adverted to, which is characteristic of all the inorganic agencies of business, it cannot be affirmed, as a universal principle, that an employer is entitled to infer, from the previous efficient operation of his instrumentalities, that such operation will continue.

The mere fact, therefore, that machinery has been used with safety for years, and is not obviously dangerous, will not justify a presumption that it will continue safe, and that its use may be continued, without examining it to ascertain if its safety may not be impaired from wear. Goodsell v. Taylor (1889) 41 Minn. 207, 4 L. B. A. 673.

Indeed, it is evident that all the decisions cited in this and the next two subdivisions are based on the theory that he is bound to take notice that the chances of his instrumentalities remaining in a safe condition steadily diminish in proportion to the period during which they have been used. It is a well-recognized principle, however, that the fact of an instrument having been safely used up to the time that it caused an injury to a servant and under circumstances substantially equivalent to those which prevailed when the injury was received, will tend more or less strongly to prove that the employer was not negligent in continuing to use it. It is so held in the following instances:

Where the machinery used in raising stone to a building became disconnected from lack of repair, but the employer is not proved to have had notice that it was out of order, and the apparatus had raised stones of ten times the weight of that which caused the injury. Richardson v. Cooper (1878) 88 Ill. 270.

Where a brakeman's clothes caught on a switch handle and threw him under a car as he was attempting to board the caboose after having thrown a switch, but the switch as constructed had been used five years without previous accident, and the natural inference from all the proof was that the accident was the result of a misstep, and not liable to occur again. Bivins v. Georgia P. R. Co. (1892) 96 Ala. 325.

Where the breaking of a wire pin caused an engineer to lose control of the throttle of his engine, resulting indirectly in an injury to a miner descending the shaft of a mine, but the wire pin had for seven years continuously and successfully served its use without any change, repair, substitution, or visible defect, and it gave no external indication of defect up to the time of the accident, and no defect therein was visible or known to the engineer, the mine inspector, or the employer. Bradbury v. Kingston Coal Co. (1893) 157 Pa. 231.

The question being whether the plaintiff's foot was caught by a splinter on the inside of a railroad track or rail, and as to whether the defendant is chargeable with negligence therefore, danger from such cause not being self-evident, it is competent for the defendant to show by experienced witnesses that such accidents have been unknown. Doyle v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1889) 42 Minn. 79 (syllabus by court).

Compare Burke v. Witherbee (1885) 98 N. Y. 562, where a mine owner was held not negligent as regards his operatives in continuing to use a hook for fastening cars to the hoisting cable, where such an apparatus had been employed in different mines, and had "under varying conditions, upon countless occasions, uniformly answered its purpose without injury to anyone."

The same principle has also been recognized in Lyons v. Knowles (1893) (Cal.) 82 Pac. 883.

A similar rule prevails where third persons are concerned. Laffin v. Buffalo & S. W. R. Co. (1887) 106 N. Y. 140, 60 Am. Rep. 433, where the general principle covering all cases of this class was thus laid down: The omission to provide against an accident which ought to have been foreseen, or which might reasonably have been anticipated, is actionable negligence, but, as a general rule, when an appliance or structure not obviously dangerous has been in daily use for years, and has uniformly proved adequate, safe, and convenient, its use may be continued without the imputation of culpable negligence.

2. Prior occurrences indicating defects.

The true ground on which evidence of previous accidents should be admitted or rejected in actions for negligence is that it is competent for the purpose of showing that the defendant had knowledge of the probability of the recurrence of similar accidents, but not for the purpose of proving that a specific danger existed at the time the plaintiff was injured. Malone v. Hawley (1873) 46 Cal. 409, where evidence that an elevator had previously fallen from the same cause as that to which the plaintiff's injury is traceable was admitted to show that the employer knew it might at any time fall again.

Compare Findlay Brewing Co. v. Bauer (1893) 50 Ohio St. 560, where it was said that evidence of the occurrence of accidents before the time at which the plaintiff was injured, owing to the defective condition of a machine, is admissible as tending to prove that the employer had knowledge of its condition, though it is not competent for the purpose of showing negligence at the time of the injury. Such evidence, therefore, being admissible to establish one of the necessary steps in the plaintiff's case, should not be excluded.

Cases illustrating this principle are the following:

Knowledge of a railroad company that a derrick constructed by it is sometimes left unfastened so as to swing over the track in a manner dangerous to employees, makes it liable for injury caused thereby to a trainman, although it did not know that it was unfastened at the time of the accident, and it had remained unfastened for a short time only. Gates v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1892) 2 S. D. 422. The court remarked that the negligence for which the defendant was held liable consisted, not in the precise condition of the derrick at the time of the accident, but in its failure to use care to keep it fastened after receiving constructive notice of what usually occurred when it was not in use.

Allowing slabs to accumulate so as to form a mass 80 feet square and 40 feet deep, in a slab burner, thereby causing it to fall by reason of the excessive heat suddenly engendered, is negligence rendering one liable for the death of a servant killed by its fall, where he had knowledge of the consequences to be expected, from having allowed a similar pile to accumulate five years before, which caused the burner to shrink and bulge out and nearly collapse. Faerber v. T. B. Scott Lumber Co. (1893) 86 Wis. 226.

A master is liable for injuries caused by the giving way of a decayed plank in a platform at the very place where it joined a new piece inserted by him after a previous break. Johnson v. Bellingham Bay Improv. Co. (1896) 13 Wash. 455.

The duty to furnish a safe place for servants to work extends, in the case of an inexperienced workman who has had no opportunity to acquire any knowledge of his surroundings, to taking proper precautions to prevent the fall of a boulder protruding from a bank of earth at the side of a cellar in process of excavation, in which he is set to work shoveling away earth that has accumulated on the cellar floor, where such bank has an insufficient slope and portions of it have from time to time fallen upon the floor. Byrne v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1894) 6 Misc. 441.

A railroad company is liable for injuries to a switchman from the derailment of an engine of extraordinary size at a curve of 14 degrees, constructed without elevating the outer or depressing the inner rail, where frequent derailments have occurred at the same place. St. Louis Bridge Co. v. Fellows (1893) 52 Ill. App. 504.

A railroad company is liable for the death of an employee engaged in coupling cars, who is struck by timbers projecting from a car owing to their having shifted after they had been reloaded because they had previously shifted, where no means were adopted to prevent such shifting. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Reardon (1894) 56 Ill. App. 642.

An employer may be held liable for injuries to one operating his elevator caused by its fall, where it had been in use eleven years, did not work well, had no counter weights, and parts of the machinery contained old breaks, even though such breaks could be discovered only by taking it apart. Bartley v. Trorlicht (1892) 49 Mo. App. 214.

In Beardsley v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. (1893) 54 Minn. 504, the court held that the evidence abundantly justified the jury in finding that the defendant corporation was guilty of negligence in causing a car to be used, where it had frequently "bucked" before to the knowledge of those to whom defendant had intrusted its primary duty of seeing to the condition of its cars.

Negligence may be inferred by a jury from the continued use of a chain long after its weakness has been demonstrated by actual breakage. Krogstad v. Northern P. R. Co. (1891) 46 Minn. 18.

In Ousley v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. (1890) 93 Ga. 538, the court said: "A jury could infer that a draw-bar was defective, it having failed in its proper functions twice out of three attempts at using it. It would not be unreasonable to conclude that an implement which proves inefficient in two thirds of the instances of its use is not a fit implement to be supplied by a railway company to those of its employees who are engaged in such hazardous service as coupling cars."

A railroad company used an engine which, owing to a leak in the throttle valve, was accustomed to move automatically and without warning. The plaintiff, an engine-cleaner, was ordered to go into the pit under the engine to clean it, and while he was doing so it suddenly moved back 3 feet and cut off his fingers. The company was held liable under special findings, that the engine was dangerous and unsafe for use and had been so for some considerable time; that the officers of the defendant and the person in charge of it did not exercise ordinary care and prudence to know its condition although it could have been known by the exercise of ordinary care. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holt (1893) 29 Kan. 149.

A city may be found negligent towards an employee in the court-house, if it permits boiler flues to be taken in through a high window with heavy frames, without looking after the condition of the frames when the work is finished, although after using other similar windows for a similar purpose the frames were so loosened as to need removal. Chicago v. Edson (1891) 43 Ill. App. 417.

Where it was discovered on the first day that a pile-driver was put into operation, that the wire rope supporting the hammer was apt, when slack, to get out of its place under the drum, it is for the jury to say whether the master's representative in charge of the work should not have ascertained that the rope had become broken and a dangerous object to touch with a mitted hand when liable to be set in motion without warning. Steen v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (1887) 37 Minn. 310.

In The Carolina (1886) 80 Fed. Rep. 199, the district judge decided that, as a hoisting rope had, according to the preponderance of testimony, broken the day before the accident, the officers of the ship were chargeable with knowledge of its unfitness.

Where several witnesses have testified that they had heard steam escaping from a boiler for a considerable period before it exploded and there is evidence that an employee had been engaged several times in calking the seam from which the steam escaped, and that the defendant's officers had been frequently in and about the boiler room, the jury is justified in finding that the defendant knew of the existence of the defect and was aware that the seam had been calked on different occasions. Ballard v. Hitchcock Mfg. Co. (1893) 71 Hun, 582, Affirmed without opinion in (1896) 145 N. Y. 619.

Evidence that tralmen had previously been injured by coming into collision with the same overhead bridge as that which injured the plaintiff is competent to show that the company had notice of the dangerous character of the structure. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Wright (1888) 115 Ind. 378.

Where the employer is charged with negligence in maintaining a structure so close to a tramway as to be dangerous to employees it is not error to admit evidence to the effect that, prior to the occurrence of the accident to the plaintiff, another servant had been caught between the structure and the tram-cars. Salem Stone & L. Co. v. Griffin (1894) 139 Ind. 141.

Evidence as to how an elevator by which an employee was injured behaved on former occasions,—that, at other times, when being operated by other persons, barrels, being lifted, had fallen and injured those operating it, or had simply fallen back, the conditions remaining substantially the same, tends to prove some vice in its construction that rendered its operation dangerous, and that the employer knew, or should have known, the fact. Findlay Paving Co. v. Bauer (1893) 50 Ohio St. 560. The court said: "Inspection itself may indicate some defect in a machine, affecting its safety or usefulness; but, as is most usually the case its defective character, whatever it may be, is more clearly observed in its operation. Experiment is the final and most conclusive test of its safety as well as of its usefulness; and the fact, that the carefulness of the party operating the machine may be involved in each instance, may affect the weight of the evidence, but not its admissibility, as such a limitation would exclude the result of every experiment offered in evidence, which would amount to a reductio ad absurdum."

The question whether a railroad company had notice of the dangerous condition of a switch is for the jury, where one of the switchmen has testified that it was out of repair, another that an engine always made a quick turn when it passed the point between the movable and the stationary rails, and another that the switch had worked hard on the morning of the day when the accident occurred. Harter v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1895) 55 Kan. 250.

The principle applied in the above cases is subject to the limitation that proof of a single defective or imperfect operation of any of such machinery or instrumentalities, resulting in injury, will not of itself be sufficient evidence, nor any evidence, that the company had previous knowledge or notice of any supposed or alleged defect, imperfection, or insufficiency in such machinery or instrumentalities. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wagner (1885) 33 Kan. 606, Cited with approval in Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Young (1896) 4 Kan. App. 219.

2. Defective operation of other appliances.

As a general rule it is clear that the failure of one appliance to work properly cannot be regarded as an occurrence which, of itself, is calculated to put an employee on inquiry regarding the condition of other appliances, however close may be the resemblance or connection between the former and the latter. To justify the inference that an employer is chargeable with notice through this channel, there must be something in the character of the previous accident which would create a suspicion in the mind of a prudent man that other parts of the defective instrumentality or other similar instrumentalities may also be in a dangerous condition. The following cases will show the extent to which the courts have gone in the application of this principle:

Notice to a railroad company that cars on passing over a certain place in its track had a jumping or jarring motion is not notice to it of a latent internal seam in a rail at that place, which subsequently caused the rail to split and break, when the motion of the cars did not suggest the defect in the rail. James v. Northern P. R. Co. (1891) 46 Minn. 168.

An employer's knowledge that the operation of a machine is defective, owing to the fact that the piston bends and, so, sticks in the cylinder, does not charge him with liability for another defect of which he has no knowledge, consisting of the tilting back of the cylinder of its own accord while the employee was filling it and the descent of the piston into it. Schuls v. Rohe (1896) 149 N. Y. 132.

In an action by a servant against a railroad company for injuries resulting from pieces of a hammer used by him to drive spikes breaking off and striking him, evidence that other hammers broke at the same work and at the same time does not show negligence in their selection, where there was no apparent defect. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Nelms (1889) 83 Ga. 70.

On the other hand, it cannot be charged, as a matter of law, that the purchaser of a railroad, which has notice that one abutment of a bridge in such road is constructed of poor mortar crumbling at the touch, and is so poorly built as to require it to be partially taken down to repair it, has the right, as to its employees, to assume that the other abutment constructed at the same time and by the same contractor is free from defects, and that its trains may be operated by its employees thereon with safety. Rogart v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1895) 145 N. Y. 283.

In Doyle v. White (1896) 9 App. Div. 521, on the question of negligence in using a defectively welded eye bolt to hold a span wire on a trolley line, error was urged in excluding the following question: "Did any of these ring bolts break the day or a day or two previous to this accident?" And then the question: "Previous to that?" The appellate court said: "The question first excluded was entirely incompetent, because the breaking of a similar bolt upon the day of the happening of the accident did not tend to prove that the defendant had notice prior to the accident that the bolts were defective. The next question is not subject to this criticism, because it refers to a time previous to the happening of the accident. But the difficulty with this question was that there was nothing to show that there was any intent to prove the breaking of more than one of these eye-bolts. There was no claim made by the counsel that he intended to prove the circumstances under which the breaking occurred, or that it was of such a character as to call the attention of the defendant to any defect in the eye-bolts. . . . The breaking of one eye-bolt was not evidence of the character of the lot, it appearing from the facts testified to upon the trial that the weakness resulted from an imperfect welding which could not be detected by examination, and which was not a defect of manufacture which would necessarily or probably run through the lot of eye-bolts bought."

In Mulvey v. Rhode Island Locomotive Works (1885) 14 R. I. 204, injury was due to the breaking of an elevator chain which had broken about six weeks before when, according to some of the evidence, although this was disputed, the person immediately in charge of the men using it notified the superintendent and asked for a new chain, but that, as none was supplied, he had the old one mended and used it again, though some of the links were worn. The ratchets, which should have caught and held the elevator did not work when the elevator fell either time. The court said: "We think the jury might find on this testimony that the corporation was negligent. There was certainly a debatable question of fact for the jury."

In an action by a stranger it has been held that a record of accidents which the trustees of a bridge belonging to a municipality require their officers to keep, is evidence against them for any legal purpose, and is competent to establish the fact that accidents of a character similar to that which caused the plaintiff's injury had happened at the same place. Rogers v. New York & B. Bridge (1896) 11 App. Div. 141.

Compare also the ruling in Richardson v. Great Eastern R. Co. (1875) L. R. 10 C. P. 486, 33 L. T. N. S. 248, Reversing (1875) L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 342, 24 Week. Rep. 907, that a railway company is not under the duty (as respects a passenger) of making a minute examination of the whole car "because defects have been discovered in some part of the cars which have no connection with the probable existence of defects in any other part of the cars."

g. Repairs and alterations.

Evidence that new ties were put into a track before the accident is not competent, upon the issue of a railroad company's negligence, unless it tends to show that the repairs were made at the place of the accident. Knapp v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. (1887) 71 Iowa, 41.

The fact that all drawheads of a pattern similar to that which caused the injury were being altered at the time of the accident tends to show that the railroad company was aware of the fact that they were dangerous to employees. Gibson v. Pacific R. Co. (1870) 46 Mo. 163, 2 Am. Rep. 497.

Evidence showing that, immediately after an accident, repairs were made in the fastenings of a switch-chain, is competent for the purpose of proving that a defect existed at the time of the accident, but does not show, nor tend to show, that the defendant had notice of the defect before the accident. Harter v. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. (1895) 55 Kan. 250.

Evidence of a change in the dimensions of a waterway does not of itself prove negligence; it does not prove that the railway company had notice of the insufficiency of the culvert prior to the accident, nor that it might have had such notice by the exercise of reasonable diligence, nor that it did not exercise such diligence. At most it only tends to prove, by way of admission and as a fact, that the culvert was too small, and that the company obtained knowledge of the same, not before, but after, the accident. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. v. Weaver (1886) 35 Kan. 412, 57 Am. Rep. 176.

To the same effect, see Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Young (1896) 4 Kan. App. 219; O'Donnell v. Baum (1889) 38 Mo. App. 245.

As to the inference which it is permissible to draw in actions by third persons from the making of repairs or the taking of precautions after the accident, see generally 3 Elliott, Railroads, § 1177. As such repairs do not show that defects were known prior to the accident, they are not pertinent to the subject of this note. 41 L. R. A.

VII. Duty of active inspection of instrumentalities when first used.

See also XVII. a. 6, post; XVIII. a. 6, post.

a. Rule where the employer is himself the manufacturer.

A master who himself manufactures and supplies an instrument is chargeable with such knowledge of its defects as ordinary care during such manufacture would have disclosed. Standard Oil Co. v. Bowker (1894) 141 Ind. 12.

So, a railroad company is liable for an injury caused by a defect in the original construction of a piece of machinery, where the parts which gave way were constructed in its own shops and the defect in question must have been obvious to those engaged in the work. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Carey (1897; Kan.) 49 Pac. 662.

Ordinarily the builder, and not the employer, is liable for the insufficiency of a structure, but where the employer is himself an engineer of skill, knowledge, and experience it is for the jury to say whether, if he had made a proper use of his endowments, he might not have seen that the structure was too weak for the purposes to which it was applied. Feltham v. England (1855) 4 Fost. & F. 460, per Cockburn, Ch. J.

It is also clear that, where the evidence establishes negligence in the original construction of an appliance (here a coal chute), it is necessary to prove that the employer had notice of its dangerous condition. Crown Coal Co. v. Hiles (1892) 43 Ill. App. 310, Citing Alexander v. Mt. Sterling (1874) 71 Ill. 369, where the court said: "For the proper construction of this sidewalk, it is not denied the town authorities were responsible. They should see to it that such structures are properly made and reasonably safe, and they must be kept so. They being the projectors of them and the builders of them, are, in law, held to a knowledge of their original condition. It would be absurd to say, that they must have notice of the original defect, when they themselves are the authors of the defect. Why notice to a party of original defects in a work he is bound to make safe and reasonably free from defects? The town being in fault at the outset, no notice was necessary."

So, it has been laid down that the original or permanent structure furnished by a master must be safe, irrespective of any question of examination and repairs. Stock v. La Boutilier (1897) 19 Misc. 112, Aff'd (1896) 18 Misc. 349.

This distinction is also referred to in Greenleaf v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1870) 29 Iowa, 14, 4 Am. Rep. 181, where the court said: "If this car was wanting in the appliances referred to by plaintiff at the time of its construction, and so continued when put and used upon the road, it would not be necessary to show further notice or knowledge thereof on defendant's part, or that of its agents, in order, thus far, to fix liability. If, however, it was at one time safe and convenient, that is, had all the conveniences reasonably necessary for the safety of employees, and they were removed by accident or otherwise, then it should be shown that defendant either had notice thereof, or ought to have had, by the use of ordinary care, before an employee could claim liability on account of such defect."

A railroad company, it has been held, is properly held liable where a brakeman was killed owing to the fracture of a brakeroad in which the evidence shows that there was a crack or flaw at the point where it passed through the clasp which is attached to the top of the car, and that the defect existed when the rod was originally placed in the car. Hickman v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1886) 22 Mo. App. 344. The report does not state whether the company was the manufacturer of its own cars or not, and it is, therefore, doubtful whether this case belongs to this or the following category.

It has even been said that if a car has become defective by use in the service of a company, notice of the defect is necessary to affect the company with liability, while if a defectively constructed car is used, notice is not necessary; and this rule is applicable to foreign, as well as to domestic cars. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Harris (1894) 58 Ill. App. 592, criticising instruction which made the defendant's liability depend on his knowledge, actual or imputed, of the fact that two foreign cars were so constructed that the buffers did not prevent the draw-bars from coming together. The court cited Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Avery (1884) 109 Ill. 814, and Sack v. Dolese (1891) 137 Ill. 129; but these do not support the broad principle laid down by the court—at least, if its words are to be taken in their literal meaning. It is submitted that this decision runs counter to the fundamental principle running through all cases of this type, that knowledge is one of the essential elements of negligence, and therefore cannot be correct.

The cases which merely involve dangerous qualities as contradistinguished from defects involve no difficulty. The employer must, at his peril, acquire a knowledge of the inherent characteristics of his agencies, and regulate his business accordingly. Hence whether he, when he furnishes for use an explosive like giant powder, is aware of its dangerous quality, or has not taken steps to acquire such knowledge, he is equally liable for injuries caused by it. Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. (1890) 42 N. J. L. 467, 36 Am. Rep. 535.

b. Rule where the employer is a mere purchaser of the appliance.

It is manifest that the employer must be liable, where the inefficiency of the appliance purchased is immediately due to his own or his agent's want of care. A jury is therefore justified in finding the defendant negligent where it appears from the evidence that his representative in ordering a chain omitted to inform the manufacturers for what use it was intended, "so that care in making it and testing it might be insured, and defects in it, if any, might be thus detected." Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Kiefer (1887) 26 Ill. App. 466.

So, too, it is universally agreed that it would be unreasonable to require an employer to subject his instrumentalities to tests as minute as can and ought to be applied by a manufacturer.

Thus it has been held that an employer is not liable for injuries caused by a latent defect in a bar of iron purchased from a reputable house, and used in making a hook, when he orders the best quality, and the defect could not have been discovered without resorting to extraordinary tests. Carlson v. Phoenix Bridge Co. (1890) 55 Hun, 485. The court said: "The case shows that such iron is tested in its manufacture to make it homogeneous, and that such is known to be the practice at all well-established mills. . . . A minute examination and test would have detected the latent defect in the iron in this case, yet the institution of 41 L. R. A.

such an examination would evidence extraordinary vigilance and caution, and that is not ever exacted from a master in respect to the provision of implements for his servant. . . .

There is no conceivable defect which may not be discovered by some possible test. The law is designed for application to the ordinary affairs of business and every-day life. All men are not scientists, and all are justified in acting upon certain assumptions and appearances. . . .

We do not test a harness or a wagon which we order from a reputable dealer before we use the same, and there were no circumstances surrounding the manufacture of the hook in question which would induce a prudent man to depart from the usual course of procedure, and adopt special and extraordinary precautions."

This judgment was affirmed by the court of appeals (1892) 132 N. Y. 273, which said: "When articles are manufactured by a process approved by use and experience, and apparently properly finished and stamped, it is not usual for them to be tested again in quality, and such examinations are not generally required by law. . . . All the best iron and steel is made in a few large establishments. The evidence shows that all practicable tests are used during the process of manufacture, and the completed product represents the best articles that can be produced. It passes into the hands of dealers, and so reaches the consumer. If the best refined iron is required, the purchaser may assume that the tests necessary to produce that article have been properly made and the work properly done. He must see that the work that he undertakes to do is properly performed, but if the tool breaks from an internal defect in the material, not apparent from an external examination of the iron, or in the process of making the tool, the master is no more responsible than he would be if he had purchased it ready made in the market, or if it had been broken from an external apparent defect produced by use of which he was not chargeable with knowledge."

In Ballard v. Hitchcock Mfg. Co. (1889) 51 Hun, 188, evidence had been given tending to show that the iron out of which a boiler was constructed was of an inferior quality, a fact which could be discovered only by cutting or breaking the metal; also that the rivet holes in the sheets of the boiler were not drilled true, and that the rivets did not properly fit them. And that this defect was discoverable only by taking the boiler apart by removing the rivets. The court said: "It was not defendant's duty, before putting the boiler in use, to make these examinations or tests, and it held the instructions to be erroneous, because the jury were left at liberty to find that this duty devolved upon the defendant, and to determine for themselves what tests the defendant was bound to apply, and what inspection to make, to bring itself fully up to a discharge of the obligations it owed the deceased."

To the same effect see Doyle v. White (1896) 9 App. Div. 521. Employer was held not liable for an injury to an employee caused by a defect in an eye-bolt from a reputable manufacturer where the defect could not be detected by an external examination.

In Stourbridge v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 129, the court seems to have been of opinion that the jury was not justified in finding the defendant guilty of negligence in regard to inspection, where a cross-beam which broke under the servant's weight presented no external indications of weakness, had been purchased of a reputable dealer, was of such a size as to be capable, if of ordinary soundness and strength, of bearing a weight several times greater than that of the servant, and it had been tested by striking it on the pavement and listening to the sound emitted, and by jumping on it or straining it between the spokes of wagon-wheels. But the case was finally made to turn on the theory that, if there was any negligence, it was that of a co-servant, not of the master.

In Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Toy (1879) 91 Ill. 474, the court held that the defendant was not liable for an explosion of a locomotive boiler, made of the best material by first-class manufacturers, when its appearance did not indicate its unsafe condition, and it had not been used long enough to create any suspicion thereof, while its defect could not have been discovered by any of the tests usually employed for the purpose, but only by cutting through its walls.

The doctrine laid down in Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Elliott (1860) 1 Coldw. 611, 78 Am. Dec. 508, that a railroad company is answerable for an injury resulting from defects in machinery which existed at the time of its construction, and which the manufacturer might have discovered by the exercise of due care, although the company did not, either at the time of the purchase or afterwards, discover the defects by the application of the proper tests, has been overruled in Nashville & D. R. Co. v. Jones (1871) 9 Helsk. 27.

So, also, it would be unfair to hold an employer responsible for the lack of technical knowledge, which is ordinarily possessed only by persons in certain lines of business, and which it would therefore be unjust to expect other persons to possess.

Upon this principle it has been held that a master, not an expert, is not chargeable with negligence in not learning of a defect in machinery of such a character as not to be apparent to any but an expert. Deane v. Roaring Fork Electric Light & P. Co. (1895) 5 Colo. App. 521.

This aspect of an employer's liability was carefully considered in Shea v. Wellington (1895) 163 Mass. 364, where it was held that the owner of a quarry owes no duty to its employees to inspect exploders given to the quarrymen for use, where the manufacturers of them make repeated inspections in the process of construction, the exploders are as good as any made, no one but an expert could make a competent inspection, and no defect in one has been discovered after use for several years. Plaintiff claimed that on the day of the accident he saw one with a seam in it, or one which exposed the mercury, but there was no evidence that an exploder of this kind with a seam in it, or with any other defect of construction, had ever before been discovered by anybody. In the same case the principle of Moynihan v. Hills (1887) 146 Mass. 586, and the other rulings which dealt with the master's duty to supervise the instrumentalities of his business with a view to discovering whether it was necessary to replace or repair them, was held inapplicable. The court said these exploders "were not a part of the machinery or tools of the defendant. They were articles to be used in his business which were instantly consumed in use. It was his duty, so far as he could do it by reasonable effort, to see that none but safe and proper articles were furnished to his servants for such a use, but he was only called upon to do what was reasonable under the circumstances."

In Reynolds v. Merchants' Woolen Co. (1897) 168 Mass. 501, the bursting of the cylinder of a dusting machine a few weeks after its purchase from a reputable maker was in question. It 41 L. R. A.

was held that if "a machine is bought of a reputable maker,—in other words, if reasonable care is used in selecting the maker, and then reasonable care was used upon the delivery of a machine, in inspecting it, in setting it up, in putting it in operation,—it cannot be said that the defendant, or an employer, would be liable in such a case, although it might clearly appear, later on, that the maker of that machine was careless, and put in improper materials, or did imperfect and improper work. The law does not make the employer an insurer of the safety of his machines, nor a guarantor that due care shall be used by the manufacturer. It does require, however, that he shall use reasonable care to provide proper machinery."

In Prentice v. Wellsville (1893) 60 N. Y. S. R. 557, the undisputed evidence was that defective cartridges by which an employee was injured were manufactured and sold as Van Campen's Compound by the people who for several years had been the accredited manufacturers of that article. The court said: "There was no evidence of negligence on the employer's part in failing to discover, if such was the fact, that the compound was not precisely what it was purported to be. All other risks than that were incident to the employment in which the deceased voluntarily engaged, and, so far as they related to him, were assumed by himself."

In Allison Mfg. Co. v. McCormick (1888) 118 Pa. 519, where an explosion of paint used in painting the interior of a water tank was involved, the court held that the master may provide materials such as are ordinarily used in the same business, but is not required to secure the best-known materials, or to subject such as he does provide to a chemical analysis in order to settle by experiment what remote and possible hazard may be incurred by their use,—and said: "The material employed was a well-known and commonly used brand of paint. It was purchased from the manufacturer ready for use. The laborers were sent to do the work under the direction of the company's painter, who went with them, placed the men, and gave them their directions. The paint had been in use by the public for many years, and by the defendant company for ten or twelve, without accident of any description. It is not easy to see what more could have been expected from an employer."

In Roughan v. Boston & L. Block Co. (1894) 161 Mass. 24, a block having a hidden flaw broke a month or two after it was put in use, in doing the work for which it was designed, thereby injuring an employee. The employer sued the manufacturer for breach of warranty. The court said: "The plaintiff was not under an absolute obligation to his servant that the block should not break. . . . The block was one of that class of implements which the employer is expected to buy; and the care he is bound to use in providing it is in making the selection, and includes such inspection as will detect defects which can be found by a careful inspection. But this does not require him to find a possible hidden flaw the presence of which there is no reason to apprehend, and which is so concealed in the construction of the machine that it cannot be discovered by inspection, nor does it make him responsible for such a flaw in the block which he has purchased with due care. Moynihan v. Hills Co. (1887) 146 Mass. 586, 594."

The following exposition of the principles which determine the liability of a railroad company to a passenger may be usefully compared with the foregoing judicial statements of the doctrine which is applied in actions by servants: "There is no principle of law which places such manufacturers in the position of agents or servants of their customers. The law does not contemplate that railroad companies will in general make their own cars or engines, and they purchase them in the market, of persons supposed to be competent dealers, just as they buy their other articles. All that they can reasonably be expected to do is to purchase such cars and other necessities as they have reason to believe will be safe and proper, giving them such inspection as is usual and practicable as they buy them. When they make such an examination, and discover no defects, they do all that is practicable, and it is no neglect to omit attempting what is impracticable. They have a right to assume that a dealer of good repute has also used such care as was incumbent on him, and that the articles purchased of him which seem right are right in fact. Any other rule would make them liable for what is not negligence, and put them practically on the footing of insurers. The law has never attempted to hold passenger carriers for anything which they could not avoid by their own diligence." Grand Rapids & I. R. Co. v. Huntley (1878) 38 Mich. 537, 31 Am. Rep. 521.

Similar principles are applied in favor of a person who engages the services of an independent contractor to erect a structure, the rule being that one who, having no knowledge of scaffold building, employs a builder whom he knows to be skillful and experienced to erect a scaffold for the use of his employees, does not owe them a duty of inspection, the proper performance of which would have disclosed the defect. Devlin v. Smith (1882) 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311, as explained in Vosburgh v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1884) 94 N. Y. 374, 46 Am. Rep. 148.

Devlin v. Smith was followed in Butler v. Townsend (1891) 126 N. Y. 105, and the effect of the two cases has quite recently been stated to be that, where an appliance (as a float) has been constructed by a skillful and experienced builder, the master is not liable to his servant for injury resulting in its construction, and is at liberty to accept the same without inspection. Wittemberg v. Friederich (1896) 8 App. Div. 423.

The liability of a railroad company in regard to the inspection of the structures on a road which it has purchased was extensively discussed in Vosburgh v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1884) 94 N. Y. 374, 46 Am. Rep. 148. The court rejected the contention that a railroad company acquiring by purchase an additional line already built and in operation, of which an existing bridge forms a part, owes no obligation to its employees running trains over such bridge, except to keep it as good as when it was bought, and has a right without negligence to assume the sufficiency of its original plan and construction; and denied the application of the doctrine of Devlin v. Smith (1882) 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311; for two reasons: Because the defendant here bought the bridge of another railroad company, and without any selection or choice of the builder such as was made in the scaffold case; and because the bridge, unlike the scaffold, was not a temporary but a permanent structure, intended for continuous use through the years. The court said: "Assuming, as we must, what the jury could have found from the evidence, that the bridge when purchased was unsafe and dangerous by reason of defects in its original plan and construction, and which defects were obvious to the eye of a skilled inspector, and easily and surely ascertainable by a structural analysis determining its factor of safety, it was negligence on the part of the defendant to continue its use in the face of such obvious defects without ascertaining their effect upon its strength and capacity. . . . The defects pointed out by the evidence were almost all obvious to the eye of a competent examiner. . . . The learned counsel for the appellant insists that the defendant did employ suitable and competent persons to inspect the bridge, who did make the usual and customary examinations, and that there is no dispute about that in the evidence. But it is plain that the inspection described in the proofs as customary is that made by a company which has built its own bridges. In such case it already knows the plan and mode of construction, and is already responsible for the lack of reasonable care in either the design or its execution. The subsequent inspection is directed only to its perfect repair, and to indications of weakness. But where the company does not know either the safety of the plan or the prudence of the construction because it has purchased it completed, and in use, and knows nothing of the skill or want of skill of the builder, an inspection which takes no heed of that inquiry when defects are obvious, and lack of safety is indicated and may be easily ascertained, is not sufficient. . . . Of course the test of actual, previous use goes for something. It might justify a continuance of that use until a competent inspection could reasonably be made, but would not justify a neglect when it was made to observe and remedy obvious defects and elements of danger, because existing in the original plan, and an omission to learn by a well-understood process whether in view of its apparent defects it had the ordinary surplus of strength.

With the principles enunciated in the above decisions may be compared the theory adopted in Baldwin v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1819) 50 Iowa, 680, that "the company receiving a loaded car from another company is entitled to the benefit of the presumption that such car had been properly constructed of suitable material and had passed the inspection of some one of ordinary skill in such matters, and was reasonably fit for the use to which it was devoted, when so received." (See, however, as to foreign cars, subd. VIII. g. 4, post.)

Some of the above cases seem scarcely reconcilable with the judgment in Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. (1890) 81 Mich. 423, in which the extent of the defendant's duty to test the strength of a chain was discussed. The court first laid down the general rule that railroad companies "cannot be held responsible for hidden defects in tools or appliances, if they have used reasonable care in procuring them; but they are not absolved from the duty of testing or inspection because they have bought in the open market of reputable dealers, or employed competent workmen to construct them. If any defect exists which a careful test or inspection would have discovered, the master must be held to have knowledge of such defect, and to be responsible for it." The court then proceeded thus: "It is urged that the railroad company has done all it can do when it buys of reputable dealers material and machinery for use by its employees; that it cannot, when buying, inspect personally every link of a chain to see whether it is properly welded. But it can do this personally as well as it can personally do any act involved in the operation of its road. It not only can, but its duty requires that it shall, before it is placed on a car, cause every link of every chain used by its employees in places or under circumstances involving danger, in case the chain should break, to be carefully tested and inspected by someone competent to judge of its fitness, for the utmost strain that is likely to come upon it. If this duty had been performed in this case, the cold weld in the chain would very likely have been discovered, and the chain condemned as unfit for its intended use."

If a purchaser is entitled to take for granted that an eyebolt is sound because it is apparently sound (Doyle v. White (1896) 9 App. Div. 521), it is not very clear why a railroad company should be obliged to apply a straining test to a chain. The Michigan rule, it is submitted, is more consonant than that of the courts of New York, with the general principle which is thoroughly established in the latter state that the master's duty to furnish reasonably safe instrumentalities is nonassignable. In a case where the safety of human beings is at stake it does not seem to be demanding too much of a purchaser to require him to apply every test that is available to one in his position. The scope of the duty thus imposed will not seem unreasonable when we remember that it will be circumscribed on the one side by the principle that no expert knowledge is imputed to a master except what is usually possessed by persons in the same line of business, and, on the other side, by the consideration that the duty of inspection would virtually be reduced to an absurdity if the employer were chargeable with notice of those latent and inherent defects which can be discovered only by an internal examination which it is in most cases impossible to make without seriously weakening the instrumentality or even totally destroying its usefulness until it has undergone a process of reconstruction. The standard of care thus indicated seems to be that which is recognized in the recent ruling by the Supreme Court of the United States, that "if a railroad company, after purchasing an engine [from a manufacturer of recognized standing], made such reasonable examination as was possible without tearing the machinery to pieces, and subjected it fully to all the ordinary tests which are applied for determining the efficiency and strength of completed engines, and such examination and tests disclosed no defect, it cannot, in an action by an employee of another company, be adjudged guilty of negligence because there was a latent defect, which subsequently caused the destruction of the engine and injury to him." Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Elliott (1893) 149 U. S. 268, 37 L. ed. 723.

The question to what extent the employer may rely upon the skill of the manufacturers is immaterial, where the employer is put upon inquiry as to the condition of an appliance by the report of an employee. Thus, in Delaney v. Hilton (1883) 18 Jones & S. 341, it was held that the servant could maintain an action for injuries caused by the breaking of a chain of an elevator bought from first-class machinists, where the engineer had previously stated to the employer's manager that the chain was not strong enough. [Sedgwick, Ch. J., dissented on the ground that the engineer's statement was merely the expression of an opinion, and that the employer was entitled to rely on the judgment of the machinists.]

a. General principles.

"Negligence on the part of the employer may consist of acts of omission or commission, and 41 L. R. A.

It necessarily follows that the continuing duty of supervision and inspection rests on the corporation. For it will not do to say that having furnished suitable and proper machinery and appliances the corporation can thereafter remain passive. The duty of inspection is affirmative and must be continuously fulfilled and positively performed." Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1880) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243.

"Not only is it the master's duty to furnish appliances reasonably safe for their use, but he is charged with knowledge of the tendency of such appliances to deteriorate with time, and to wear out with use. His duty is a continuing one, and requires him to keep constant supervision over such appliances, and to exercise at least ordinary care to maintain them in such condition as will make their use safe. Neglect of this duty whereby appliances become unsafe, is actionable, and the derelict master must respond in damages to those injured by reason thereof, who are themselves without fault." Louisville, E. & St. L. Consol. R. Co. v. Uts (1892) 133 Ind. 265.

"Ordinary care requires that the master shall take notice of the liability of the parts of his machinery to decay from age, or wear out by use." Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1884) 100 Ind. 181; Chicago R. Co. v. Brannan (1894) 10 Ind. App. 570.

There is no error in refusing a request to charge that when an appliance or machinery not obviously dangerous has been in daily use for a long time, and has uniformly proved safe and efficient, its use may be continued without the imputation of imprudence or carelessness. Houston v. Brush (1894) 66 Vt. 331. The court said: "It is a well-known fact that in time it [a derrick] will become out of repair and unfit for use. It is not the duty of the servant who is required to use it, to know at his peril when such time occurs. Such, however, is the duty of the master, and ordinary care must be used to ascertain whether it is fit to be used, and what is such care must be measured by the character of the business, and the risks attending its prosecution. Negligence on the part of the master may consist of acts of omission or commission, and it necessarily follows that the continuing duty of inspection and supervision rests on the master. It will not do to say that, having furnished suitable and proper machinery and appliances, the master can thereafter remain passive so long as they work well and seem safe. The duty of inspection is affirmative, and must be continuously fulfilled and positively performed. Anything short of this would not be ordinary care. Buzzell v. Laconia Mfg. Co. (1861) 48 Me. 113, 77 Am. Dec. 212, and note, p. 220; Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1880) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243."

"The legitimate obligation imposed upon the company by its contract with a passenger or employee is that its engine and apparatus are then suitable, sufficient, and as safe as care and skill can make them, and that the company will be responsible for any injury resulting from defects therein which might have been discovered by the company or its agents by the proper care and skill in the application of the ordinary and approved tests." Nashville & D. R. Co. v. Jones (1871) 9 Helsk 28.

"The servant has no more control of the repairs than of the purchase, no more responsibility for the one than for the other. The use of it is for him, and the risk of that use, whatever it may be, he assumes. That comes within his contract, but as part of the same contract the employer provides the means of carrying on the business; and as a matter of course he assumes the responsibility that his work shall be done with due care; and as the responsibility continues so long as the means are used, so must the same care be exercised in keeping the required means in the same safe condition as at first." Shanny v. Anuroscoggin Mills (1876) 66 Me. 420.

The duty of railroad companies to furnish and maintain reasonably safe and suitable machinery and appliances is not discharged by simply furnishing them, but they must be frequently and carefully inspected for the purpose of maintaining their safety and suitability. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Burnett (1892) 88 Va. 538.

A master is in duty bound to a servant to exercise reasonable care and skill to provide safe machinery and appliances, and to keep the same in safe condition, including the duty of making inspection and tests at proper intervals. Comben v. Belleville Stone Co. (1896) 59 N. J. L. 226.

A master is bound to "examine and inspect from time to time all the appliances which he furnishes his servant, if the safety of the latter depends upon their condition, and to use ordinary care and skill to discover and repair such defects as are calculated to imperil the servant in his employment." Chesson v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. (1896) 118 N. C. 59.

The master, being under duty not only to furnish safe and suitable appliances to his employees but to keep them in that condition, is bound to know the condition of his property so far as proper inspection will enable him to know it. Ocean S. S. Co. v. Matthews (1895) 86 Ga. 418.

A master is bound to use ordinary care in ascertaining the existence of latent defects in appliances which are to outward appearances safe. Southwestern Teleph. Co. v. Woughter (1892) 56 Ark. 208.

In Oberfelder v. Doran (1889) 26 Neb. 118, the court declined to accept the theory of the defendant's counsel that he was not obliged to make a proper examination and inspection of certain timbers from time to time, to ascertain whether they were still safe and sufficient to do their work, and declared that it was his duty to make such inspection, whether the defects which led to the injury were in the original construction or arose at a later period.

b. Inspection must be efficient.

"A master is chargeable with notice of a disorder or deficiency in anything which it is his duty to his servant to keep in reasonably safe condition, if a proper inspection would disclose its existence." Chesson v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. (1896) 118 N. C. 59.

"It is a general rule that any employer, whether corporate or not, must take care that there is no negligence in procuring safe machinery, appliances, etc., and the employer, whether corporate or not, must see that the machinery is kept in proper repair; at least reasonable and proper vigilance must be exercised to see that it is in proper condition for the purposes for which it is being used. Where business is carried on by such machinery as is used in operating the railroad it is the duty of the railroad company to keep the machinery in such condition as from the nature of the business and employment the servant has the right to expect it will be kept, and where the company fails to do so through the exercise of ordinary care it is liable for injuries arising from its neglect." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holt (1883) 29 Kan. 149.

"A railway company must have its repair shops to maintain its tools, rolling stock, etc., in good repair, and it must have its inspectors, not only at its terminal, where a general overhauling of property is had, but at convenient stations along its line, to detect such injuries as may have been received en route. And should such company knowingly employ and retain persons incompetent for the performance of this high service, it would be liable to the person injured, though such person were the fellow servant of the inspector." St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rice (1889) 51 Ark. 467, 4 L. R. A. 173.

In Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1891) 155 Mass. 21, the plaintiff offered to show that the train from the south, of which the car in question had formed a part, was not inspected on the day of the accident, and that there was a custom by which no inspection was made of cars coming from the south. The court held that the exclusion of this evidence was error, saying: Proof of an omission of duty or negligence, on the part of the inspectors on a single occasion, would properly have been excluded on the ground stated in Mackin's Case, ubi supra (1883) 135 Mass. 201, 46 Am. Rep. 456, that the inspectors were fellow servants with the plaintiff, but that evidence of the custom to make no inspection of such cars would have a tendency to show the rules, instructions, and superintendence under which the inspectors were acting, and would be proper for the consideration of the jury, as foundation for the argument that such rules, etc., were insufficient to provide proper inspection.

A railroad corporation is liable to one of its employees for an injury occasioned to him by being struck by a bridge guard, if the guard is out of its proper position, and this is caused by the wearing out of a rope attached to the guard, and the corporation has not made suitable provision to have notice of, and to remedy, the defect liable to be occasioned by its use. Warden v. Old Colony R. Co. (1884) 137 Mass. 204.

"When two cars come together which are of different gauge the drawheads are more apt to pass each other, and hence in trains made up of cars of different gauge it is obviously more important that the bumpers should be well looked to, so that they may afford the protection for which they are intended." Gottlieb v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1885) 100 N. Y. 462.

The company cannot avoid its liability on the plea that the defect was not apparent on a previous inspection of the car, where it had no rules requiring the inspection of the stakes and load, and the inspection given was casual. Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1887) 107 N. Y. 374.

Where the evidence tends to show that, considering the number of cars to be examined there were not enough inspectors to make a proper inspection of the cars passing through a certain junction; that the thoroughness of the work depended upon the amount of time they had at their disposal and the labor to be done; that better inspection was required at such a station than at way stations,—it is a fair inference that the inspectors did not have sufficient time at their disposal to discover the defects in cars and machinery examined by them. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Dwyer (1886) 36 Kan. 58. Respecting a custom or practice of the inspectors to do nothing more than to make a casual examination of brake-staffs which were straight and apparently all right, by which it was not probable a crack or break of the kind stated would be observable, the court said: "Upon the grounds of public policy a practice or custom which would permit the inspectors to let a car be operated with a defective brake-staff when by the exercise of reasonable and proper care on their part the defect could have been discovered and remedied, can hardly be sustained as a valid custom. (Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holt (1888) 20 Kan. 149; Berg v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1890) 50 Wis. 419.) If a brake-staff is not to be examined for visible defects or cracks until it is bent or broken, inspection would be almost useless; in any event it would be no protection for the safety of the employees using the brake."

The establishment by a railroad company of a rule for the inspection of loaded cars before they are sent out is not proved by the testimony of an employee having charge of the business at a station, that he considered it a part of his duty to make such inspection and so instructed the men under him, and that it was his custom to give such instructions,—especially where it is possible the fault of such person in failing to inspect such car caused the accident for which recovery is sought, and he is contradicted by two witnesses. Byrnes v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1893) 71 Hun, 200.

On the other hand, a railroad company which has performed its duty of inspecting a car "with ordinary care is not liable for an injury to an employee caused by the defect which existed, but was not discovered, at the time of inspection, unless it had knowledge of such defect." Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1896) 146 Ind. 564.

A street-car company may properly be held liable for injuries due to the "bucking" of a car caused by the old and worn-out condition of one of the electrical fields, when, through either negligence or ignorance of those in charge of this department of its business, or through its own neglect to furnish them with proper instrumentalities for the purpose, no proper tests had been applied to ascertain the condition of these fields, and no proper care had been exercised in renewing or replacing such as had been worn out. Beardsley v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. (1893) 54 Minn. 504.

Where an inspection of a locomotive lever, which causes injury by jumping out of the notch in which it is placed when reversed, is made merely by an examination of the part, and not by a practical test with the engine in motion, the fact that no defect is thus disclosed is not conclusive, and it is properly left to the jury to say whether the lever became detached by reason of the carelessness of the engineer or of some defect. Burlington & M. R. Co. v. Wallace (1889) 28 Neb. 179.

It is error to nonsuit a plaintiff, whose intestate was killed through the fall of a quantity of wheat from the sides of an elevator bin, where the liability of the wheat to accumulate, and the consequent peril to those working in the bin, were well known to the defendant's vice principal. It is for the jury to say whether there was a proper inspection before the intestate was sent inside the bin, and whether the omission to make suitable regulations prescribing the conditions under which servants should be permitted to go to work in such a place caused the accident. McGovern v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1890) 123 N. Y. 280.

In Connors v. Durite Mfg. Co. (1892) 156 Mass. 163, the question was as to negligence in continuing to use a defective engine, bought second-hand, about two months before the accident, after use for twelve or thirteen years. It had been partially overhauled by the seller before it was set up in the defendant's factory; 41 L. R. A.

and a few weeks after it was set some repairs were made upon it by an employee of the seller, at the request of the defendant. This employee, however, did nothing to the throttle-valve, and did not examine it to see if it leaked, although he testified that he noticed that the cut-off valve had a tendency to hang, and not to shut off as intended, and that this defect, in combination with a leaky throttle-valve, would make it possible for the engine to start after it was at rest. There was also evidence that the wear and tear which would produce the condition of things which caused the defendant to send for the employee of the seller of the engine would tend to cause a leaking throttle-valve. Down to the time of the accident no inspection was made of the throttle-valve, although this could readily have been done. The court held that the mere fact of the engine's having been overhauled and repaired did not necessarily exempt the defendant from liability,—citing Myers v. Hudson Iron Co. (1889) 150 Mass. 125, where the defendant, to show due care on its part, relied on the fact that, three weeks before the accident which was the subject of inquiry, a machinist had been employed to put the machine in good order, and quoting the following sentence from the opinion of the court in that case: "But if he failed to do so, and if after the completion of his work defects remained, the defendant was responsible, although it may have had reason to suppose him well qualified for his duty."

The inspectors employed must be reasonably competent for the performance of their duties. But a railroad company is not liable for the death of an engineer by the explosion of a boiler because it employs to test the boiler for broken stay bolts an inspector who is partly deaf in one ear, but whose hearing is good enough to determine whether a bolt struck with a hammer is sound or broken. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. DuBois (1896) 65 Ill. App. 142.

The staff of inspectors must also be sufficient in number. Thus, it is the duty of a railway company to keep at command a force of servants sufficient in number and capacity to discover defects in its bridges and apply the proper remedy. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1873) 68 Ill. 561.

But evidence that a sufficient force of car inspectors was not employed, and that one of the inspectors sometimes got drunk when on duty, is not sufficient to authorize a recovery against the company for an injury to a brakeman caused by a defective appliance on a car, where it is shown that the train was actually inspected. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Gaines (1890; Ark.) 13 S. W. 740.

Inspection, however, is merely a means towards an end, and if knowledge of a defect such as the inspection was designed to reveal has reached the master or his representative through some other channel, the mere fact that inspection has been duly provided for will not absolve the master.

Thus, the fact that a railway company employs an inspector to examine lumber out of which handles for its handcars are constructed does not relieve it from liability for an injury caused by placing unsuitable material in a handle, where the agent to whom it has intrusted the business of making and placing the handles in the cars has notice of the defect. Indiana, I. & L. R. Co. v. Snyder (1894) 140 Ind. 647.

So, a master is liable for injuries to a servant, caused by an elevator known to him, but not to the servant, to be dangerous, though an inspection is provided for,—especially when the servant is told by the master's engineer to use it as it is. Hart v. Naumburg (1888) 50 Hun, 392.

c. What degree of care must be exercised in the inspection.

See also cases cited under III., supra.

All the general statements in which the courts have essayed to define the degree of care which is incumbent on an employer in regard to inspection are merely variations on the theme of the fundamental principle that the inspection must be such as a man of average caution would make under the circumstances. But it will be useful for purposes of illustration to collect a number of the expressions used by judges in dealing with cases of this type.

The degree of care exacted of the master in respect to the maintenance of appliances is the same as that exacted in respect to furnishing them. Chicago, K. & W. R. Co. v. Blevins (1891) 46 Kan. 370.

An employer is bound from time to time, as occasion may require, to have the machinery which he uses subjected to a reasonably careful inspection for the purpose of ascertaining whether the wear and tear incident to its use have rendered it unsafe. Murphy v. Phillips (1870) 24 Week. Rep. 647, 35 L. T. N. S. 477.

"It cannot be contended that a test ought not to be adopted, if it be a useful one and may reasonably be expected to bring about the result, because it is not absolutely fixed." Channell, B., in Manser v. Eastern Counties R. Co. (1861) 3 L. T. N. S. 585.

Where a servant has been injured by an appliance put into use after it has been repaired, the inquiry whether the employer has been negligent in the premises involves the consideration of the question whether a reasonably practical test has been employed for the purpose of ascertaining its condition. Scherer v. Holly Mfg. Co. (1895) 86 Hun, 37.

"The result to be attained [by the master] is reasonable safety considering the consequences of a failure." St. Louis Bridge Co. v. Fellows, (1893) 52 Ill. App. 504.

A master is bound to use only such care as the circumstances reasonably demand, to see that appliances furnished to the servant are reasonably safe for use, and that they are afterwards maintained in such reasonably safe condition. Lincoln Street R. Co. v. Cox (1896) 48 Neb. 807.

A servant takes the risk of such secret defects as cannot be discovered by the use of ordinary diligence, and no more. Jones v. Shaw (1897) (Tex. Civ. App.) 41 S. W. 690.

"It is the duty of the master to exercise reasonable care to furnish reasonably safe places in which, and appliances with which, the servants are to work, and to exercise the same care to keep them in such condition." Pennsylvania Co. v. Witte (1890) 15 Ind. App. 583, Rehearing Denied in (1896) 44 N. E. 377.

The implied agreement of a master is that the implements and machinery furnished for the use of his servants "are sound and fit for the purpose intended, so far as ordinary prudence can discover." Lake Shore & M. S. E. Co. v. McCormick (1881) 74 Ind. 440.

An employer is chargeable with notice of defects which might have been known "by the use of such care as a person of ordinary prudence, would have used under similar circumstances." Missouri P. R. Co. v. Henry (1889) 75 Tex. 220.

The master does not insure the safety of appliances furnished by him, but is only bound to reasonable care in their selection, and inspection, if inspection is needed. Brown v. Hershey Land & Lumber Co. (1890) 65 Mo. App. 162. 41 L. R. A.

When a railroad company has erected a structure to be used in its ordinary and accustomed business, without fault as to plan, mode of construction, and character of materials, so that it was originally sufficient for all the purposes for which it is used, employs skilful and trustworthy agents to supervise, examine, and test it, and that duty is performed with frequency and with such tests as custom and experience have sanctioned and prescribed, it has exercised such care and skill as the law exacts of an employer in reference to his employee, and no liability can attach to the company for a defect in such structure by which an employee has sustained an injury unless there has been actual notice or knowledge that defects existed which, unless promptly remedied, would be liable to produce serious or fatal consequences. "A broader liability than this cannot be imposed without . . . breaking down and obliterating the distinction which exists between the responsibility incurred to a passenger and an employee. . . . A different and more stringent rule . . . would impose an intolerable burden upon a board of directors." Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468.

"The managers of railroad companies are engaged in conducting for profit a business which at the best is hazardous to human life. In providing sound tools and safe appliances for the use of their employees, their plain legal duty, to say nothing of the dictates of humanity, requires great vigilance. They cannot be heard to excuse themselves from taking all reasonable care on the ground that care involves labor or expense." Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. (1890) 81 Mich. 423, Citing Beauchamp v. Saginaw Min. Co. (1883) 50 Mich. 103, 45 Am. Rep. 30.

In Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, it was held, in respect to the safety of a railroad bridge, that the care and diligence which directors were required to bestow was that reasonable care, skill, and foresight over the affairs of the corporation which reasonable and prudent men occupying such positions ordinarily exercise under the same circumstances.

The subjoined list of phrases will indicate sufficiently the standard of diligence which the courts have had in view in determining whether the employer has discharged his duty as to inspection.

"Reasonable care and prudence." Washington & G. R. Co. v. McDade (1889) 135 U. S. 554, 34 L. ed. 235.

"Reasonable care." Brown v. Hershey Land & Lumber Co. (1890) 65 Mo. App. 162; Tierney v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1886) 33 Minn. 311, 53 Am. Rep. 35; Moore v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1895) 167 Pa. 495.

"Ordinary care." Smoot v. Mobile & M. R. Co. (1880) 67 Ala. 13; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Stillphant (1888) 70 Tex. 623; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hilliard (1896) 18 Ky. L. Rep. 505; Gulf, C. & S. F. R. Co. v. Wells (1891) 81 Tex. 685; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Corcoran (1895) 3 Ohio Dec. 641; Burnes v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (1895) 129 Mo. 41; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holt (1883) 29 Kan. 149; Williams v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1893) 119 Mo. 316; Greenleaf v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1870) 29 Iowa, 14, 4 Am. Rep. 181; Consolidated Coal Co. v. Scheller (1891) 42 Ill. App. 619.

What is "ordinary care" must be measured by the character of the business and the risks attending its prosecution. Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1880) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243.

"Ordinary diligence." Quintana v. Consolidated Kansas City Smelting & Ref. Co. (1896; Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 369.

"Ordinary and reasonable care." Carlson v. Phoenix Bridge Co. (1890) 55 Hun, 485.

"Reasonable and ordinary care and foresight." Covey v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1885) 86 Mo. 635.

"Reasonable and ordinary care and prudence." Gibson v. Pacific R. Co. (1870) 46 Mo. 163, 2 Am. Rep. 497.

"Ordinary care and skill." Chesson v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. (1896) 118 N. C. 59.

"Reasonable and proper vigilance." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holt (1883) 29 Kan. 149.

"Ordinary care and diligence." Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468.

"Ordinary care, skill, and diligence." Trinity County Lumber Co. v. Denham (1892) 85 Tex. 58.

In Brymer v. Southern P. Co. (1891) 90 Cal. 493, an instruction had been asked for which described the employer's standard of duty as being the exercise of "reasonable and ordinary care, skill, and diligence." The court said: "When the employer exercises all the care and caution which a prudent man would ordinarily take for the safety and protection of his own person under the same circumstances, he cannot be held liable for the consequences of a defect in the machinery or appliances used. This is the sense in which the expression 'reasonable and ordinary care, skill, and diligence' in procuring and furnishing suitable and safe machinery and appliances, was used in the instruction asked, as we understand it; and is equivalent to the rule as stated in many of the authorities, viz., that the employer is liable only when he had knowledge of the defect, or failed to exercise reasonable diligence in procuring suitable machinery, or in the inspection of it, to discover any defect that might exist."

The liability of the master may also be expressed by a slightly different phraseology which couples some qualifying epithet with the word which denotes the process of inspection itself. The following instances of such phraseology are rather wanting in precision, the conception of due care being in a sense latent, but the meaning is clear.

"Ordinary inspection." Cowan v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1891) 80 Wis. 284; McKnight v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1890) 44 Minn. 181; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Penfold (1896) 57 Kan. 148; Flood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1892) 43 N. Y. S. 802.

"Proper inspection." Sack v. Dolese (1891) 137 Ill. 129; Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1885) 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755; Benzing v. Steinway (1886) 101 N. Y. 547; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Binlon (1894) 107 Ala. 645.

"Proper examination." Mayer v. Libmann (1897) 16 App. Div. 54; Johnson v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1879) 81 N. C. 453.

"Reasonable inspection." Linton Coal & Minn. Co. v. Persons (1894) 11 Ind. App. 264; Parsons v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 94 Mo. 288.

"Reasonable examination." Mulligan v. Crimmins (1894) 75 Hun, 578.

"Proper tests." Beardsley v. Minneapolis Street R. Co. (1893) 54 Minn. 504.

In the following expressions of the same type as the foregoing the standard of due care again emerges:

"Careful inspection." Spicer v. South Boston Iron Co. (1885) 138 Mass. 426.

In Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Burnett (1892) 88 Va. 538, respecting an injury caused by a defect in the chain on the brake of defendant's cars, "a careful inspection" of the chain and brake was held necessary, and the jury so instructed. "The duty to give this instruction," said the court, "was all the more incumbent in view of the rule of the defendant company requiring the brakes, etc., of all cars transferred to their track to be inspected. If inspected at all, the inspection must of necessity be a 'careful' one, else it would be valueless for the purposes in view."

"Reasonably careful inspection." Parsons v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 94 Mo. 288.

"Careful and prudent examination." Perry v. Rogers (1895) 91 Hun, 243.

"Reasonable, proper, and careful examination." Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hilliard (1896) 18 Ky. L. Rep. 505.

"Careful tests." Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. (1890) 81 Mich. 423.

"Reasonable and usual tests." Smith v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1877) 42 Wis. 520.

"Careful and skillful application of the ordinary and approved tests." Nashville & D. R. Co. v. Jones (1871) 9 Helsk. 28.

"Ordinary care and diligence, which is the acknowledged measure of the master's obligation, does not require the application of unusual tests, nor the employment of the utmost possible safeguards." Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468.

"The legitimate obligation imposed upon the company by its contract with a passenger or employee is that its engines and apparatus are then suitable, sufficient, and as safe as care and skill can make them, and that the company will be responsible for any injury resulting from defects therein which might have been discovered by the company or its agents by the proper care and skill in the application of the ordinary and approved tests. If the defects are such that they could not be discovered by the company or agents after a careful and skillful application of the ordinary and approved tests, then the company cannot be held responsible, although it may appear that the defects might have been discovered by the manufacturers by applying the proper tests." Nashville & D. R. Co. v. Jones (1871) 9 Helsk. 28, 42.

The general rule is that the question whether the master has fulfilled his duty in regard to inspection is for the jury. Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1891) 155 Mass. 21; Caruthers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1895) 55 Kan. 600; Coontz v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1894) 121 Mo. 652; Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Young (1896) 4 Kan. App. 219; Standard Oil Co. v. Bowker (1894) 141 Ind. 12; Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Klefer (1887) 26 Ill. App. 466; Toy v. United States Cartridge Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 313; Dedrick v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1886) 21 Mo. App. 433; Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1880) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243; Fuchs v. Wm. H. Sweeney Mfg. Co. (1890) 84 N. Y. S. R. 925.

In McKnight v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1890) 44 Minn. 141, the court said: "If the plaintiff's testimony was truthful,—and his credibility was for the jury to pass upon,—it justified the conclusion that the defendant was chargeable with negligence in suffering the car to remain in use with a defect, visible upon ordinary inspection, of such a nature as to endanger the safety of those who would certainly come into close proximity to it in the dangerous operation of coupling cars. The nature of the break in this iron, its precise location, and the degree of probability that it might catch the clothing in the process of coupling, were all more apparent to the jury and to the trial court than they are to us; for a full sized and accurate model of the draw-head was presented on the trial, the place and shape of the fracture were shown to the jury, and the natural position of one's hand and arm in making a coupling were shown with the aid of the model. We certainly cannot say that the defect was not of an apparently dangerous character, and that this feature of the case did not justify the conclusion of negligence."

The negligence of the employer is a question for the jury, where it is in evidence, on the one hand, that the iron of a chain supporting an elevator was worn down in the link which broke to one third of its original thickness, and at another place had been worn even thinner; and, on the other hand, that the chain was new when it was put up, and that, after it broke, a slight flaw was found at the place of fracture, which could not have been discovered at the time its use began. Hackett v. Middlesex Mfg. Co. (1869) 101 Mass. 101.

The case is not the less one for the jury for the reason that the preponderance of the testimony, whether measured by the numbers of the witnesses, or the comparative credit which the court may think to be due to each, is in favor of one litigant. Thus, it has been held that the case must be left to the jury where there is much testimony showing that a car stake was apparently sound, and that there was no defect about it which could be discovered by a reasonably careful inspection, but one witness testifies that the outside of the stake was "spongy and like a cork where it had been shaved off with an ax." Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1885) 37 Hun, 104.

The question whether the master failed to perform his duty as to inspecting cannot be taken from the jury where one witness testifies that one of the usual methods of ascertaining the soundness of the appliance under consideration was omitted, although other witnesses who appear to be entitled to greater credit testify that the best tests were employed, and that the imperfection which caused the injury could not have been discovered by reasonable care and diligence. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Harper (1884) 44 Ark. 524.

In Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1896) 146 Ind. 564, a special verdict was set aside on the ground that it did not find facts sufficient to sustain judgment. "This court cannot," it was declared, "say, as a matter of law, that the car could not have been inspected properly in less than five minutes, or that it was necessary to use tools or other manual tests." Neither are their any facts found from which we can determine whether the standard of inspection designated as an 'efficient and proper inspection and examination thereof,' and 'a reasonable and ordinary inspection thereof,' is the one required by law. In making an inspection, it is the duty of the inspector to use the usual and ordinary tests, such tools as persons of ordinary prudence use, if any, under like circumstances. No man is held to a higher degree of skill or care than a fair average of his trade or profession, and the standard of due care is the conduct of the average prudent man. If the inspection is made in the usual and ordinary way, the way commonly adopted by those in like business, it cannot be said that it was done negligently. In determining whether an inspection was made with ordinary care, a jury can only find facts showing whether the same was made in the usual and ordinary manner, the one commonly adopted by men of ordinary care and prudence, engaged in the same business under like circumstances. If it was so performed it was made with due care, and a jury cannot be permitted to say that it was negligent. They cannot be allowed to set up a standard which shall, in effect, dictate the customs or control the business of a community. Titus v. Bradford, B. & K. R. Co. (1890) 138 Pa. 618; Delaware River Ironship Bldg. & E. Works v. Nuttall (1888) 119 Pa. 149; Tuttle v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. (1887) 122 U. S. 194, 80 L. ed. 1116. The finding 'that to have made an efficient and proper inspection and examination thereof would have taken fifteen minutes' is a mere conclusion. The standard thus fixed by the jury may be predicated upon the proposition that such searching and critical inspection must be made as would insure absolute safety to the employees. This, as we have shown, is not required. Facts, not conclusions, must be stated. The special verdict should state such facts as would show whether the inspection made was such as is usually made under like circumstances by inspectors of ordinary care and prudence, and this would include all facts showing whether the inspection was such as the time, place, means, opportunity, and the requirements and exigencies of the traffic will permit."

Where an injured servant has given evidence to show that a machine which he was cleaning would sometimes start of itself through the shifting of a belt from a loose to a fixed pulley, a jury may properly find that a due examination would have disclosed its imperfection. Douahue v. Drown (1891) 154 Mass. 21.

d. As affected by the length of time used.

The basis of the duty of inspection being the tendency of appliances to deteriorate while in use, it is manifest that the necessity for vigilance on the employer's part constantly increases the longer that use continues. After the end of fifteen years a common wooden trestle bridge, uncovered and unpainted, must be expected to be in a state of decay, demanding the utmost vigilance of the company. Toledo, F. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1878) 68 Ill. 561.

In Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, a bridge fell after about nine and a half years' use. The evidence showed that bridges of similar construction and materials upon the defendant's road had stood over ten years, and were considered, and to all appearances were, sound and safe; some had stood over fourteen years, and one over seventeen years, in the same condition. Although some of the witnesses for the plaintiff testified that they would not consider such a bridge as safe beyond the period of seven or eight years, yet the court said that if, upon adequate and repeated inspection and the application of appropriate tests, no defect was exhibited, a mere opinion as to the length of time such a bridge might be expected to stand would have no appreciable weight in the scale of evidence. It was held that there was no conflict of evidence as to the care and skill used in the inspection as well as the construction and maintenance of this bridge and the absolute want of any actual notice of any defect, real or suspected, therein and that it was the duty of the court to take the case from the jury, and hold that, on the established facts, the plaintiff could not recover, but that, at all events, the defendant was entitled to the instruction the counsel asked, to wit, that, in order to charge the defendant, it was necessary for the plaintiff to show that the decay in the bridge, if it fell from decay, was known, by some notice or otherwise, to the president and directors of the road.

In Lehigh Valley Coal Co. v. Kiszal (1897) 53 U. S. App. 265, 80 Fed. Rep. 470, 25 C. C. A. 566, the defendant called witnesses to testify in regard to the usual duration of the life of a boiler. One said: "I have known some of them [the Hazelton boilers] to last eighteen or twenty years." Another said that they lasted from twenty to twenty-two years. Another said: "I have known them to last twenty years." The exploded boiler was eighteen years old. Experts thought the crack and the resulting explosion were due to the unequal expansion of the bottom and the top of the boiler, caused by too sudden and hot a fire when the boiler was cold and the masonry was still damp, and there was not enough water in the boiler. The court said: "Upon this state of the evidence, especially in regard to the time when a boiler must be expected to wear out, the question of an unsoundness which ought to have been ascertained by the defendant's agents or representatives could not be taken from the jury. . . . The question of a defendant's liability for the defects of old machinery turns upon the continued exercise of due care, for its duty to its employees is only discharged when its agents whose business it is to supply such instrumentalities exercise due care, as well in their purchase originally as in keeping and maintaining them in such condition as to be reasonably and adequately safe for use by employees." Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1879) 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612. It was a question of moment in this case whether, if this boiler was defective, its condition, after eighteen years of use, ought not to have been previously ascertained by the defendant."

In Baker v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. (1880) 95 Pa. 211, 40 Am. Rep. 634, the court, after referring to the rules which absolve an employer from liability if the servant knew or ought to have known of the defect which caused his injury, proceeded as follows: "But do these rules apply to such an instrument as a rope used in a derrick which is employed in raising heavy weights? No doubt a perfectly new rope, and one to all appearances sound, may break, and the master would not be responsible for the consequence, having furnished a rope of the proper size for the purpose, to all appearance sound. But there was evidence in this case, sufficient certainly to make a question for the jury, that such a rope after having been used for a year or more, and exposed during that time, as the one in question seems to have been, was no longer a safe rope, even though it did not outwardly exhibit any signs of decay. The master is bound to know that a rope under such circumstances will only last a limited time. It will not do for him to furnish a sound rope and then fold his arms until by actually breaking it is demonstrated to be insecure. It will not do to say that the servant is bound to know this as well as his master, and to warn him that after such a time he ought to procure a new rope. Is the servant bound to notify the master of that which he knows or ought to know himself without such information? He knows how long the rope has been in use. The servant may not know. In this case the deceased did not know. It appears to have been the first day that he worked on the derrick. There was nothing to attract his notice in the outward appearance to show how long it had been in use. It is the duty of employers to renew instruments of this character at proper intervals. The expense would certainly not be great, and a due regard to the lives of their servants imperatively demands it."

The court will not assume, as a matter of law, that the decay of the timbers of a bridge, being necessarily gradual, could always be ascertained by the use of due diligence. That is wholly a question of fact, and instructions withdrawing it from the jury are erroneous. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1871) 61 Ill. 162.

e. Frequency with which inspections should be made.

Consult also the cases in VI., d, supra.

1. Generally.

How often an inspection should be made depends entirely upon the character of the instrumentality and the length of time during which it may reasonably be presumed that it will remain in that normal condition in which it must, for the purposes of the inquiry, be supposed to have been found at the last preceding examination. The rules laid down by the courts on the subject must, therefore, necessarily be quite vague and general.

A railroad company is bound to examine a locomotive after it has been in service as long as it can with safety be used without examination and overhauling. Sloux City & P. R. Co. v. Finlayson (1884) 16 Neb. 578, 49 Am. Rep. 724.

The duty of an employer who keeps a boiler in a building in which employees are at work is to use such reasonable care to inspect it from time to time as may be necessary to enable him to see that it is in a reasonably safe condition and free from defects rendering it unsafe to use. Egan v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. (1896) 12 App. Div. 556.

"Engines and other appliances used in operating railroads are liable to wear out, to break, become defective and dangerous, and a railroad company employing such agencies is charged with notice of this fact, and consequently is bound to exercise a degree of watchfulness over them commensurate with the nature of the business in which they are employed, and the consequences incident to neglect. Therefore, if a company fails to make frequent examinations of its engines, machinery, and appliances, or fails to take other measures of precaution necessary to prevent such appliances and machinery from becoming defective and dangerous from natural causes; and if from such defects which might have been known by the use of ordinary care or diligence, an employee suffers injury without his fault, negligence may be predicated thereon, as such omission would be regarded as negligence." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Holt (1883) 29 Kan. 149, 152. In this case the plaintiff was held entitled to recover for an injury by an engine that had been unsafe and dangerous for "some considerable time" before the day of the injury, which could have been known to the company by the exercise of ordinary care; while he himself was not aware that the engine was defective.

In Knapp v. Sloux City & P. R. Co. (1887) 71 Iowa, 41, it was said that a railroad company owes its engineers the duty of making a "frequent" inspection of its tracks.

"It is the duty of a railroad company to furnish reasonably safe cars for the running trains, and to have them inspected with reasonable care at proper intervals." Daniels v. Union P. R. Co. (1890) 6 Utah, 357.

The obligation to make a thorough inspection is especially strong where an appliance has been injured in the parts open to view, and there is a strong probability that the same accident may have weakened it in other places. Thus, where the lever of a hand-car breaks, and it proves to have been cracked underneath one of its rings by the shock of a severe collision which it had undergone the day before, the railroad company is liable for damages if it appears that the foreman in charge of the car did not subject it to an examination sufficiently thorough to disclose injuries which were not patent. Solomon R. Co. v. Jones (1883) 30 Kan. 601.

So, the failure to suitably inspect the coupling of an engine after it has been subjected by a collision to a strain which is likely to injure it is an omission on the company's part which will justify a jury in holding it guilty of negligence. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Nunnally (1892) 88 Va. 548.

A similar principle is applicable where machinery is operating in such a manner as to create a reasonable suspicion that it is in some respect defective. Thus, an employer whose attention is called to a clicking noise made by a machine used by an employee, which would not have been made if the machine had been in proper condition, owes such employee the duty of carefully inspecting the machine to determine if it is defective, and of repairing it in case it is found to be defective. A mere casual examination by the foreman is not a fulfillment of the duty. Kaplan v. New York Biscuit Co. (1896) 5 App. Div. 60. Compare the cases in VI. f, 2, supra.

The duty of a master to inspect appliances furnished to his servant, though continuous, does not require a continuous inspection from moment to moment, but only such as is reasonable under all the circumstances. Krampe v. St. Louis Brewing Asso. (1894) 59 Mo. App. 277.

A master who chooses to adopt inferior appliances and methods in his business must use proportionately greater care to see that the servant is not injured, and must make more frequent examinations. Eddy v. Aurora Iron Min. Co. (1890) 81 Mich. 548, where it was held that a mine owner who employs a method of bracing and support for timbers and staging which renders the piece more subject to be displaced by blasts than other methods in use, must adopt such frequent inspection as is necessary to prevent accident from the collapse of the roof.

A railway engineer assumes the risk of a derailment of his engine by a cow which becomes fastened in a railroad bridge without any fault on the part of the company, where its tracks and bridges are examined at reasonably frequent intervals. Manson v. Eddy (1893) 3 Tex. Civ. App. 148.

A railroad company is not required to keep a constant watch through its track inspector upon every part of the road, but only inspection at reasonable intervals. It cannot be held liable for an injury to a brakeman who is tripped up by a small coil-spring, left in a side track by a car repairer and almost covered by grass, where the employees working on the track had never seen it, and there is no evidence to show how long it had been lying between the rails. Williams v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1893) 119 Mo. 316.

Where a death results from the fall of a derrick on an iron ship in consequence of the breaking of a bolt, which at the time was defective to the extent of two thirds of its section, but the defect was not visible unless the bolt was drawn out of its socket, a verdict for the defendant was rightly directed, where the plaintiff produced no expert testimony to show what is usual or requisite in reference to inspections of ships of the class in question, or for what period a bolt like that which gave way would, in the ordinary course, remain in repair and be adequate to its work. Neither a 41 L. R. A.

court nor a jury can, otherwise than by speculation, form an opinion as to how often such an appliance should be examined, unless they are enlightened by the evidence of a skilled witness. Hanrahan v. Ardnamult S. S. Co. (1887) Ir. L. R. 22 C. L. 55.

A court cannot, as a matter of law, say when, where, and how often an inspection of a foreign car shall take place, or that it should not have been done at some time while the car was under the defendant's control. Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1890) 53 Iowa, 595, 38 Am. Rep. 243.

Where the evidence is that a defect is the result of gradual wear the reasonable inference is that it has existed for some time, and it is for the jury to say whether the master was derelict in regard to his duty of inspection. Paine v. Eastern R. Co. (1895) 91 Wis. 840.

2. Rulings as to specific periods.

In some instances, however, the courts have undertaken to declare with greater precision how often the inspections must take place in order that the master may be deemed to have performed his duty in that regard. The following decisions will serve as illustrations of judicial ideas upon this subject, expressed sometimes with and sometimes without reference to the opinion of a jury.

"Of whatever material bridges are built, they should be subjected periodically, every year, to the closest examination." Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1873) 68 Ill. 561.

Evidence that a telegraph pole had not been inspected for two years before it broke and injured a servant, and that it should in the exercise of reasonable care have been inspected once in each year, will justify a verdict for the plaintiff. Essex County Electric Co. v. Kelly (1897 N. J. L.) 37 Atl. 619.

There is sufficient evidence of negligence to go to the jury where a chain supporting a weight of over 250 pounds had been mended by joining two of its links with five strands of fine wire, and suffered to remain in that condition without inspection for eight years. Tangney v. J. B. Wilson & Co. (1891) 87 Mich. 453.

Where it is shown that a track inspector and his gang carefully examined and repaired a curve about two weeks before an accident, an employee of the railroad company working upon an engine cannot recover for injuries alleged to be due to a defect in the rails at that place. Burrell v. Gowen (1890) 134 Pa. 527.

A railroad company is not liable for the death of an engineer by the derailment of his engine caused by a sudden fall of rain saturating the already moist earth, so that the cross-ties sunk on one side under the weight of the engine and turned it over, where the place had been twice inspected that morning and appeared to be safe, and two heavy freight trains and a fast express train had passed over it in safety. Binns v. Richmond & B. R. Co. (1892) 88 Va. 891.

In Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Conway (1896) 67 Ill. App. 155, the court remarked that a "defective condition, caused by an accumulation of frozen snow and mud, is very different from a defect arising from a flaw in a rail, a thing which might not be discoverable save upon a minute, and, before the passage of each train, impracticable, examination."

A railroad company is not liable for an injury to an employee caused by the derailment of a car, if the car was carefully inspected before the accident, and was in good condition, and was apparently in the same condition after the accident. O'Connor v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1891) 83 Iowa, 105.

A railroad company which every month requires a competent and experienced workman and assistant to subject the stay bolts in a boiler to the best test known to discover if they are whole and sound is not liable for the death of an engineer from an explosion of the boiler due to broken stay bolts, eight days after such inspection. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Du Bois (1894) 56 Ill. App. 181.

In Powers v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1891) 60 Hun, 19, the company was held not liable for an injury caused by the breaking of a king-bolt which had been inspected eight days before the accident.

An employee cannot be held liable as for a breach of his duty to inspect an elevator, where only a week before the servant was injured it had been thoroughly examined in all its parts by a competent inspector. Bucher v. Pryibill (1897) 19 App. Div. 128.

Where steps leading to a platform were secure at the close of working hours of one day the master could not be held responsible in a showing that they were insecure at the beginning of the working hours on the next day, without a further showing that there was a reasonable probability that their security would be disturbed in the interim by some cause which the master, in the exercise of reasonable care, could have foreseen and guarded against. Krampe v. St. Louis Brewing Asso. (1894) 59 Mo. App. 277.

In Houston v. Brush (1894) 66 Vt. 331, it appeared that although a derrick which gave way owing to the working out of a pin was almost daily subjected to the strain of lifting heavy stones, it had not been inspected to see if it was safe in this respect for about thirty days prior to the accident. The court said: "The working out of the pin was an accident which, in the ordinary course of things, does not occur if those who have the care and management of a derrick use proper care. The case standing thus, we think the jury had a right to consider the fact that the pin came out as it did, and from it to draw the inference that the defendants had failed to exercise ordinary care."

In Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1890) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243, the car which caused the plaintiff's injury was received by the defendant at Beverly, Missouri, on the 12th of October from a connecting road, and was taken to Chicago, and it was on its return trip on the 17th day of October when the accident occurred. There was evidence tending to show the car was in good order when received by the defendant. It reached Beverly on the day after the accident, and was again inspected, and the "hand-hold" found in bad condition. The inspector testified that he put on a new one, that the wood was sound, indicating that the "hand-hold" had been out of repair only a short time, not exceeding a week. It was held that the evidence warranted the conclusion that the "hand-hold" had got out of repair at some time on the trip to and from Chicago, but the court declined to say, as a matter of law, whether the car should have been inspected during the trip.

In Webb v. Rennie (1865) 4 Fost. & F. 615, the question left to the jury was whether the defendant had been negligent in not examining the poles of a scaffolding, and Cockburn, Ch. J., charged as follows: "It appeared that a pole had been two years in the earth, and that during that time it had not been examined, and at the end of that time it was unsound. . . . If the jury were satisfied that according to the general practice of ship-builders, poles were allowed to remain two, three, or four years in the ground without being examined, and that the usual mode of raising them was adopted in this case, and that all this had gone on in shipbuilding yards for years without any accident, then it would be for the jury to say whether, looking to the experience of the past (which, of course, though not conclusive, was always material as an element of judgment), there was any negligence on the part of the defendants; or whether, by leaving the poles so long in the ground without examination there was in this respect a want of due and ordinary care on the part of the defendants. And it was not because in a single instance it had turned out that a pole could not be safely left in the ground for two years, and that the accident might have been prevented by a timely examination—it did not necessarily follow from this that therefore there was a want of due and reasonable care on the part of the employer who had acted in accordance with all his past experience. Such a matter must always be dealt with by juries in a reasonable way and with reference to reasonable care. No man could be safe against the occurrence of accidents from causes quite casual, fortuitous, and unforeseen. A man might have 1,000 poles used on his premises with safety, and then by some chance one might turn out to be unsound and cause an accident for which the master was not necessarily liable. If any instances had been proved of poles having previously broken by reason of their having been left so long in the ground it would have been strong to show negligence; but there was no such evidence. On the other hand, evidence that poles had been left in the ground much longer without any accident occurring went strongly to a contrary conclusion:

1. Limits of liability based on duty of inspection.

See also XI., e, infra.

1. Generally.

The scope of the principles illustrated by the case cited in the preceding subdivision will be more clearly understood if we examine the employer's duty in its negative aspects.

The duty of inspection is not imposed in respect to articles which are merely handled by the servant for the purposes of carriage. Thus, the purchaser of cotton is not liable for an injury to his servant from the giving way of the bagging upon a bale while he was moving it with a hook, in the absence of evidence of a custom or agreement on the master's part to inspect it and ascertain its strength. Garragan v. Fall River Iron Works Co. (1893) 158 Mass. 596.

The rule that a master owes his servant the duty of inspection or reasonable care to furnish him safe and suitable means for performing his work has no reference to the safety and condition of the thing the servant is employed to repair or complete. Allen v. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. (1896; Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 171.

In Stourbridge v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 129, the court took the ground that the only duty of an employee in regard to a cross-beam furnished merely as a part of the structure which the servant is engaged in erecting, and not for the purpose of providing him with a place of work, is to apprise him of the existence of any latent defects of which it has knowledge.

See also XI., e, infra.

2. Omission of duty must be proximate cause of injury.

Where the undisputed evidence shows that the most careful inspection demanded by the law would not have disclosed the defect, the question whether that which was made was adequate is immaterial. Louisville & N. E. Co. v. Campbell (1892) 97 Ala. 147.

Where it is apparent from the evidence that the defect which caused the injury was of such a nature that it would not have been discovered by the defendant by an examination made at a reasonable time before the accident, the necessary causal connection between the accident and the breach of the defendant's duty to inspect is not established. Boess v. Clausen & P. Brewing Co. (1896) 12 App. Div. 360.

Where a railroad company provides skilful inspectors, and an inspector makes a proper inspection, it is not liable for injuries to its servants resulting from defects which the inspector could not have discovered by proper inspection. Indiana, I. & I. M. Co. v. Snyder (1892; Ind.) 53 Am. & Eng. R. Cas. 225.

A railroad company is not liable for the death of a fireman thrown between the engine and tender by the breaking of the king-bolt by which they were coupled, and in which there was a latent defect beneath the surface which was not and could not have been discovered, although the pin was carefully inspected before the accident. Powers v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1891) 60 Hun, 19.

Where, for anything that appears, the defect which caused the explosion of a gas generator may have been of such a nature as to have eluded the most careful examination of the most skilful experts, an instruction is erroneous which holds that the mere absence of examination by prudent men is conclusive of the defendant's liability. Krans v. White (1881) 8 Ill. App. 583.

In Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hughes (1888) 119 Pa. 301, the court held that the servant could not recover for injury from the breaking or falling out of a brake pin. It was conceded that the brake was in proper condition a few miles above the place of accident, whilst the next place of inspection was a short distance below. The proof did not show whether the pin broke, fell out, or was removed. The court said: "It devolved upon the plaintiff to show negligence of the company, and that that negligence was the proximate cause of the injury. In this he has failed, and in the absence of proof on that point we cannot ascribe the accident to that cause."

In Carlson v. Phoenix Bridge Co. (1892) 132 N. Y. 273, several hooks were made by a blacksmith from pieces of iron about 18 inches long, cut from a bar purchased by the defendant's superintendent. They were used in lifting the heavy girders which formed a part of the structure for the railway. And only one was shown to have broken, or to have been weak or defective. The piece of the bar not used was shown to have been of the best quality, and to possess an elasticity and strength far beyond that required in lifting the girder in question. The hook that broke did so from a weakness in the iron at the particular point of fracture. The court said: "The evidence does not show from what part of the bar the piece of iron from which the hook was manufactured was taken, and if the cutting test had been applied to either end or the middle of the bar, the jury could not have found that it would have disclosed the defect complained of. A conclusion that the defect would have been discovered, would have had no other basis than speculation or conjecture, and evidence of that character would be insufficient to sustain a judgment."

In Bannon v. Sanden (1896) 68 Ill. App. 164, it was contended that a proper examination was not made of the timber that broke in a scaffold, but the court was of the opinion that from the facts that it had been used four or five times without breaking, and that an examination would not have disclosed any knot in the timber, an examination would have been useless.

In Oberfelder v. Doran (1889) 26 Neb. 118, there was evidence upon which the jury might properly find that the faulty character of certain timbers was such that a proper inspection would have disclosed the same. It was thought necessary to pass upon the question as to whether the duty of the defendant to make such inspection would exist only where it was shown that such inspection would have revealed the defects.

3. Employer not liable for latent defects.

Employers "are not answerable for latent defects in materials employed in the construction of their machinery, which the usual and well-recognized tests of science and art fail to detect." Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1873) 68 Ill. 561.

An employer is not liable "for hidden defects which could not have been discovered by the most careful inspection." Ladd v. New Bedford R. Co. (1875) 119 Mass. 412, 20 Am. Rep. 331.

Where a defect "is not discoverable by the customary modes of inspection, or, in other words, is a latent defect," the employer is not guilty of negligence in failing to remedy it. Read v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1897) 20 R. I. 211.

"While charged with knowledge of patent defects, and with the usual effect of use and wear upon the machinery, the employer is never charged by his mere duty of using it with the duty of inspection for latent defects." Missouri P. R. Co. v. Crenshaw (1888) 71 Tex. 341.

The master is not liable for "latent defects, which he could not have discovered by the use of ordinary diligence." Quintana v. Consolidated Kansas City Smelting & Ref. Co. (1896; Tex. Civ. App.) 37 S. W. 369.

Where a rail without any visible defects breaks by reason of cold weather, the railroad company is not liable for the resulting injuries. Devlin v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (1885) 87 Mo. 545.

"This rule [as to the employer's duty to provide safe instrumentalities] does not go to the length of making the employer an insurer against injury by the breaking of machinery or the explosion of boilers while used by an employee in the service of the employer, provided such machinery is apparently in a safe condition and the injury results from latent weakness or defect unknown to the employer and which the exercise of ordinary care and skill of the employer would not enable him to detect or guard against, and, when an accident happens under such circumstances, it must be regarded as one of the risks incident to the employment which, when no fault is chargeable to the employer, the employee assumes." Racine v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1893) 70 Hun, 453.

It follows directly from the principles laid down above that no defect can be considered dependent contractors for the reception of water-mains.

A street-railway company owes no duty to the driver of a car to keep a man to watch a switch leading towards the stable, during the daytime, when it is closed and properly secured. Donnelly v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1896) 3 App. Div. 408. (The plaintiff had been thrown off by the sudden turning of the car, and there was no evidence to show how the switch became open, or that the track and car were not in good order.)

A jury would be warranted in finding that a railroad company had not used the care which the circumstances required to keep the track in a safe condition, where the evidence tends to show that a derrick had remained unused by the side of the track, dangerously near an overhanging bank of earth and stones, in plain view and with a guy loosely stretched across the track, though at a sufficient height, when the derrick was upright, to clear the passing trains, for at least ten days while the earth was alternately freezing and thawing; that, on the day preceding the night on which the plaintiff was injured, the bank thawed, and it was apparent to anyone who looked at it that a large mass of the bank was loosened and ready to fall upon the derrick; and that just before the train on which the plaintiff was at work came along, such a mass broke off from the bank, and fell upon the derrick, knocking it down, and bringing the guy stretched across the track into such a position that it swept over the top of the train and struck the plaintiff. Holden v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1890) 129 Mass. 268, 37 Am. Rep. 343.

Where a mason is injured by the explosion of a dynamite cartridge left in a stone taken from a quarry at some distance from the work an instruction is correct which leaves it to the jury to say whether the defendant, knowing the manner in which the operations at the quarry were conducted, and the risk that unexploded cartridges might remain in the stones carted away for building purposes, ought, as an ordinarily prudent man, to have examined the stone from which the servant's injury resulted. Neveu v. Sears (1892) 155 Mass. 303.

A master who erects a privy for the use of his operatives in such a dangerous place as in a wheel-house directly over the water-wheel is under a specially imperative obligation to it to see that the foundations of the structure are made and kept sound and safe beyond contingency. It is his duty to know that the privy is safe, and that the servants for whose use it is designed may resort to it without personal risk or peril to life or limb. Ryan v. Fowler (1862) 24 N. Y. 410, 82 Am. Dec. 315.

That a hole in a railroad track was concealed from sight by slush will not excuse the railroad company from liability to a brakeman for injuries received from stepping into it. It is for the jury to say whether the company has done its duty in regard to the discovery of the unseen defect. Northern P. R. Co. v. Teeter (1894) 27 U. S. App. 316, 63 Fed. Rep. 527, 11 C. C. A. 332.

In Flood v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1892) 131 N. Y. 603, the defendant was held not to be liable for injuries caused by the breaking of an arm on one of its telegraph poles, where there was a system of inspection for the arms when purchased, and it did not appear that there was anything in the external appearance of the defective arm when it was new which indicated any weakness, or that there was any defect therein discernible by any ordinary inspection. The court said: "This arm had been in use for about six years, and during all that time had perfectly answered its purpose. There was no proof showing how long such an arm ought to last or be used. The defendant had a system of inspection which appears to have been all that was practicable. Its inspectors went along the line of telegraph poles and wires, and carefully looked at them and tried the poles to see if they were still strong and adequate. They were provided with arms so that if they discovered any that were insufficient they could replace them. They were not expected to climb up every pole and examine the arms thereon. Such an inspection would be manifestly impracticable and unnecessary."

Where the fall of a bridge on which a servant is employed to dump coal cars is caused by decay of the timbers, it is, in an action by the servant against the master to recover damages for injuries sustained, for the jury to determine whether the bridge was properly built; whether the defendant employed competent men to inspect it, and whether the defendant had no notice of its dangerous condition; and if the jury do not so find, the plaintiff is entitled to recover. Everson v. Rollinson (1887; Pa.) 6 Cent. Rep. 745.

In Faulkner v. Erie R. Co. (1867) 40 Barb. 324, where a bridge which fell had every appearance of being sound and safe, and had been examined and tested and watched, under the weight of a train of cars, on the day before the accident happened, by the repairer of bridges and the superintendent of that division, and then deemed entirely sound and safe, the court said that it did not see what more could have been legally required of the company in the exercise of proper care than had been done.

In Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 89 N. Y. 468, the defendant was held not liable where it was proved that, by competent agents, a frequent inspection and examination of the bridge which collapsed had been made; that the accustomed tests, long employed, and deemed ample and sufficient, were applied to the structure in its various parts, and no imperfection or decay was detected; that no imperfection was visible upon an outward and external inspection; and that, on the day before it fell, a special observation was made on the bridge while a heavy train was passing over it, and no imperfection or weakness was discovered. In answer to the objection that the test of boring the timbers was not applied, the court remarked that this is no more a certain test than the one which was applied; that it had but rarely been used upon the bridges on the defendant's road, or, so far as the testimony showed, upon any other; that, when carried too far, became itself a source of weakness; and that while, after a catastrophe has occurred, it is sometimes easy, and quite common, to say that if something else unusual and unthought of had been done, it might possibly have been averted. Ordinary care and diligence, which is the acknowledged measure of the defendant's obligation, do not require the application of these unusual tests, nor the employment of the utmost possible safeguards.

A railroad company is liable for injuries caused by the fall of a decayed bridge where an auger or an ax properly applied would have revealed the rotten condition of its timbers, and its consequent insecurity. It is immaterial that a bridge was skillfully built when erected, where time and exposure to the elements have smitten it with certain decay, which the simplest test would have discovered to the company. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v.

Conroy (1878) 68 Ill. 561. There the court refused to set aside a verdict for a plaintiff who had been injured by the fall of a bridge, saying: "There is much testimony from which the jury might fairly infer that the bridge broke down from the rotten and decayed condition of the timbers. It had been erected about fifteen years—a common trestle bridge, uncovered and unpainted. An ordinary wooden structure like that, exposed to the storms of fifteen years, should be expected to be, by the end of that term, in a state of decay demanding the utmost vigilance of the company. They were bound to know the nature of the structure, and they are justly chargeable with negligence in failing to find out and remedy its defects. It is in proof that such was the condition of some of the materials that a stick could be easily thrust into them, and, though they exhibited no outward sign of decay, were rotten at the heart. Not a person in the employment of the company stated that any tests were made, such as by boring or chopping, to ascertain the condition of the timbers. They had, months before the accident, direct notice of the unsafe condition of this structure. It is true, some repairs had been put on the bridge a short time before the accident, but there was no thorough overhauling, no searching to find out defects,—a glance being deemed sufficient to satisfy the employees of the company of its safe condition. Trains of cars had passed over it safely the day before, and it had been subjected, quite recently, to the heaviest strains which can be imposed upon a bridge; the switching being done upon it. All this should have admonished the company that the structure required a thorough examination."

In Flynn v. Union Bridge Co. (1890) 42 Mo. App. 529, there was no evidence offered that planks which are used for scaffolding are in any case entirely free from knots, nor that such planks are, as a rule, subjected to any strain test before they are used; nor that the plank actually used was not of such a thickness, soundness, or quality as is ordinarily used for scaffolding, irrespective of its height. Under these circumstances it was considered that to require of the master that he should subject each plank to a strain test, before permitting it to be used, would be requiring of him, not simply reasonable care, but a most extraordinary care, and to this the law does not subject him. It was also pointed out that the strain itself might injure the plank, and, instead of helping matters, make them worse.

A master is liable for injuries caused by the breaking of a plank in a platform, owing to a defect which could readily have been discovered by a proper inspection before the plank was put in position, but was out of sight of anyone who was merely using the platform. Bensing v. Steinway (1886) 101 N. Y. 547.

An employer is not required to test the strength of every piece of timber on a scaffold, and he is therefore not liable for the breakage of one of the planks owing to the presence of a knot which was not visible on the outside of the timber. Bannon v. Sanden (1896) 68 Ill. App. 164.

Evidence that there was, in a platform over which workmen were wheeling barrows, a depression "so small as to have escaped the attention of numerous persons who had used the platform, some of whom specially examined it," is insufficient to support an allegation of negligence against the employer,—especially where it is improbable that the imperfection played any part in the accident occasioning the injury complained of. Kaare v. Troy Steel & I. Co. (1893) 139 N. Y. 369.

In Weiden v. Brush Electric Light Co. (1889) 73 Mich. 268, the defendant was held liable on the ground that there was no competent evidence in the case that any examination of a certain tower and its cable had ever been made.

2. Weight—supporting appliances.

A master is liable for an injury caused by the breaking of a chain partly from wear and partly from bad welding, where he has not had it examined or tested, although there are well-known methods for doing so. Murphy v. Phillips (1876) 24 Week. Rep. 67, 85 L. T. N. S. 477.

A railway company which, after using a lifting jack purchased by it containing a latent defect in the weld of the foot attached to the jack, sends it to its shops for other repair, is liable to a section hand injured because of such defective weld, if it could have been discovered by a reasonable examination at the time such repairs were made. Kansas City & P. R. Co. v. Ryan (1894) 52 Kan. 637.

In Moynihan v. Hills Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 586, the question whether the defendant had been negligent was held to be for the jury, where it was proved that a rod which broke was designed to carry one iron ball weighing about 118 pounds, and that under the defendant's direction the machine had been reconstructed, and the rod made to carry two such balls; that it had been subjected to a use which caused the iron in the rod to vibrate while under a strain, and which tended to crystallize it and make it brittle; that there had been no inspection of it to ascertain its condition for nearly two years before the accident; that the rod was slightly discolored at the place of the fracture, as if the break was not fresh, and that it appeared to him as if the iron had not freshly parted.

Testimony that a hook after it gave way looked as if there was a break previously to the main break, that "if a man made a careful examination of the hook, after making it, he might possibly, or if a man familiar with hooks examined it, he might perhaps, have discovered the flaw which caused the accident, but these flaws would not be visible on an ordinary inspection," that there was actually a visible crack or flaw in the hook above the flaw at the place of rupture, and that, as testified, iron will usually break in the weakest spot,—tends to show that a careful inspection would have revealed the weakness of the hook. Spicer v. South Boston Iron Co. (1885) 138 Mass. 426.

See also Erskine v. Chino Valley Beet-Sugar Co. (1905) 71 Fed. Rep. 270, the gist of which is stated in VIII. 2, 3, supra.

3. Steam boilers.

A railroad company "is not required to adopt extraordinary tests for discovering defects in a locomotive boiler, or any of its machinery, which are not approved, practicable, and customary; but it fulfils its duty in this regard if it adopts such tests as are ordinarily in use by prudently conducted roads engaged in like business and surrounded by like circumstances." Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett (1896) 166 U. S. 617, 41 L. ed. 1136.

A verdict holding a railroad company for injuries caused by the explosion of an engine due to defective stay bolts will not be disturbed where there is testimony to the effect that if any one out of several recognized tests had been applied within a reasonable time before the explosion, the true condition of the stay-bolts would have been discovered. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett (1895) 30 U. S. App. 196, 14 C. C. A. 873, 67 Fed. Rep. 214, Aff'd (1896) 166 U. S. 617, 41 L. ed. 1136.

Ordinary care does not require a railroad company to take out the dome-cap and throttle valve of a locomotive purchased from reputable manufacturers. It would be an unreasonable rule to require such a company to keep on hand such mechanical contrivances and employ experts capable of making the highest tests, like those which the manufacturers are in a position to make. Clyde v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1894) 65 Fed. Rep. 482. There the special master, whose report was approved in toto by Newman, D. J., considered that the rule laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Elliott (1892) 149 U. S. 286, 37 L. ed. 728, meant that the employer was not bound to do more than test an engine to see that it was in good running order, where it had been purchased from a manufacturer of good standing.

Where a boiler of a locomotive engine bursts, owing to a flaw which was latent and discoverable only by the steam and hydraulic tests, which are not in ordinary use with railroad corporations, and rarely applied except when boilers are first put in use, or when the engines undergo their periodical examination in the workshop, the employer is not liable. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Allen (1885) 78 Ala. 494.

In Racine v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1893) 70 Hun, 453, a boiler case, after a supposed burning of the crown plate, was subjected to the test of 145 pounds pressure, its maximum capacity, and resisted that pressure, and upon that test was put in service by the defendant, in hauling freight and passenger trains, under a pressure of from 140 to 145 pounds of steam, and continued in such service for about one week after such supposed burning of the plate, to the time of the accident, without any evidence of weakness. It finally exploded while carrying only 110 pounds of steam, and while running at a moderate rate of speed alone, and without a train. The court said that it could not see from the evidence, either that the place furnished by the defendant for the interstate to work was unsafe, or that the defendant was guilty of negligence in suffering it to become unsafe while the interstate was employed by the defendant, and the nonsuit of the trial judge was sustained.

The effect of a statute requiring steam boilers to be tested in a certain manner every year is merely to provide an additional safeguard, and since the duty of an employer to use care in inspecting the appliances used by the servants does not arise out of statute but is imposed by the common law, the fact that such a statute has been complied with by such employer does not necessarily establish that his duty has been performed. Egan v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. (1896) 12 App. Div. 556.

Whether or not the duty of a master properly to inspect a boiler kept in a building in which servants are engaged is performed by the application of any given test is "a question to be determined by the condition of the boiler and the situation and location, and by considering whether the particular test will give indications as to the safety of the boiler." Egan v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. (1896) 12 App. Div. 556.

The "hammer test" being regarded as the best known method of examining steam boilers, negligence will not be imputed to an employer where that test had been applied to a boiler six days before it exploded, by an inspector reasonably competent to perform the work. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Dubois (1895) 65 Ill. App. 144.

In an action for damages caused by the explosion of a boiler it is not error to submit to the jury the question whether a railroad company has been negligent in its inspection of a boiler fourteen days prior to the accident, where the plaintiff's testimony is to the effect that the stay-bolts had become broken to the number of fifty or sixty and had been broken so long before the explosion that the ends were worn smooth; that either the hydrostatic or the hammer test was, when properly conducted, sufficient to show the presence of broken bolts; and that by the hammer test at least 90 per cent of the broken bolts could be discovered. Woods v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (1896, Mich.) 66 N. W. 328.

In Jones v. Malvern Lumber Co. (1893) 58 Ark. 125, it was shown that the only tests of a boiler's strength, applied after it was repaired, were made by sounding its rivets and braces with a hammer, and by the pressure of steam raised for that purpose; and testimony was adduced by the plaintiff to prove that the "hammer test" was not effective, and was not the test usually applied. In rebuttal the defendant introduced a person engaged in the milling business, and asked him what tests the mill men of the vicinity generally applied to the steam boilers used in their business. The question was objected to, but the court permitted the witness to answer and he stated that the "hammer test" was the one usually applied, so far as he knew." The court said: "The defendant's duty to its servants did not require it to resort to unusual or impracticable tests; and we think the question was proper, as eliciting evidence tending to show that one of the tests applied by the company's master-mechanic was that usually employed by persons engaged in operating similar machinery."

4. Cars and their appurtenances.

A railroad company in discharging its duty towards its employees to inspect cars "is not required to resort to tests that are impracticable and oppressive, or which would be incompatible with the proper furtherance of business and which are only required to insure absolute safety." Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1896) 146 Ind. 564.

A railroad company "is not bound to pursue a system of inspection of its cars and locomotives which would embarrass the operation of the road," but simply to exercise ordinary care. Smoot v. Mobile & M. R. Co. (1880) 67 Ala. 13.

It is not required of a railroad company that the tests made by car inspectors should be so thorough and exhaustive as the tests made at the general construction or repair shops. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ledbetter (1885) 24 Neb. 328.

Inspectors of cars are not required to apply tests of physical force to the steps of a ladder upon a freight car, in order to absolve the company from liability for defects therein, unless some indication of weakness or defect is perceived upon a careful inspection by the eye. Allen v. Union P. R. Co. (1891) 7 Utah, 239.

In Smith v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1877) 42 Wis. 520, the court remarked with regard to the tests applied to the defendant's brake-rods: "The defendant proved by John Baillie, its master car builder, that the iron was purchased of the best makers, and was of the best quality; that samples of each lot were tested in the defendant's shops in the usual and most approved manner; that all materials were inspected, as well as the work done, by first-class inspectors; that he himself examined thoroughly all cars purchased by the company, as to the character of the cars, the material used, and their manufacture; and that no car was allowed to go on the road in which he could discover any defect which would make it unsafe. It appeared that the system of inspection of cars which were purchased, and the tests applied to the materials of which its cars were manufactured, were the same as those adopted or applied by railroad corporations generally. . . . So far as we are able to judge from the testimony, the defect in the brake-rod was a latent one, which would not likely be detected or discovered by the usual examination or inspection of the car. . . . There should be at least some testimony tending to show that the tests applied to determine the sufficiency of the brake-rod were inadequate and not in accordance with the most approved methods, to justify the finding of the jury."

In DeGraff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1879) 76 N. Y. 125, in commenting on the contention of the plaintiff that the exercise of ordinary care would have discovered the defect in the coupling chain which broke and injured him, and that the defendant neglected to exercise such care, the court said: "There was an entire absence of evidence, as to the nature and character of the defect, or the cause of the breaking; . . . or, in the next place, there was a failure of evidence to show that the defendant, its servants, or agents, did not exercise reasonable care, or make suitable and proper examination." As to the claim that these chains should be detached at intervals, and their strength tested by hydraulic pressure, or dead weight, or by some other mode, which would be effectual for that purpose, it was said: "Such a requirement is unreasonable, and unnecessary, either to insure the safety of the public or employees. . . . As a general rule the degree of vigilance required is measured by the dangers to be apprehended or avoided. It does not appear to be necessary that the full strength of these chains should be kept up. That would involve a test on every trip, and a possible renewal on every trip. Again, on a train of thirty cars, each one having a brake, it would not seem to be indispensable that every brake-chain should be perfect, as but a few of that number could or would be used in controlling the train; and again, it does not appear that the breaking of a chain would ordinarily result in such an accident. Such chains frequently break, as the evidence shows, but there is no evidence that an injury ever resulted from such breaking, nor that it would ordinarily do so."

In Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hughes (1888) 119 Pa. 301, there were three points for the inspection of certain coal cars within 20 miles, besides other alleged inspections at the coal-chutes, by an employee who had these cars in his special charge. The court said: "The inspections at these points were not minute or critical; they were limited to a hurried examination of the most exposed and important points; the cars were subjected to a thorough examination only when turned into the shop for repairs. Whether this provision of the company in view of the heavy grades along the road, and the number of cars to be inspected, was a reasonably adequate one, would, if the question were material, be for the determination of the jury. It is absurd, 41 L. R. A.

however, to suppose that in these inspections the company was required to remove the bolts, screws, pins, or other appliances belonging to the machinery of a car, en route, in order to detect any possible imperfections."

A servant of a railroad company has no right to demand an inspection of cars at every station, though that will afford greater security against accidents. Smooth v. Mobile & M. R. Co. (1890) 67 Ala. 13.

A railroad company is, as matter of law, not liable for injuries caused by the breaking of the lever of a hand-car, where it gives way owing to a crack in part of the wood which is concealed by an iron socket, and no one could have discovered the defect by an external inspection. Louisville & M. R. Co. v. Hinder (1895) 16 Ky. L. Rep. 841, holding that a verdict should have been directed for the defendant.

An allegation that the plaintiff was injured by reason of a defective brake-staff, and that it might have been discovered by proper inspection at the inspecting station, was held to have been sufficiently proved. The inspector himself testified that he did not go on top of the cars to do the inspecting, and was not acquainted with stuck brakes put up and let off by hand, and an expert testified that there was nothing to indicate, when a brake was applied, that it was stuck, but that fact became apparent only when the brakeman attempted to let it off. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Binion (1894) 107 Ala. 645.

The inspection of a brake-staff is not adequate unless it extends to the portion which rests within the socket. Moon v. Northern P. R. Co. (1891) 46 Minn. 106.

A judgment for the plaintiff will be reversed where it rests upon a special verdict which finds that, upon inspection made at different times and in different places, no defect was discovered in the brake-staff of a foreign car from which the plaintiff's injury resulted, and that such defects as existed could not have been discovered without taking the brake-staff of the car and striking it with a hammer. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Fry (1891) 131 Ind. 319.

The court refused to set aside a judgment for the plaintiff, where he was injured by the giving way of a brake-shaft, where a subsequent examination showed that there was an old fracture in the shaft, and a weld at the place of the fracture and a silver joint above it. It was considered reasonable to infer that, upon proper inspection, these appearances would have invited scrutiny, and led to a discovery of the defect. Texas P. R. Co. v. O'Fiel (1890) 78 Tex. 486.

In Louisville & M. R. Co. v. Campbell (1892) 97 Ala. 147, it was held that there was no case to go to the jury where a brakeman was injured through the giving way of a brake-rod in which there was an old crack which could have been discovered only by taking it out or lifting it up. The court said: "We have seen that the undisputed evidence shows that ordinary inspections of brakes are never made on well-regulated railroads, by taking out or removing the rods; and that it would be impracticable to do so. Indeed, common observation and experience suggest the impracticability of such a system. If one brake should be taken apart and examined, all should; and if all, then every other machine or appliance connected with the train and composed of adjustable parts. To do this would cripple and embarrass the operation of the road beyond any requirement of the law.

We are of opinion that such an inspection is an extraordinary duty called into being only by some exigency which could suggest to the mind of a reasonably prudent person a necessity for its performance." The fact that a part of the break had existed long enough for rust to accumulate was too uncertain a predicate to rest a charge of negligence upon.

A railroad company is not liable to an employee injured by falling from a hand car which he was assisting to operate, due to the breaking of a handle by which the lever was worked owing to a defect which could not have been discovered without removing the handle from the socket, in the absence of actual knowledge of the defect by the company. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Hinder (1895) 16 Ky. L. Rep. 841.

In Read v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1897) 20 R. I. pt. 1, p. 211, a verdict for the plaintiff was set aside where the evidence on the part of the defendant tended to show that a flaw in a brake-rod was not discoverable, owing to rust on the rod, by the usual methods of inspection, and there was no evidence on the part of the plaintiff to rebut this, his testimony to the effect that the defect would have been discernible by the eye if it had been daylight being held to be merely his inference from the fact that the brake-rod was so easily twisted off in his attempt to set the brake.

In Palinton v. Northern C. R. Co. (1890) 83 N. Y. 7, a brakeman was injured by the breaking of a defectively welded eye-bolt connecting the chain with the rod of a brake. There was no evidence of notice of the defect to defendant, or any of its agents, or that it could have been discovered by inspection, except that the maker could have discovered it by bending the bolt while hot and in other ways, but it did not appear whether the eye-bolt was made by the company or purchased; and no want of care, the exercise of which would have discovered the defect, was shown. The plaintiff, it was held, could not recover, in so far as his case rested upon the imperfection referred to.

In Tierney v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1886) 33 Minn. 311, the court said: "It is difficult to lay down a general rule which will be applicable in practice, and define accurately the limits of the master's liability in this class of cases. But if the special duty and responsibility belong to the car inspector to examine and determine whether a car is unfit for service, and shall be so marked and sent to the repair track or shop, it is difficult to discover any distinction in kind between his duty and that of the mechanics who make the repairs. It will also be borne in mind that the measure of liability on the part of the company is reasonable care, which must be determined by the circumstances in each case. Experience in the competent and practical management of railroads will naturally determine the nature and frequency of inspections which ordinary care would require should be made between the intervals of the more minute examinations at the general repair shops. But the general examinations which experience has shown practicable and necessary to be made of cars at the yards designated for such purpose, without causing undue delay while in the course of transportation, would at least include such patent defects as would be readily discoverable upon inspection by a competent person in the exercise of reasonable care."

A loose bolt or screw on one end of a handhold on a railroad is a defect which could have been discovered by an inspection conducted with ordinary care. Bran v. Chicago, R. I. & A. L. R. A.

P. R. Co. (1880) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243.

For injuries alleged to be caused by the breaking of a push pole made out of cross-grained, wind-shriveled, and knotty wood it was held on demurrer that a railroad company was not liable where there was no allegation of a lack of ordinary care in providing appliances or of the defendant's knowledge of the defects. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Jackson (1888) 95 Va. 489.

The fact that a stake on a lumber car is "decayed, rotten, and dozy," according to the uncontradicted testimony, shows that there has been no efficient inspection of the loading of the cars. Ryan v. New York C. & H. E. R. Co. (1905) 88 Hun, 269.

In Watts v. Hart (1893) 7 Wash. 178, the defendant was absolved from liability where the only visible defect in a piece of timber used for "staking" cars was a small knot.

In Manser v. Eastern Counties R. Co. (1861) 3 L. T. N. S. 585, a wheel of a passenger car had been examined by the "hammer" test when new, and found to be apparently sound. After much use which reduced its thickness considerably, it was returned but not subjected to the same test. There being evidence to the effect that if the same test had been applied a defective weld would have been discovered, it was held that it was for the jury to say whether the defendant had been guilty of negligence in regard to a passenger who was injured through the breaking of the wheel.

It is negligence to send out a car with a handhold so defective that its condition is obvious to one making the most casual inspection. Settle v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1894) 127 Mo. 336.

A railroad company is liable for an accident to a brakeman free from contributory negligence, caused by the absence of a nut from the top of a brake-staff which held the lever fast to it, notwithstanding an imperfect inspection made a short time before the injury. Hayden v. Platt (1895) 84 Hun, 487.

A brakeman employed in shifting cars and making up trains, injured because of a defect in a chain on a brake of a car, without any fault on his part, is entitled to recover where the defect was or might have been known to the company by careful inspection. Richmond & D. R. Co. v. Burnett (1892) 88 Va. 538.

An employee of a railroad company may recover for injuries resulting from an accident occasioned by a defect in a brake-rod, which an investigation pursuant to a rule of the company would have revealed in time to prevent the accident. Bailey v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1893) 139 N. Y. 802.

IX. Employer's duty to know the character and capacity of his servants.

See also III. b, 4, III. c, 4, supra, and XIV. b, 8, infra.

The obligations of an employer to keep himself acquainted with the character and capacity of his servants are in some respects quite analogous to those which are incumbent on him with regard to the inanimate agencies of his business. But the differences between the two types of cases are sufficiently important to render it more convenient to treat those relating to servants in a separate subdivision.

a. At the time of hiring.

We have seen that an employer is to a great extent entitled to act upon the assumption that instrumentalities purchased from persons whose business it is to manufacture them are in a sound condition when they are first put in use. But he clearly would not be justified in acting upon the assumption that a servant who seeks a position is qualified for it. It is therefore well established that, where the service in which the servant is employed is such as to endanger the life and persons of coemployees, upon the plainest principles of justice and good faith, the master, upon engaging such servant, should be required to make reasonable investigation into his character, skill, and habits of life. Western Stone Co. v. Whalen (1894) 151 Ill. 472.

A master is "bound, as towards all the world, so far as reasonable care in their selection can accomplish that end, to employ none but competent and trustworthy servants; and if he falls in this by taking into his service those whom he knows to be incompetent or careless, he ought to answer to his other servants for the consequences which may happen to them from such neglect. Chicago & G. E. R. Co. v. Harney (1867) 28 Ind. 28, 92 Am. Dec. 282.

"While a railroad company is not responsible to one employee for an injury resulting from the mere negligence or incompetence of a coemployee in the same general employment, it is liable in such case where the company has been guilty of negligence in the employment of, or, after notice, continuing in employment of, a negligent or incompetent employee, thereby conducing to the injury." Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Collarn (1881) 73 Ind. 261, 38 Am. Rep. 134.

"It is the duty of the employer to exercise reasonable care, prudence, and discretion in ascertaining the character, habits, and fitness of his employees for the discharge of the duties to be assigned to them, and by proper supervision and superintendence to keep himself informed as to the manner in which the duties intrusted to them are performed." Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Nuckols (1895) 91 Va. 193. [One of several rules said to be well recognized.]

In Alabama & F. R. Co. v. Waller (1872) 48 Ala. 459, it was said that the doctrine of common employment is not applicable where the offending servant is "incompetent in skill or prudence within the employer's knowledge" or "his reasonable means of ascertaining," and that the master is bound, in investigating the qualifications of his servant, to use "due or reasonable" care and diligence, the exercise of "ordinary" care and diligence not being sufficient to absolve him from liability.

In the absence of evidence as to the exercise of any care in his selection, proof that a servant who has been in the service but two or three weeks was incompetent when employed need not be supplemented by proof of the company's knowledge of his incompetency. The presumption that the employer had done his duty is overcome by proof that the servant was incompetent. Where one competent at the time of his employment becomes incompetent, or indulges in a habit which renders him incompetent during its indulgence, notice of the incompetency or of the habit must be brought home to the company, or the incompetency or habit must be so notorious as to charge the company with knowledge; but when the incompetency does not arise after the employment, but existed at the time, proof of notice is not necessary. Lee v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1891) 87 Mich. 574.

In Bunnell v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1882) 29 Minn. 305, there was held to be sufficient evidence to sustain a verdict for the plaintiff on the ground that the defendant's master builder had employed a foreman of carpenters with knowledge of his unfitness, where the testimony showed that the foreman had been in the defendant's employ only about four months before the accident caused by his negligence; that for three years before that time he had been in the insurance business; that he had never learned the carpenter's trade; and had, in all, never worked more than twelve weeks as a carpenter.

In Gibson v. Northern C. R. Co. (1880) 22 Hun, 289, a car inspector who failed to discover and note a defect, was thirty-four or thirty-five years old, and had worked for three or four months in a railroad yard in Ireland, putting brasses into freight cars, but, with this exception, had been employed as a common laborer, and was not a mechanic, and was without knowledge of machinery up to the time of entering the service of the defendant. He worked in the defendant's carpenter shop, repairing cars, putting in brasses, bolting, and putting in boxes, and assisting in the shop, from one to two years, and was then made car inspector. His sobriety and intelligence were not questioned, nor was there any evidence that he had, before or since, failed to detect defects, or had been charged with incompetency, or that any person in authority had reason to suspect that he was incompetent. His evidence showed clearly that he understood the details of his business, and appeared to have been given intelligently. It was held that negligence in employing him as a car inspector was not shown.

To enable a servant to recover on the ground of the offending fellow servant's incompetency, the plaintiff must show, not only the incompetency, but that "the defendant failed to exercise proper care and diligence to ascertain his qualifications and competency prior to his appointment, or failed to remove him after his incompetency had come to the notice of some agent or officer of defendant having the power to remove the servant. Wabash R. Co. v. McDaniels (1883) 107 U. S. 454, 27 L. ed. 605, where the court said that "ordinary care in regard to the selection and retention of servants and agents implies that degree of diligence and precaution which the exigencies of the particular service reasonably require," and approved a charge containing the words "proper and great care," and declined to accept the suggestion of defendant's counsel that "ordinary care in the employment and retention of railroad employees means only that degree of diligence which is customary, or is sanctioned by the general practice or usage which obtains among those intrusted with the management and control of railroad property and railroad employees."

On the other hand, the employer's duty is fully discharged if "he makes careful inquiry into the habits and competency of the men employed and upon such inquiry believes, and has reason to believe, them sober, competent, and careful." Moss v. Pacific R. Co. (1872) 49 Mo. 167, 8 Am. Rep. 126. To the same effect, see Indiana Mfg. Co. v. Millican (1882) 87 Ind. 87; Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Henthorne (1896) 43 U. S. App. 113, 73 Fed. Rep. 634; Fines v. Sillery (1893) 73 Hun, 549.

It is not the duty of the master to ascertain the qualifications of a servant "as a fact," for the imposition of such an obligation would be tantamount to a requirement that his qualifications should be warranted. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Morrissey (1891) 45 Ill. App. 127. Compare Holland v. Tennessee Coal, I. & R. Co. (1890) 91 Ala. 444, 12 L. R. A. 232, cited in c. 1, post.

Whether the master at the time of engaging the servant, or afterwards, ought to have inquired whether he was experienced or not, or should have taken notice, under all the facts, of the probability that he was not, nothing being said on the subject by either party, is a question for the jury. May v. Smith (1893) 92 Ga. 95 (from syll. by ct.)

In Corson v. Malne C. R. Co. (1884) 76 Me. 244, the court held that if the jury undertook to decide that a person was unfit to be employed as a brakeman, on account of what they saw, or supposed they saw or could read, in his face and manner while testifying before them as a witness, they fell into a very grave error, and said: "As well might a jury find a man guilty of murder because in their opinion they could see guilt in his face. The law does not recognize physiognomy as an art or science sufficiently reliable to found a verdict upon,—not even against a railroad corporation."

In Penslee v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1890) 152 Mass. 155, it was argued that the jury had a right to determine from the appearance of a witness that he was so manifestly incompetent that the defendant was negligent in employing him as engineer. The court said there was nothing in the exceptions to show that there was anything in his appearance that would justify such an inference, and that it could not be presumed that there was. Keith v. New Haven, infra, was distinguished on the ground that there was other evidence of incompetency in that case, while in the case at bar the only evidence of incompetency was the single act of negligence.

In Keith v. New Haven & N. Co. (1885) 140 Mass. 175, the court declined to rule that the appearance and conduct of a car inspector in the presence of a jury, when considered together with other testimony tending to show his unfitness, might not be legally sufficient to satisfy them that he was an incompetent person.

Notice of a servant's want of competency for the duties of a brakeman cannot be imputed to an employer from the fact that he is a negro. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Christman (1896) 65 Tex. 369.

"The selection of a servant must be made with a view to the nature of the employment. If it involves special knowledge or experience, only men of special knowledge and experience should be employed. If the work may be well done by the unskilled and inexperienced it cannot be said that the master is lacking in the measure of care he owes to other employees, should he employ unskilled and inexperienced men upon it." Holland v. Tennessee Coal, I. & R. Co. (1890) 91 Ala. 444, 12 L. R. A. 232.

An employer's omission to question an applicant for work as to his competency is negligence only when there is no better source of information at hand, and cannot be imputed as culpable where information is sought from the applicant's former employer. Gier v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. (1895) 108 Cal. 129.

b. At time of promotion.

The principles which are applicable where a servant is assigned to duties of a more onerous or responsible nature than those which he was previously discharging will be apparent from the following decisions:

An employer is bound to institute affirmative inquiries in order to ascertain the qualifications of a servant whom he promotes to a position for which special qualifications are demanded, unless the servant has given proof of his capacity in some similar position. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Guyton (1888) 115 Ind. 450. There the court in commenting upon the evidence which was held to justify the jury in finding the defendant liable for the negligence of a conductor whom it had promoted without the usual examination, said: "It should be remembered that Stice [the conductor] had served the company as brakeman until quite recently before the unfortunate accident, and while his service as brakeman is not to be disregarded in determining his competency to act in the more responsible position of conductor, it does not follow, without more, that because he was an efficient and competent brakeman, and fit for promotion, he was also competent to take charge of and run a wild train."

In Harper v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1871) 47 Mo. 507, 4 Am. Rep. 353, the court approved arguendo the doctrine formulated in Shearm. & Redf. Neg. § 193, that "proof of the employment of one who had always been a mere clerk or a common laborer, to run a steam engine, would raise a presumption of negligence on the part of the master, without showing that he had actual notice of the servant's antecedents."

But evidence which merely goes to show that a servant has been employed in an inferior capacity will not justify the inference that the master was negligent in employing him in a much higher capacity in the same line of business. Edwards v. London & B. R. Co. (1865) 4 Fost. & F. 531.

What time or training is requisite to make a competent engineer is a question of fact. Hence, where the evidence is that the culpable servant had been a mere laborer in a mine before he became the engineer, and that the whole time he had worked at the mine amounted to six months at the most, it is error to instruct the jury that proof of the employment of one who had always been a manual laborer or a mule driver, to run a steam engine, raises a presumption of negligence of the master, without showing that he had actual notice of the servant's antecedents." Juch v. Dankwardt (1877) 85 Ill. 331.

In Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Kelly (1894) 24 U. S. App. 103, 63 Fed. Rep. 407, 11 C. C. A. 260, the defendant requested an instruction to the effect that, in determining whether the fireman was competent to handle an engine to switch cars at a station, the jury should consider how long he had been engaged as a locomotive fireman, what were his capacity and aptness for learning to handle an engine, how often before he had handled an engine on similar occasions, whether firemen frequently do switching before being promoted to engineers, "that firemen after a certain period of service as firemen are promoted to engineers," etc. The comments of the court were as follows: "The last expression is objectionable. It assumes it to be a fact that promotions from the place of firemen to that of engineer were of uniform, or at least customary, occurrence 'after a certain period of service as fireman,' without regard to the capacity, habits, and temper of particular individuals. There was no proof of such custom; none such, of course, has ever prevailed. . . . If it is the prevailing custom of engineers to leave the firemen in charge of their engines when switching or similar work is to be done, then it is to be presumed that brakemen, when they engage or continue in their employment, do so with the knowledge of the custom, assuming the additional hazard which the custom involves."

a. During time of service.

1. Generally.

A master does not discharge his entire obligation in the matter of hiring servants by inquiring fully concerning an applicant's fitness at the time he takes him into the service. It is his duty to exercise proper supervision over the work of his servants and through such supervision to keep himself advised as to the continued fitness of those in his employ. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Henthorne (1896) 43 U. S. App. 113, 73 Fed. Rep. 634. See also Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Nuckols (1895) 91 Va. 193; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Collarn (1881) 73 Ind. 261, 38 Am. Rep. 134; Wabash R. Co. v. McDaniels (1883) 107 U. S. 454, 27 L. ed. 605, supra, IX., a.

An employer "is in no case held to an undertaking to select absolutely competent and careful servants. The rule requires of him no more than the exercise of reasonable care in either case,—such care only as men of reasonable and ordinary prudence exercise; and when he has done this he cannot be held responsible for injuries which result from the incompetency of servants, or latent defects in machinery, so selected and employed. The only further duty then upon him is, the exercise of care in ascertaining any incompetency of the servant, or defect in the machinery, which the service may develop, and thereupon discharging the one and discarding the other." Holland v. Tennessee Coal, I. & R. Co. (1890) 91 Ala. 444, 12 L. R. A. 232.

The duty of a master requires the institution of inquiries to ascertain their character and qualifications, but when suitable and competent persons have been employed, the same degree of diligence is not demanded. Good character and proper qualifications may be presumed to continue, and the master may rely on that presumption until notice of a change. Blake v. Maine C. R. Co. (1879) 70 Me. 60, 35 Am. Rep. 297, citing Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1874) 55 N. Y. 579 (see infra).

Where an employer has shown due care in the choice of his servants no presumption arises afterwards that they have become unfit for their duties. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert (1881) 46 Mich. 176.

Thus, until informed to the contrary, a master has a right to assume that an agent or officer carefully chosen will use good judgment in making his own appointments and doing his own duties; and he has a right to rest upon that belief until, in the exercise of that general vigilance which devolves on himself, he finds they have been mistaken. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Dolan (1875) 32 Mich. 509.

In Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1874) 55 N. Y. 579, the defendant complained of the following charge: "But, if after a competent and proper person is employed for such a duty, his habits become such that it is unsafe to trust him any longer in that capacity, the company are bound to use, through their proper officers, such reasonable care and diligence in ascertaining what the man is, after he is employed, as they would be in his original employment." The court of appeals upheld the objection, saying: "Good character and proper qualifications once possessed may be presumed to continue, and I see no reason why a principal may not rely upon that presumption as to these personal qualities until he has notice of a change or knowledge of such facts as would be deemed equivalent to notice, or at least such as would put a reasonable man upon inquiry. The charge permitted the jury without restriction or limit to determine what particular supervision or watchfulness was necessary to exonerate the defendant from the charge of negligence. They might require periodical investigations, or an efficient detective system. They were at liberty to adopt any rule, and might adopt one which would practically make the defendant a guarantor of the correctness of every act of its employees. We have been referred to no authority for such a doctrine, and it would be manifestly unjust to adopt it." The court held that reasons for inspection of machinery or implements are not applicable to the case of an employee, and said: "If competent when employed, additional experience would naturally render him more so, and while his habits might change for the worse, there is no such depravity in human nature as in law requires special vigilance on the part of the employer to prevent it."

A master is not chargeable with notice of incompetency of a servant, so as to render him liable for the latter's negligence causing an injury to a fellow servant, by the mere statement of the latter that the former was incompetent, where he did not state facts showing incompetency. Snodgrass v. Carnegie Steel Co. (1896) 173 Pa. 228.

The plaintiff is rightly nonsuited where there is no evidence tending to prove that the employees, whose retention is alleged to establish negligence on the defendant's part, had ever shown any lack of skill or efficiency in the performance of their duties before the accident occurred in which the plaintiff was hurt. Curran v. Merchants' Mfg. Co. (1881) 130 Mass. 374, 39 Am. Rep. 457.

2. Single delinquency of servant prior to accident.

Proof of a single careless act of a street-car driver, committed at some past time, is not sufficient to show his incompetency or unfitness for the employment, so as to make his employment negligence of the company. Dallas City R. Co. v. Beeman (1889) 74 Tex. 291, following Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Myers (1881) 55 Tex. 110, where this is assumed in the argument to be the correct principle.

The law will not go so far as to hold a railroad corporation to such an extreme of circumspection as to compel it to note, at its peril, every lapse of its employees, where no notice thereof is directly communicated, and where the circumstances are not such as to afford a reasonable inference of the derelict conduct of the employee having become known to the employer prior to the act which gives origin to the action for damages. Huffman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. 78 Mo. 50, quoted with approval in Zumwalt v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1889) 35 Mo. App. 661.

The most elaborate discussion of the question how far a master is chargeable with negligence in retaining a servant who is merely shown to have been guilty of a single act of negligence prior to that which caused the plaintiff's injury is to be found in Baile v. New York & H. R. Co. (1874) 59 N. Y. 356, 17 Am. Rep. 325, where the plaintiff was held to have been rightly nonsuited. The court said: "An individual who by years of faithful service has shown himself trustworthy, vigilant, and competent, is not disqualified for further employment, and proved either incompetent or careless, and not trustworthy, by a single mistake or act of forgetfulness and omission to exercise the highest degree of caution and presence of mind. The fact would only show what must be true of every human being, that the individual was capable of an act of negligence, forgetfulness, or error of judgment. This must be the case as to all employees of corporations until a race of servants can be found free from the defects and infirmities of humanity. A single act may, under some circumstances, show an individual to be an improper and unfit person for a position of trust, or any particular service, as when such act is intentional and done wantonly, regardless of consequences, or maliciously. So the manner in which a specific act is performed may conclusively show the utter incompetency of the actor, and his inability to perform a particular service. But a single act of casual neglect does not, per se, tend to prove the party to be careless and imprudent, and unfitted for a position requiring care and prudence. Character is formed and qualities exhibited by a series of acts, and not by a single act. An engineer might from inattention omit to sound the whistle or ring the bell at a road crossing, but such fact would not tend to prove him a careless and negligent servant of the company. The company is only charged with the duty of employing those who have acquired a good character in respect to the qualifications called for by the particular service, and no one would say that a good character acquired by long service was destroyed or seriously impaired by a single involuntary and unintentional fault. (Murphy v. Pollock (1863) 15 Ir. C. L. Rep. 224.) But this appeal does not necessarily depend upon the correctness of this view of the effect to be given to a single instance of neglect. All that the corporation defendant was bound to do, after the occurrence, was to inquire into it, and ascertain the facts, and act in the discharge or retention of the switchman with reference to the facts as ascertained, as reasonable prudence and care should dictate, and if such care and caution was exercised, the company is not liable, although its general agent erred in judgment in retaining the switchman in the same service. Ordinary care and a reasonable exercise of discretion and judgment is all that is necessary to absolve the corporation from the charge of neglect of duty in such a case."

In Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Guyton (1888) 115 Ind. 450, the court said: "The idea is not to be tolerated that the law will pronounce a person, who is shown to be qualified by years of efficient service, incompetent because of a single mistake or act of forgetfulness. The fact cannot, however, be disguised that a single act, with the circumstances surrounding it, where the consequences are so overwhelming as the bringing of two trains of cars, running at a high rate of speed, into collision, on the same railroad track, may tend very strongly to show the incompetency of the actor to perform the service to which he was assigned."

The mere fact that a yard master had sent an engine upon the track when a coming train was overdue does not conclusively show that the company was negligent in keeping him in its service, since he might have had information showing that the train would not arrive for some time. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert (1881) 46 Mich. 176.

Of course there is no difficulty in holding that the fact that an engineer in a coal mine has on a previous occasion made a missholst does not charge his employer with knowledge of his incompetency so as to make it liable to one killed on the subsequent occasion of a missholst, where there is no evidence that it was notified of the accident. Mulhern v. Lehigh Valley Coal Co. (1894) 161 Pa. 270.

In Murphy v. Pollock (1863) 15 Ir. C. L. Rep. 224, Deasy, B., and Pigot, C. B., held that the fact of an employer's hiring and retaining in his employment an incompetent person is evidence from which a jury may fairly infer that the employer was aware of such incompetency. Fitzgerald and Hughes, BB., considered that, even supposing a reasonable man might, from the single act adduced in this case to establish the incompetency, infer that he was wanting in ordinary skill and care, such a deduction was not itself evidenced from which a reasonable man could infer want of reasonable care on the master's part in selecting him or knowledge of his incompetency. In the Exchequer Chamber it was held, on a review of the facts, that there was no evidence to go to the jury upon the question of the delinquent servant's incompetency, or of the employer's knowledge of such incompetency. The above general propositions as to the onus of proof were not discussed.

In Parker v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (1895) 18 R. I. 778, the court denied that "the point urged by plaintiff's counsel, viz., that as no person remained at the switch during the day, in accordance with the custom to have someone there constantly, the jury may properly have inferred that the defendant knew that it was unattended, and hence was guilty of negligence, is of any importance, so long as someone was provided to look after the same, for it was clearly not necessarily incumbent on the defendant to have a switchman there continuously. Its duty was to provide a competent person to take care of the switch during the temporary absence of Tourtellot [the regular switchman] and having done this, it had the right to presume that the person so provided would discharge his duty. And the mere fact that he did not remain at said switch continuously during . . . the temporary absence could not properly be construed by the jury as an implied notice to the company that said switch was unattended."

In a suit against a railroad company by a brakeman to recover damages for injuries received while coupling cars, evidence that the engineer, shortly before, had declared to the plaintiff that he "would as soon run over him as not," is admissible as bearing upon the question whether the company selected an unsuitable man for engineer, but the jury should be charged that, if the malice of the engineer toward the plaintiff was the cause of the injury, there could be no recovery. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Willie (1880) 53 Tex. 318, 37 Am. Rep. 756.

3. Several previous delinquencies.

The controlling principle which determines what deductions may properly be drawn from evidence that he has been guilty of several derelictions of duty before the particular act which caused the injury in suit is entirely analogous to that which has already been noticed in connection with the subject of prior failure of inanimate appliances—that is, such evidence is competent to establish negligence on the master's part in retaining the servant, but not to establish the actual fact that the servant was wanting in due care at the time when the accident occurred, or was generally incompetent.

The former branch of the rule is illustrated by the following decisions:

Negligence in retaining a servant may be established by showing that before his careless act had caused the injury complained of he had committed several acts of the same character. Huffman v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1883) 73 Mo. 50.

If it is shown that the master knew of the acts, or that they were of such a character and so frequent that he must have known of them, the master may be chargeable with negligence in retaining such servant. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert (1881) 46 Mich. 176.

In Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby (1871) 38 Ind. 294, the court said: "We think that it is well settled, not only by the authorities, but in reason and on principle, that for the purpose of showing that the officers of a railroad company had not exercised due care, prudence, and caution in the employment, or in retaining in service of careful, prudent, and skilful persons to manage and operate such road, and for the purpose of charging such corporation with notice of the incompetency of its employees, it may be shown that such employees had been guilty of specific acts of carelessness, unskillfulness, and incompetency, and that such acts were known to such officers prior to the employment of such agents, or that such employees had been retained in such service after notice of such acts." Citing Gahagan v. Boston & L. R. Co. (1861) 1 Allen, 187.

A railroad company is liable for the death of an employee, caused by disobedience of its rules by a fellow servant, where such disobedience is habitual, and has come to its knowledge and is pursued with its acquiescence, or is the result of a want of vigilance in supervising the conduct of its employees. Whittaker v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1891) 126 N. Y. 544, Affirming mem. (1890) 84 N. Y. S. R. 822.

Evidence that a certain engineer was careless in handling his engine in making couplings; that he had been reported to the conductor; and that his engine was constantly being repaired for defects which would not have occurred had he exercised proper care,—is sufficient to charge the railroad company with notice of his incompetency, although there is testimony that he was a careful and safe engineer. Houston & T. C. R. Co. v. Patten (1888; Tex.) 9 S. W. 175.

In Coppins v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1890) 122 N. Y. 557, the defendant was held liable, where the servant was shown to have been absent several times a month at an hour when his presence was demanded to secure the safe operation of the road, and this dereliction of duty was known to the servant's immediate superior.

Where it appears that a servant has been repeatedly guilty of carelessness or incompetency it is usually for the jury to determine whether the master knew of it or would have known if he had exercised ordinary care. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert (1881) 46 Mich. 176.

In Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1874) 55 N. Y. 579, evidence was given that the negligent servant was in the habit of drinking daily, many times, and had become somewhat dissipated, and that he was intoxicated on the night of the accident. The evidence of knowledge, or notice to the defendant's representatives, was not conclusive, but facts were proved from which the jury might infer such knowledge. They were accustomed to daily intercourse with the servant, saw him in drinking places, and were present on some occasions when he drank. On one occasion one of them testified that he reprimanded the servant for drinking. On another occasion a witness thinks that he heard the same one say that "he must quit this," referring to his drinking habits. Held, that a motion for a nonsuit was properly denied. The court said: "It is quite evident that both . . . [the employer's representatives] had an opportunity to know the fact from actual observation; and we think the jury might infer that they did know it, although they each testified that they did not recollect of seeing him drink, or of seeing him when he was intoxicated. It was for the jury to determine the credibility of witnesses and the weight and construction to be given to the evidence. If there was any evidence to justify a verdict, the motion for a nonsuit was properly denied, and we think there was."

Where evidence is given tending to show that a servant was in an intoxicated condition as often as two or three times a week, that this was his usual condition for nearly two years before the accident, during all the time he worked for the defendant, and that the defendant's superintendent was personally present at the place of that work every other day, and was there the day on which the accident happened; but no direct testimony is offered that defendants knew of the habits of Delamater,—it is error to nonsuit the plaintiff. Tonnese v. Sanford (1890) 58 Hun, 415,—the court remarking that the superintendent was so frequently present where the servant was at work, and the habits were proved to be so settled and continuous, that it was a question for the jury to pass upon as to his knowledge or means of knowledge.

Evidence tending to show that during the summer preceding the accident, the delinquent servant had, on numerous occasions, run engines through the defendant's yard and in and across the streets of the city where the accident occurred, without giving any notice of their movements; that this was known to the train dispatcher and superintendent of the defendant's road; and that this course of action upon his part was so frequent and continuous that it should have been known to the defendant's officers if they had properly discharged their duty,—is sufficient to justify the submission to the jury of the question whether the defendant's officers, whose duty it was to employ and discharge employees occupying the position held by the delinquent servant, knew, or ought to have known, that he was thus habitually negligent. The court committed no error in submitting the question of defendant's negligence to the jury, and that its finding upon that question should be upheld. Wall v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1889) 54 Hun, 459. (Coppins v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1888) 48 Hun, 292.)

Evidence of the commission of several previous acts of negligence similar to that which caused the injury raises a question for the jury whether the master was negligent in keeping the delinquent servant in his employment. Sutton v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1892) 50 N. Y. S. R. 514.

In Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1874) 55 N. Y. 579, it was objected that the trial court had erred in admitting in evidence a declaration by the defendant's superintendent that he had heard that the negligent servant had been "off on a spree, drinking;" that the servant did not deny it, and that the superintendent reprimanded him for it. The court of appeals, however, said: "As evidence of the fact of the habit of drinking it [the declaration] was not admissible, within the general rule, that the declarations of an agent will not bind the principal unless made at the time of doing some act within the scope of the agency, and which in fact constitutes a part of the act itself ([Luby v. Hudson River R. Co. (1858)] 17 N. Y. 181; [First Baptist Church v. Brooklyn F. Ins. Co. (1863)] 28 N. Y. 153.) But we think this evidence was competent to prove notice to Flak [the superintendent]. Other evidence was produced that Allison [the negligent servant] was in the habit of drinking to excess, and the remark, if it had reference to such habit, was pertinent to establish that he knew it. It would be competent to prove that a third person told him of it; and it is more satisfactory to establish the fact that he admitted such knowledge at the time. It is evidence of a material fact. An admission afterward that he had known the fact would stand upon a different footing. It is not error to receive evidence, if competent, for any purpose."

In Hilts v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (1885) 55 Mich. 437, the only question to be determined by the jury was whether the defendant was negligent in failing to learn as to habits of intoxication of the engineer who was competent and safe when hired. The court said: "If the engineer was addicted to the habitual use of intoxicating liquor to such excess that his intoxicated condition was observed and known by the employees and others coming in contact with him for a period covering several months of time, and if by inquiry or observation the officers of the company during that time would have discovered his unfitness for the position of engineer by reason of his habits of becoming intoxicated, the omission to make inquiry or to observe his condition is negligence fully as culpable as if they had employed a notoriously incompetent engineer without inquiry." The jury specially found that before the accident he had been intoxicated or under the influence of liquor when running his engine three times, and their verdict for plaintiff was sustained.

In Zumwalt v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1889) 35 Mo. App. 661, the only evidence tending to show that during the period of a brakeman's employment he had exhibited habits of intoxication, was testimony of one witness as to such habit about four years prior to the accident. The court remarked that this testimony did not fix any considerable length of time during which these habits continued, and that there was no evidence to show such habit during the subsequent four years. The defendant, on the other hand, adduced a mass of evidence tending to show that during his employment for a part of nine years with short intervals during which he had voluntarily quit work, he had demeaned himself as a sober and competent man. There was no evidence whatever that any officer of the defendant, having power to employ and discharge brakemen upon its trains, knew of any such habit in the brakeman, at the time when the accident took place, or at any other time. The master was held not liable.

In Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1890) 38 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467, it was held that "character for care . . . must . . . be proved by evidence of general reputation, and not of special acts." The court referred to Greenl. Ev. §§ 461-469, for the general principle, and said: "Character grows out of special acts, but is not proved by them. Indeed, special acts do very often indicate frailties or vices that are altogether contrary to the character actually established. And sometimes the very frailties that may be proved against a man may have been regarded by him in so serious a light as to have produced great improvement of character. Besides this, ordinary care implies occasional acts of carelessness, for all men are fallible in this respect, and the law demands only the ordinary."

But this has been said, in Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby (1871) 38 Ind. 294, to "stand alone unsustained and unsupported." The following decisions are based on the second branch of the rule: plaintiff desired to put in testimony as to certain specific acts of carelessness on the part of the foreman while engaged on the same job, and before the accident happened. The court said: "This was properly excluded. Because a servant may have been guilty of negligence on certain specified occasions, it by no means follows that he was on the occasion in question, or that he might not ordinarily be a careful and skilful workman, and properly employed as such. The investigation of other individual acts of alleged carelessness on the foreman's part would necessarily have a tendency to confuse the case by collateral inquiries, to protract it indefinitely if those inquiries were carefully made, and to mislead and distract a court or jury from the true issue. Robinson v. Fitchburg & W. R. Co. (1856) 7 Gray, 62; Maguire v. Middlesex R. Co. (1874) 115 Mass. 239."

A jury should not be told that if they find the delinquent fellow servant was frequently, and for an improper length of time, absent from his post, and the practice was known, they might consider the fact as bearing on the question of his skill and competency. Kindel v. Hall (1890) 8 Colo. App. 63.

Yet in Gier v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. (1895) 108 Cal. 120, it was remarked that evidence of individual acts evincing negligence or incompetency is admissible, not to show his reputation, but that the employee was inevitably unfit or incompetent.

4. After what time knowledge of servant's unfitness will be inferred.

To affect the employer with liability for the incompetency of a servant, it is not necessary that it should actually be brought to his knowledge. If it continue for such a length of time that a careful and diligent supervision of its business ought to bring it to light, he is chargeable with notice of its existence. Whittaker v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1891) 126 N. Y. 544.

Whether the master ought to have discovered, prior to the accident in suit, that the culpable servant had been so frequently guilty of acts indicating that his continued employment was negligence as regards his co-servants, is, as in all these cases, primarily a question for the jury. The extent to which one court of eminence has gone in controlling the findings of a jury will be apparent from the elaborately discussed case of Cameron v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1895) 145 N. Y. 400, where a verdict was set aside by which a railroad company was declared to be negligent in retaining a brakeman who had habitually violated a rule. The following extracts from the opinion sufficiently explain the grounds upon which the conclusion was based: "There is no arbitrary rule of law that charges the master with constructive notice of the negligent omissions of duty on the part of a co-servant, after the lapse of a certain time, under all circumstances. The doctrine of constructive notice is founded upon reasonable and just considerations, and the mere lapse of time is not always the test of negligence on the part of the master. If a defect exists in the appliances furnished the servant for doing his work of such a character and for such a length of time as to enable the master to discover and remedy it by reasonable vigilance, inspection, or examination, then the law will imply notice, since he ought to know what can thus be ascertained. The same rule will apply where the place furnished to the servant to do his work becomes defective, dangerous, or unsafe by use or otherwise. So, when the negligence of a coservant in performing his work is of such a character as to leave traces or evidence of it in the work itself, which can be seen or discovered by reasonable examination, the master might be chargeable after it had continued for such a length of time as to render it reasonable to assume that he either must have known of the omission of duty, or could have known of it by the exercise of reasonable care, or where the incompetency of the servant is frequently displayed under the eye and observation of some officer or foreman who represents the corporation or had the power to discharge him. But how was the master in this case to know that Norton habitually violated the rules for his own protection and that of his coservants? His work was performed on freight trains running over a long line of railroad, with little, if any, opportunity for any officer or representative of the company to watch or observe him at any one point. He had sufficient ability and intelligence to do his work, and his omissions of duty were purely wilful or thoughtless. It would be manifestly unreasonable and unjust under such circumstances to impute negligence to this defendant for the sole reason that during four months it failed to detect his delinquencies. The defendant had given him by its rules plain and simple instructions to govern his conduct with respect to the switches, and there was no reason to suspect that they would be disregarded, since it was quite as convenient for him to obey as to violate them. Moreover, it had in these same rules invited and requested all of his coservants to make prompt report to the company of any neglect or disobedience of the rules on his part, and no complaint had been made. It was reasonable to assume that his coemployees, whose lives might be endangered by his neglect, would observe and report his omissions of duty, if any, and if they failed to observe any, how can it be said that the defendant itself was in fault for not discovering what his coservants themselves had not discovered? The negligent acts of Norton took place while he was working on the same train and in a like capacity with the deceased. It is more reasonable to suppose that they were done in his presence, or under his observation, than to imply knowledge on the part of the defendant, and if it can be said that the deceased knew of these omissions of duty on the part of his fellow brakeman, and failed to report them, he might be regarded as voluntarily assuming the risks and dangers incident to his association in a common work with a careless or incompetent coservant. There is a manifest inconsistency in assuming that the officers or representatives of the defendant knew, or could have known, of Norton's violation of the rules, and at the same time that the deceased did not. On the evidence in the case it is true that the defendant's servant was unfaithful, and that his want of care resulted in the death of the plaintiff's intestate. But the defendant cannot be made liable for his negligent act, unless it was at fault in selecting him for the work, which is not claimed, or in failing to adopt such means as ordinary prudence and care would dictate to secure his fidelity, and we are unable to perceive what more it could have done, unless it employed other men to watch his conduct, and that would be plainly an unreasonable requirement."

1. Generally.

Where an injury has occurred through the incompetency, recklessness, or unskillfulness of a servant who was generally known and reputed to be unfit, reckless, or unskillful, evidence of the fact that he was generally so reputed, is competent as tending to show that the master, by the exercise of that ordinary and reasonable care required in his employment, could and ought to have known of his unfitness, want of skill, or reckless habit. Western Stone Co. v. Whalen (1894) 151 Ill. 472, approving the following statement of principles in Shearman & Redfield on Negligence, § 223: "In applying the rule just stated, it is clearly sufficient for a servant, injured by the incompetency of a fellow servant, to prove that such fellow servant's incompetency was actually known to the master, or to his responsible representative to whom the power of discharging had been delegated, or that either of them had received information of the fact sufficient to put a reasonably careful man upon inquiry, or that the servant had a general reputation for incompetency, to such an extent that, if the master had maintained a habit of vigilant supervision and inquiry, he would probably have learned the fact."

As a master is bound to use due care both in procuring and retaining suitable persons as servants, evidence that an employee's reputation for competency was bad, is competent upon the question whether the master was negligent in hiring him. Hatt v. Nay (1887) 144 Mass. 180.

Hence, where evidence has been given that the servant through whose misconduct the accident in suit occurred was drunk at the time of such accident, it is proper to admit evidence that the master, through his agents, knew or ought to have known, from a due supervision of his employees, that the culpable servant had a general reputation of being an habitual and excessive drinker of intoxicating liquors. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Henthorne (1896) 43 U. S. App. 113, 73 Fed. Rep. 634.

On the other hand, evidence going to show that a fellow servant of the plaintiff had a reputation for recklessness is incompetent, where there is no proof that the injury in suit was caused by any improper conduct on his part. Hawk v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1887; Pa.) 9 Cent. Rep. 786.

So, evidence of the culpable servants' general reputation for intemperance is irrelevant where there is no evidence that he was drunk or negligent at the time of the accident. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover (1894) 79 Md. 253, 25 L. R. A. 710.

An instruction is erroneous which tells the jury that unless the culpable servant was drunk at the time of the accident, and his negligence by reason of such drunkenness produced or contributed to the accident, evidence of general reputation as to his incompetency is not relevant and cannot be considered "unless such reputation was brought home to the knowledge of the defendant before the accident." The condition thus appended is inaccurate, because, on the one hand, if the culpable servant did not cause the accident, the master's knowledge of his reputation has nothing to do with the case; while, on the other hand, if the culpable servant did, by his intemperance, cause the accident, it is immaterial whether the master had actual knowledge of his bad reputation, inasmuch as he was negligent in not knowing it. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover (1894) 79 Md. 253, 25 L. R. A. 710.

Where the employer is a corporation, unless actual knowledge of the habits of the servant which render him unfit for the employment is brought home to some one of its officers who has power to employ and discharge such employees, the plaintiff must, in order to make out the right to recover upon the ground of its negligence in retaining the servant, show that the unfit habit of the servant was so notorious that such officer or officers of the defendant ought to have known of it by reasonable care and inspection. Zumwalt v. Chicago & A. R. Co. (1889) 85 Mo. App. 661.

If the injury result from the negligence or misconduct of an agent of the company, liability can be imposed on it by showing incompetency of the agent, and the want of reasonable care and prudence in his selection, or his continuance in place after notice of his unfitness. New Orleans, J. & G. N. R. Co. v. Hughes (1873) 49 Miss. 258.

Evidence that an employee was, when first employed, reputed to be an habitual drunkard in the community where he lived, and that, while in the employment, he was drunk every night, is competent to show that the defendants knowingly, or in ignorance caused by their own negligence, employed an habitual drunkard, and thereby occasioned the injury. Gilman v. Eastern R. Corp. (1885) 10 Allen, 233, 87 Am. Dec. 635, 13 Allen, 433, 90 Am. Dec. 210.

This case was followed, and the general principles elaborately discussed, in the following passage of the opinion in Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co. (1870) 20 Mich. 105, 4 Am. Rep. 364: "If the defendants continue a man in their employ who is so notoriously unfit as to have established a general reputation to that effect, it is unreasonable, the plaintiff argues, to suppose the officers of the defendants ignorant of that fact, unless we excuse their want of information on the ground of neglect of duty on their part to their employees and the public so gross as to make it proper and just to hold them responsible to the same extent as if they were fully informed of all the facts. And if they fail to inquire into the cause of accidents where manifestly this is an important part of their duty, and a high obligation rests upon them to accomplish it thoroughly and faithfully, they cannot afterwards justly plead their ignorance to excuse their principal from responsibility for other accidents resulting from the same cause. It is plain, however, that Harris is not shown to have a general reputation for carelessness or unfitness of any description. No one ventures to express an opinion to that effect. The evidence only tends to show that when an accident occurred, remarks were made that he was careless, or that he went too fast. They were such remarks, we suppose, as were almost certain to be made in any case, when an unfortunate accident occurs, while the consequences are exciting the bystanders, and before inquiry and calm consideration have determined whether there is any basis for them in justice or not. Such remarks are of very trifling importance, and if they would tend to convict a man of negligence, few engineers of much experience, we apprehend, would escape condemnation. And of how little importance they were in the present case, and how little likely to express settled opinions, may be inferred from the fact that no one of the persons supposed to have made these remarks is placed upon the stand to testify to facts which would justify them. We think, therefore, that the evidence of reputation should be dismissed from further consideration. It will not be inferred from what we have said, that we should hold that evidence of a general reputation, such as was sought to be proved in this case, would be inadmissible. From the 41 L. R. A.

language employed in some cases it might be supposed that the notice of unfitness, which was to charge the employer, must be nothing else than actual notice; but we are not disposed to question in the least the correctness of the doctrine advanced in the case of Gilman v. Eastern R. Corp. (1885) 10 Allen, 233, 87 Am. Dec. 635, and which put upon the employer the responsibility of negligently employing an unfit person, generally known and reputed to be such, notwithstanding the employer may in fact have been ignorant of such unfitness. The ignorance itself is negligence in a case in which any proper inquiry would have obtained the necessary information, and where the duty to inquire was plainly imperative. See Wright v. New York C. R. Co. (1862) 25 N. Y. 566."

In Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Hoover (1894) 79 Md. 253, 25 L. R. A. 71, the court put the question: "Can you fix upon the master a failure to use due care in selecting careful servants by showing such notorious or general reputation respecting the servant's unfitness or incompetency as that the master could not, without negligence on his part, have been ignorant of it when he employed the servant?"—and answered it as follows: "About this there ought to be no difficulty. If the servant's general reputation before employment is so notorious as to unfitness as that it must have been known to the master but for his, the master's, negligence in not informing himself—if he could have been ignorant of it only because he failed to make investigation,—then it is obvious that he has not used the care and caution which the law demands of him in selecting his employees. Hence, the servant's general reputation for unfitness may be sufficient to overcome the presumption that the master used due care in his selection, even though actual knowledge of such reputation for unfitness on the master's part is not shown." Wood, Mast. & S. § 420.

In Monahan v. Worcester (1890) 150 Mass. 430, the court said: "The master is bound to use reasonable care in selecting his servants, and if a person is incompetent for the work he is employed to do, the fact that he is generally reputed in the community to want those qualities which are necessary for the proper performance of the work certainly has some tendency to show that the master would have found out that the servant was incompetent, if proper means had been taken to ascertain the qualifications of the servant. We cannot say that it may not be a matter of common repute in a community that a man is physically weak, and is partially blind and deaf."

In Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Sullivan (1872) 63 Ill. 293, the defendant was held liable on the ground that, upon the evidence, the character of the servant as an intemperate man must have been known to the officers of the company, since his habits in that regard were so notorious among the men and so long continued that it was impossible that the division superintendent could have been ignorant of them.

A railroad company is charged with knowledge of the reputation of a watchman who has been in its employ for nine years, where such reputation is a matter of common knowledge in the county. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Hackett (1894) 58 Ark. 381.

To the same general effect, see Lake Shore & M. R. Co. v. Stupak (1889) 123 Ind. 210; Grube v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1889) 98 Mo. 330, 4 L. R. A. 776.

The general reputation of the culpable employee for unfitness at any time during his employment is admissible. Hence, testimony as to such reputation is not objectionable for the reason that it is not distinctly confined to a period just preceding the receipt of the injury by the plaintiff. Mexican Nat. R. Co. v. Mustette (1894) 7 Tex. Civ. App. 169.

But negligence cannot be imputed to a railroad company for not knowing the reputation acquired by a servant in a city on one of its lines ten or fifteen years before the accident in suit, at a time when he was still attending school and had not yet entered the company's employment. Baird v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1897) 16 App. Div. 490.

Where a man is engaged in an occupation, which, like that of a railroad engineer, brings him into contact with only one class of the community, inquiries as to his reputation must be confined to that class. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Davis (1893) 4 Tex. Civ. App. 468, holding that a question worded: "Do you know what his general reputation was, and how he was generally regarded as to care and competency, while running his engine?"—was too general.

As a general reputation regarding the incompetency of a servant is admissible on the ground that it furnishes some reason to believe that, if the master had exercised due care, he might have learned or heard of the incompetency, it necessarily follows that "the reputation of a foreman amongst a few workmen employed under him is not a general reputation. It is merely the opinion of a small number of men, of which there is no sufficient reason to suppose the master may be cognizant or which he may be bound to heed." Driscoll v. Fall River (1895) 163 Mass. 105.

The principle which in the above cases is seen to operate to the disadvantage of the master sometimes inures to his benefit.

Thus, the general reputation of a servant for competency and care at the time of employment, of such character as to imply information to the employer, is admissible as tending to disprove negligence in hiring him. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Morrissey (1891) 45 Ill. App. 127.

There can be no inference of negligence on the part of a railroad company in regard to the employment of a brakeman where there is no evidence that he had not a good reputation at the time of his hiring, or at any other time than during two days during which he had been engaged in making a single trip on a certain train. Van Dusen v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1891) 12 N. Y. S. R. 351.

In one case we find this remark: "Reputation is not competent evidence to charge a master with negligence in the employment of a servant. Because, first, it may be false, and, secondly he may never have heard it." Haskin v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1878) 65 Barb. 129.

But this statement is altogether too sweeping as the foregoing authorities very clearly indicate.

2. Reputation not evidence of servant's unfitness.

In some cases the theory has been advanced by counsel that the servant's reputation for incompetency is evidence that he is actually incompetent, and not simply a circumstance which puts the master upon inquiry as to whether he is or is not competent. But this contention has always been rejected. Thus, it has been held that proof that an engineer has a general reputation of drunkenness puts the employer on inquiry as to his habits, but is not conclusive evidence that he is really addicted to the liquor habit. Cosgrove v. Pitman (1894) 103 Cal. 268.

(1871) 38 Ind. 294, a claim that the only evidence that was admissible, for the purpose of charging the company with notice as to the incompetency of an employee, was his general character, was rejected. His general character might be not only good, but very good, while the defendant had actual knowledge that he was, in point of fact, careless, negligent, reckless, unskilful, and incompetent; or his general reputation might be that of a sober man, when, in point of fact, the defendant knew that he was in the habit of getting drunk, and that when drunk he was desperate and reckless.

In Gier v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. (1895) 108 Cal. 129, the court held that it is the character of the employee which is the object of ultimate determination, not his reputation, and that as evidence of reputation becomes necessary only where there is an inability to furnish direct proof of the employer's knowledge, so it is proper only after the establishment of the fact that the employee is in truth an unfit person. It said: "Reputation is not proof of that fact. A man's reputation may be at variance with his character or in accord with it. He may be reputed reckless, and in fact be careful. An employer is not bound to discharge an employee merely because of his ill repute; but he is culpable if he retains in his employ a servant with a bad reputation, well founded."

The doctrine that specific acts of carelessness are not admissible as evidence of incompetency was also recognized in Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Davis (1893) 4 Tex. Civ. App. 468.

Evidence of previous specific acts of negligence on the part of the culpable servant, known to the master's superintendent, is not admissible as bearing upon the question whether he was negligent in setting the plaintiff to work in an unsafe place, or in failing to warn him of the danger to which he was exposed in that place. Connors v. Morton (1894) 160 Mass. 333.

A servant's reputation for carelessness is not competent evidence, where the sole question at issue is whether he discharged his duty faithfully at the time of the accident. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Colvin (1888) 118 Pa. 230.

3. Nicknames as evidence.

Evidence that the culpable servant's general reputation prior to the accident was that he was "a little off," and that among railroad men he was usually called "Crazy Brown," is admissible to prove the master's knowledge of his unfitness. Park v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1895) 85 Hun. 184.

The fact that a servant is called by his fellow employees "Crazy Nolan" is not, in the absence of other proof, competent evidence to show that he is actually crazy. Marrinan v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1897) 13 App. Div. 439. (In this case the court seems to have scarcely realized the true force of the distinction between the admissibility of such evidence to show constructive notice to the master, and its admissibility to prove the fact in regard to which the reputation existed.)

In a subsequent case this ruling was cited with approval, and a new trial ordered, on the ground that the jury had not been left uninfluenced by the evidence of a nickname, ("crazy") which had been applied to the culpable servant. Baird v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1897) 16 App. Div. 490.

Evidence that an engineer in defendant's employ, through whose negligence plaintiff was injured, was known by the nicknames of "Crazy

Pete" and the "Wild Irishman," is inadmissible either for the purpose of showing that the engineer was incompetent or negligent, or for the purpose of showing that the employer knew of his incompetence or negligence. St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Corgan (1891) 49 Ill. App. 229.

"Nicknames are not so generally expressive of the characteristics of the persons to whom they are applied as to be competent evidence for the purpose of proving that the bearer of the name possessed the characteristics denoted by a nickname." Marrinan v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1897) 13 App. Div. 439.

a. Omission to ascertain capacity of servant who is injured.

A corollary from the principle that if a person of apparently full age and mature understanding undertakes certain duties he is presumed to appreciate and accept the risks incident thereto (see Bailey's Personal Injuries, § 2718 et seq.) is that an employer where he hires a man of twenty years of age is not bound to examine him as to his experience and capacity with a view to ascertain whether he needs instruction as to the dangers of the work. O'Neal v. Chicago & I. Coal R. Co. (1892) 132 Ind. 110; Pittsburgh, C. & S. L. R. Co. v. Adams (1885) 105 Ind. 151.

The case is different where a servant hired for one kind of work is directed to perform some other requiring special skill. Thus the act of a foreman in directing a common laborer employed to break stone and drill holes, to draw a charge from a blast, without ascertaining what his knowledge or experience is, constitutes negligence as matter of law. Vitto v. Farley (1895) 15 Misc. 153.

See also the note on the Duty to Instruct a Servant, which will shortly appear in this series, for other cases illustrating this principle from an analogous standpoint.

X. Employer's duty as to the supervision of appliances not owned by him but used by his servants.

a. Introductory.

The precise extent of the responsibility of an employer in regard to the supervision of instrumentalities which he does not own, but which his servants are obliged to make use of in the course of their work, is not easy to determine from the adjudged cases.

Of course, if they have become for practical purposes a portion of his business plant, no distinction can logically be based upon the bare circumstance that he has a merely qualified right of property in them.

Thus, the fact that the track on which a railroad company operates its trains belongs to another company does not relieve it of its obligation to use due care to see that it is kept in a safe condition for the use of the trainmen. Smith v. Memphis & L. R. R. Co. (1883) 18 Fed. Rep. 304 (in charge to jury).

So, the fact that an employer does not own a machine, and does not know that it is defective, does not relieve him from liability for an injury to an employee caused by a defect therein, where he pays for the use of such machine, and it is used under the superintendence of his foreman and representative. Higgins v. Williams (1896) 114 Cal. 176.

Some rulings ascribe a considerable importance to the question whether the employer had or had not the power to control the instrumentalities.

A warehouseman who receives cargo from a vessel upon a swinging stage placed in position 41 L. R. A.

by those in charge of the vessel, and entirely under their control and management, is not responsible for the giving way of the supporting tackle, unless it is shown that he neglected his duty of inspection and warning, and, in the absence of anything to excite suspicion or apprehension, he may assume that due care would be used by those in charge of the vessel. Moynihan v. King's Windsor Cement Dry Mortar Co. (1897) 168 Mass. 450.

In Dixon v. Western U. Teleg. Co. (1895) 71 Fed. Rep. 143, it was held that "when in the course of the erection of a telegraph pole, an occasion arises for the casual and sporadic use of a telephone pole belonging to another company, to remove an obstructing wire, . . . [it was not a] breach of the master's duty to direct an employee to climb such telephone pole without a previous inspection of it having been made. Whether the defendant would be responsible for a failure to inspect, if the pole had belonged to it," was a question which it was deemed not to be necessary to consider."

In Hughes v. Malden & M. Gaslight Co. (1897) 168 Mass. 395, plaintiff was injured while working in a trench which was neither dug nor controlled by the defendant. The court, in discussing the question what the plaintiff had a right to expect when set to work in such a place, said: "He had not a right to expect it to shore the sides of the trench or to make it safer than it was, because, as was manifest, and as the plaintiff must be taken to have known, the defendant had no control over the trench. He had a right to expect that, if the defendant knew of any danger which the plaintiff did not know and ought not to be assumed to know, it would inform him. But no such knowledge on the part of the defendant was shown. It does not appear to have known anything except what was visible to the eye, or to have been able or bound to infer from what was visible anything which the plaintiff with his experience was not equally able to infer. What more could it have done? There is no reason to suppose that inspection would have disclosed anything beyond the visible facts, and therefore it is not necessary to consider whether the duty of inspection existing with regard to cars received from connecting lines to be forwarded on a railroad would be held to exist in such a case as this."

Compare also the remarks of Morton, J., in Trask v. Old Colony R. Co. (1892) 156 Mass. 298: "It may not be necessary, in order to render an employer liable for an injury occurring to an employee through a defect in the ways, works, or machinery, that they should belong to him, but it should at least appear that he has the control of them, and that they are used in his business, by his authority, express or implied. . . . Neither the employer nor any person in his service can be justly charged with negligence as to matters over which they have no control."

The reasoning in these cases, however, is scarcely satisfactory, for even if the want of a power to exercise over the instrumentalities that limited right of property which is implied in the process of removing some dangerous defect be a conclusive ground for not holding him liable for the existence of the defect, it does not by any means follow that he may not properly be held liable for a failure to perform the concurrent duty which arises upon the discovery of an abnormal defect, the duty, that is to say, to warn the servant.

If a car or other appliance is actually borrowed, the employer is regarded as the owner pro tempore, and his liability is measured by the rule as to furnishing proper instrumentalities, and not by the rule as to inspection merely. Thus, it is held that the owner of a quarry using a car furnished by a railroad company to convey stone from its quarry to the railroad owes the same duty to its employees in respect to such car as though the car were owned by it. Spaulding v. W. N. Flynt Granite Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 587, distinguishing the cases where cars of other companies are received merely for forwarding.

b. Rule as to the inspection of foreign cars.

1. General principles.

That some provision must be made for the inspection of these is universally conceded by courts which take the ground that the receiving company's duty is fully discharged when he has employed competent inspectors. Keith v. New Haven & N. Co. (1885) 140 Mass. 175; S. P. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. McMullen (1888) 117 Ind. 439.

The rationale of the doctrine that a railroad company is not liable for the negligence of the inspectors of foreign cars is that it is, in this case, not the duty of the company to furnish appliances, but merely to make proper inspection and give notice of defects if any are found, and that this duty is performed by the employment of a sufficient number of competent inspectors, who are subjected to proper rules and instructions. Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. McMullen (1888) 117 Ind. 439.

The duty of the receiving company is not to furnish a proper instrumentality, but proper inspection. Mackin v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 201; Keith v. New Haven & N. Co. (1885) 140 Mass. 175.

"Railroads are compelled to haul the cars of other roads, provided they appear to be in an ordinarily safe and proper condition. As to their own cars, railroads choose which they will use; as to the cars of other companies they have no opportunity for selection; because of this, the duty of railways in respect to the cars of other roads is merely that of proper inspection. The car in question not belonging to appellant, its duty was not to use reasonable diligence to have the same reasonably safe, but, before making use of it, to properly inspect it for the purpose of seeing if it was in a fit condition for use." Chicago & G. W. R. Co. v. Armstrong (1895) 62 Ill. App. 228.

"The duty of the receiving company is not that of furnishing proper machinery and instrumentalities for service, and seeing that the same are kept in safe repair, but its duty is one of inspection; and this duty is performed by the employment of sufficient competent and suitable inspectors, who are to act under proper instructions, rules, and superintendence. If it has furnished such inspectors, and if a proper inspection is made and due notice of defects have been given to the employee, its measure of duty is satisfied." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Myers (1894) 24 U. S. App. 295, 63 Fed. Rep. 793, 11 C. C. A. 439.

It is the duty of a railroad company to inspect cars owned by or received from another company, which the employees of the former are required to handle or use, where there are time and opportunity to do so; and it will be liable to its employees for injuries resulting from defects in such cars which an ordinary inspection would have discovered. It will not be excused for failure to perform that duty because such cars are only used for a brief time, or carried a short distance, nor will the mere fact that the company is not required to repair such defects relieve it from the obligation to inspect. [Syllabus by the court.] Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Penfold (1896) 57 Kan. 148.

Hence, it is error for a trial court to hold, as matter of law, that a trialman assumes the risks arising from the want of an inspector of such cars. Bennett v. Greenwich & J. R. Co. (1895) 84 Hun, 216.

For a total failure to make an inspection the company is only excused when the defect which such an inspection would have disclosed is one of which the injured servant had actual knowledge, or which he could easily have discovered. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Barber (1899) 44 Kan. 612.

See generally XII., infra.

"The company receiving a foreign car can be held responsible by an employee who sustains an injury from its defects, only for failure to furnish a competent inspector, or for failure of the inspector to exercise due care in making the inspection." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Myers (1894) 24 U. S. App. 295, 63 Fed. Rep. 793, 11 C. C. A. 439.

"The fact that a railroad company has no right to repair the foreign car which caused the injury does not relieve it of the duty of inspecting it." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Penfold (1896) 57 Kan. 148.

It is not bound to take such cars if they are known to be unsafe. Gottlieb v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1885) 100 N. Y. 462; Moon v. Northern P. R. Co. (1891) 46 Minn. 106.

"If the car came to it with any defects visible or discoverable by ordinary inspection, its duty was either to return the car to the company from which it came or to repair it sufficiently to make it reasonably safe." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Myers (1894) 24 U. S. App. 295, 63 Fed. Rep. 793, 11 C. C. A. 439.

Where foreign cars are of unusual and extra hazardous construction it is the duty of the railroad company to know that they are so, and to warn its servants of the increased danger to which they will be subjected in handling them. Missouri P. R. Co. v. White (1890) 76 Tex. 102.

A railroad company which undertakes to haul a foreign car in its train, and has had an opportunity to inspect it, is liable for a negligent failure to discover dangerous defects in its coupling appliances. Bender v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1897) 137 Mo. 240.

That the cars are only used by the receiving company for a short time, or carried a short distance, will not relieve it of its duty to its employees of inspecting such cars. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Penfold (1896) 57 Kan. 148.

The duty of a railroad company to inspect cars coming from other roads is not limited to cars to be sent out upon its own road, but applies to cars switched from the other road to be loaded and returned to the road from which they are received. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Archibald (1896) 41 U. S. App. 567, 75 Fed. Rep. 802, 21 C. C. A. 520.

The company being under the obligation, and having the right, to reject foreign cars in which it discovers a dangerous defect, is not absolved from liability for an injury due to such a defect by a constitutional provision compelling the company to receive such cars. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Williams (1893) 95 Ky. 199; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Price (1895) 72 Miss. 862.

Similarly, it is held that a statute which makes it the duty of every railroad to receive and forward cars of other roads impartially and diligently does not require the transfer of cars unfit for passage. Smith v. Potter (1881) 40 Mich. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 161.

The duty of exercising care in regard to the inspection of a foreign car devolves both on the forwarding and the receiving company. Hence, the fact that the latter has been negligent in that regard does not sever the causal connection between the former's breach of duty in transferring a defective car, and any injury which the latter's employees may receive in consequence of the existence of that defect. Moon v. Northern P. R. Co. (1891) 40 Minn. 103.

The plaintiff cannot recover for injuries caused by a defective foreign car unless he offers some evidence tending to show that the defect might have been discovered by the exercise of ordinary care.

In Carroll v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1895) 55 Kan. 690, it did not appear from the evidence at what point beyond an inspecting station called Horton the defective car came upon the defendant's road, and there was no account of it further than another inspecting station called Topeka. The court said: "If it had been shown that the rod [of a handhold] was loose or out of order, or the wood so decayed at the place of fastening as to render it unsafe, and this was discoverable by ordinary inspection at Horton or at the North Topeka roundhouse, then it would be a matter for the jury to determine whether the defect was known, or by the exercise of ordinary care ought to have been known, by the defendant in time to remedy or call attention of employees to it before the occurrence of the casualty. But in the absence of any such proof the district court was right in sustaining a demurrer to the evidence."

Guthrie v. Maine C. R. Co. (1889) 81 Me. 572 (see XVII. a. post), was cited by counsel for the plaintiff as tending to establish the proposition that if a car with defective appliances is taken into a train, and an injury to an employee results from it, the company will be liable without proof of notice of the defect or its equivalent. But the court did not think that case would bear such a construction, for the draw bar and bumpers of the car, which was the instrument of the injury, had been broken off before the casualty complained of, and this was a patent defect, of which the railroad company was bound to take notice.

Plaintiff's counsel also referred to Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Kneflim (1894) 152 Ill. 458, decided by the supreme court of Illinois, but in that case it was held not to be in point, as it appeared that, although the car had just been inspected, "the nut which held the wheel on the brakestaff was off, and, from the rusted appearance of the threads of the staff (they being filled with rust) had been off for several weeks," and the absence of the nut was the cause of the injury.

In Elkins v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1895) 171 Pa. 121, it was contended that the rule which makes a railroad company responsible to its employees for the condition of the cars it receives for transportation over its own lines was not applicable in regard to cars which it requires them to shift from one place to another on the tracks and in the yard of a shipper. This contention did not prevail, the court saying: "They are as clearly in its service in the latter case as in the former; their work is of the same nature in one case as in the other, and the risks attending it are the same. No sufficient reason appears for discriminating between the liability of a railroad company for injuries to its employees in handling upon its own line the cars of another corporation which are 'faulty in construction or dangerously out of repair' and its liability to them for injuries in handling such cars by its order elsewhere. It is not the ownership of the cars or of the line on which they are moved that imposes the liability upon the company, but it is the handling or shifting of them by its order. The defendant company was not bound to shift cars in the yard of the refining company without a previous inspection of them. If the latter refused to allow an inspection the former could have properly declined to engage in the work of shifting them. But having done the work it is responsible to its employees for injuries caused by the unsafe condition of the cars they were required to handle."

In a short per curiam opinion the supreme court of Pennsylvania has held that the rule applicable to railroad companies, requiring them to inspect cars of other companies used for transporting freight, before permitting their employees to handle them, is not applicable to companies or persons on whose sidings loaded cars are delivered for the purpose of permitting them to unload the freight. McMullen v. Carnegie Bros. (1883) 158 Pa. 518, 23 L. R. A. 448.

2. Degree of care required.

The prevailing rule is that the liability of a railroad company in respect to foreign cars is the same in every respect as it is in respect to its own under similar circumstances; that is to say, foreign cars must be inspected with as much care as would be bestowed upon the examination of its own cars at way stations as contrasted with stops.

A railway company "is answerable for the same degree of care and diligence" in regard to the inspection and repair of foreign cars as it is in the care of its own cars. Fay v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1883) 30 Minn. 231.

A railroad company "is under the same obligation with reference to the inspection of foreign cars as is enjoined in respect to its own cars." Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Reagan (1896) 96 Tenn. 128, following Gottlieb v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1885) 100 N. Y. 462.

There is no distinction between the liability of a railroad company in respect of its own cars, and those belonging to another company which came to it for transportation over its own line. Reynolds v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1891) 64 Vt. 68.

The case which is most often cited as to the general duty of a company in respect to the inspection of foreign cars is Gottlieb v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1885) 100 N. Y. 462, Aff'd (1883) 20 Hun. 637, where a brakeman was injured owing to the fact that the buffers of two such cars were too short to admit of his going between them as they left a space of only 6 inches. The court said: "The defect was an obvious one, easily discoverable by the most ordinary inspection, and it would seem to be the grossest negligence to put such cars into any train, and especially into a train consisting of cars of different gauge. But these two cars did not belong to the defendant. They belonged to other companies and came to it loaded, and it was drawing them over its road to their destination. They were in good repair, and the defects were in their original construction, they being just as they were originally made. The defendant claims that it was bound to receive and transport these cars over its road, and was under no responsibility for any defects in their structure, and that the plaintiff, upon entering its employment, assumed all risks from such defects." After reviewing some of the cases, and pointing out that they are not entirely harmonious, but that they all hold that the company drawing the cars owes, in reference to them, some duty to its employees, the court proceeded thus: "When cars come to it which have defects visible or discoverable by ordinary inspection, it must either remedy such defects or refuse to take such cars; so much, at least; is due from it to its employees. The employees can no more be said to assume the risks of such defects in foreign cars than in cars belonging to the company. . . . The rule imposing this responsibility is not an onerous or inconvenient or impracticable one. It requires before a train starts, and while it is upon its passage, the same inspection and care as to all the cars in the train."

In a later New York case (Goodrich v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1889) 116 N. Y. 398, 401, 5 L. R. A. 750), these views were reiterated, the court saying:

"The employees whose duty it is to manage the train have a right to assume that, so far as ordinary care can accomplish it, the cars are equipped with safe and suitable appliances for the discharge of their duty, and that they are not to be exposed to risk or danger through the negligence of their employer." With respect to the dangerous conditions which caused the accident in that case, viz., bumpers of different heights, the court remarked: "The defect complained of in this case was obvious and discernible to the most ordinary inspection, and could have been easily remedied. It is argued by the defendant that it had fulfilled its duty when it had furnished for the use of its employees crooked links which could be used in coupling together cars upon which the bumpers were of different heights. We do not think that in this case that fulfilled the measure of defendant's obligation. It could not be so held unless it was the duty of the plaintiff to examine and inspect the cars to ascertain whether the coupling appliances were in proper condition. The duty of examination, like the duty of furnishing the proper machinery and appliances in the first instance, rests upon the master."

These two cases were cited and followed in Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Mackey (1894) 157 U. S. 72, 39 L. ed. 624.

Another leading case on the subject is Gutridge v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1897) 94 Mo. 468, where the court rejected the contention of the defendant, that it had a right to assume that the car, being a foreign one, was reasonably safe and fit for the uses for which it was being used, and said: "Cars coming from one road to another must necessarily be subjected to wear, and are liable to be rendered unfit for use in the course of transportation, and this must be known to the receiving company. It is but the result of the most common observation. While it is not incumbent on the receiving company on the receipt of the car to make tests to discover hidden defects in the construction, still it is bound to inspect foreign cars just as it would and is required to inspect its own, after they have been in use."

The same principle is recognized in the following cases, in most of which the New York and Missouri rulings are expressly approved: Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Davis (1890) 91 Ala. 487; Sack v. Dolese (1890) 35 Ill. App. 636, Aff'd on other grounds in (1891) 137 Ill. 129; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Williams (1893) 95 Ky. 199; Bomar v. Louisiana North & South R. Co. (1890) 42 La. Ann. 983, and 1206; Mateer v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1891) 15 S. W. 970; Bender v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1896) 137 Mo. 240; Mason v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1892) 111 41 L. R. A.

It is error to give a charge to the effect that a brakeman assumes the risk of unequal couplings on foreign cars. Bender v. St. Louis & S. F. R. Co. (1896) 137 Mo. 240.

The amount of care required of a railroad company to inspect cars coming from other roads to be merely loaded and returned is not less than that as to cars to be sent out upon its own road. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Archibald (1896) 41 U. S. App. 567, 75 Fed. Rep. 802, 21 C. C. A. 520. (Refusal to give instruction to contrary effect held proper.)

The effect of the principle established by these authorities is that "a railroad company is under legal duty not to expose its employees to danger arising from such defects in foreign cars as may be discovered by reasonable inspection before such cars are admitted to its train." Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Mackey (1895) 157 U. S. 72, 39 L. ed. 624, Affirming Mackey v. Baltimore & P. R. Co. (1890) 8 Mackey, 282; S. P. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Barber (1890) 44 Kan. 612.

It has even been said that the "company must exercise a high degree of care" in regard to the inspection of foreign cars. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Avery (1880) 8 Ill. App. 133.

In Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Flanigan (1875) 77 Ill. 365, it was also remarked by the court, arguendo, that if the draw-bar in a foreign car which caused the injury in suit "had suddenly become out of order it could hardly be insisted that defendant would be liable unless attention had been called to the defect, or the company, by the exercise of a high degree of care, could have discovered it and opportunity been afforded in which to make the needed repairs."

But this expression is perhaps rather too strong. The usual epithets used to define the degree of care incumbent on the employer are "ordinary," "reasonable," and the like. It is more consistent with analogy to say that the duty of a railroad company to its employees in respect to appliances on cars received from other roads is not higher than that in respect to appliances on its own cars. That duty is fully discharged if the appliances are such as are in ordinary use, though they may not be the best or safest for the purpose." Dooner v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1895) 171 Pa. 581.

A slightly different way of expressing the same principle is that a railroad company is responsible for the consequences of such defects in foreign cars as could be discovered by ordinary care. McDonald v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1897) 19 App. Div. 577.

"Ordinary care" is also the standard mentioned in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Williams (1893) 95 Ky. 199; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1896) 146 Ind. 564.

The words "reasonable care" have also been used in this connection. Eddy v. Prentice (1894) 8 Tex. Civ. App. 58.

The exercise of "reasonable precautions" is required in other cases. Denver, T. & Ft. W. R. Co. v. Smock (1897) 23 Colo. 456.

"A railroad company is not liable to its serv ants because it does not discover all defects in the cars of other companies coming into its hands, but is only liable for such defects as should have been discovered by reasonable skill and diligence." Allen v. Union P. R. Co. (1891) 7 Utah, 239.

In Gottlieb v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1885) 100 N. Y. 462, it was said that a railroad company is at least responsible for the consequences of such defects as would be disclosed by "ordinary inspection." The same phrase is used in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Penfold (1896) 57 Kan. 143.

The phrase "ordinary inspection" is also used to express the degree of care which the receiving company must exercise, in Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Reagan (1896) 96 Tenn. 123; Carruthers v. Chicago, B. I. & P. R. Co. (1895) 55 Kan. 600.

An instruction to the effect that the defendant was "not bound to test the safety of a certain foreign car, but might have presumed that it was in good condition, if it required close inspection to determine that it was not in good condition," is appropriate only to a case in which the defect was latent and not discoverable by ordinary inspection. A request for such an instruction is therefore rightly refused where the defendant has taken the ground that the draw-head which injured the plaintiff was so battered on the outside as to indicate its defective condition, while the conductors of the incoming and substituted crews both admit that they were aware of the defect. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Reagan (1896) 96 Tenn. 123.

In other cases the phrase "proper inspection" is used. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Myers (1894) 24 U. S. App. 295, 63 Fed. Rep. 793, 11 C. C. A. 431.

Other analogous phrases are "due inspection." Moon v. Northern P. R. Co. (1891) 46 Minn. 106.

"Reasonably careful" inspection. Moon v. Northern P. R. Co. (1891) 46 Minn. 106.

The limit of a railroad company's duty as to a car received from a refrigerator company is "diligence to know that it is serviceable." O'Connor v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1891) 83 Iowa, 105.

More elaborate and specific statements of the nature of the receiving company's obligation in respect to examination are the following:

"The inspection which the company is required to make of a foreign car tendered to it by another company for transportation over its lines is not merely a formal one, but it should be made with reasonable diligence, so that its employees will not be exposed to perils which reasonable care would have guarded against." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Myers (1894) 24 U. S. App. 295, 63 Fed. Rep. 793, 11 C. C. A. 433.

"The inspection which a company is required to make of a foreign car tendered to it by another company for transportation over its lines, is not a merely formal one, but should be made with reasonable care so as to furnish its employees with reasonably safe appliances for use in the discharge of their duties." Patterson, Railway Accident Law, §§ 290, 291. Quoted with approval in Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Fry (1891) 181 Ind. 319, and in Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1896) 146 Ind. 564.

"The inspection should be such as the time, place, means, and opportunity and the requirements and exigencies of commerce will permit. If the company has used ordinary care to secure competent inspectors, and inspection is made with ordinary care, under the circumstances, taking into consideration the time, place, means, and opportunity for inspection, and the defects, if any are discovered, are repaired or due notice thereof given to the employee, the duty resting upon the company is discharged." Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1896) 146 Ind. 564.

"It is immaterial whether the car with the merchandise belonged to the one corporation or the other; it was the duty of the appellant, by inspection or otherwise, to ascertain whether or not the car was in such a condition as that it could be safely handled by its subordinates. This care to be exercised is not such as would require the company receiving the car to test the strength of the metal or the material out of which it was constructed, or to make that rigid examination into the car's condition as could only be arrived at by actual tests, but the care must be of at least an ordinary inspection by one competent to know whether or not the car is in a safe condition for transportation, and can be handled by a subordinate who will exercise ordinary care without danger. There are different appliances used for coupling and uncoupling cars, and in the manner of constructing cars; still if such appliances are those ordinarily used by the road on which the injury occurs, the company is not responsible, if the difference in the appliances alone produces the injury. A car, however, may be so constructed or built as to render it more than ordinarily dangerous when attempting to couple it with other cars of different construction, and when this is patent the company must see to it that the danger is removed." Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Williams (1893) 95 Ky. 199.

In Richardson v. Great Eastern R. Co. (1875) L. R. 10 C. P. 488, 33 L. T. N. S. 248, Reversed in (1876) L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 342, 35 L. T. N. S. 351, 24 Week. Rep. 907, the duty of a railway company to inspect foreign cars was exhaustively discussed. The plaintiff was a passenger, and, strictly speaking, the case does not fall within the scope of the present note, but the facts were such as to make the decision quite applicable in the present connection. In the opinion delivered in the court of appeal (1876) L. R. 1 C. P. Div. 342, 35 L. T. N. S. 351, 24 Week. Rep. 907 by Jessel, M. R., it is said: "A coal truck belonging to the Birmingham Wagon Company, but which had been let to a colliery company, came on to the defendant's line at Peterborough. The defendants are compelled by statute to forward foreign traffic, i. e., through traffic, from other lines. It seems to me that the railway company are bound to take reasonable care to ascertain that trucks belonging to other companies and persons so coming on their line are in such a state as to travel safely. They must therefore use due diligence in the examination of such trucks, and the question is whether, on the facts in this case, that obligation was discharged." As to this question, the evidence was substantially this: At Peterborough there are every week a very great number of trucks sent along the defendant's line from other lines. They are subject to a "cursory" examination which is not of a very minute character, but such as is usually taken in such cases, and generally found sufficient. By these usual precautions two defects were discovered, one being that a spring had lost its camber and the other a crack in the woodwork, which was not so material. It being inconvenient to unload the truck, without which the latter defect could not be remedied, and as it did not interfere with the safety of the truck, the spring was repaired at the owners' shop near by, and on its return to the defendants, their servant

ascertained that the repair had been done, and examined the truck in the usual way, to see that there was no other defect. It was then sent on, and the accident occurred through a defect in no way connected with the two defects previously mentioned, viz., a defect in the axle, which might have been discovered by a sufficiently minute examination. Jessel, M. R., said: "We must look to what is reasonable in reference to the exigencies of the case. The company cannot stop all foreign trucks and empty them for the purposes of a minute examination. If they were entitled to do so, it would practically destroy the right given by statute to other companies of having the through traffic forwarded, and give a monopoly to the company itself. The suggestion that they should do this is too absurd to bear discussion. It cannot be said that it is obligatory on the company so to treat the foreign trucks as to destroy the very object for which they went sent onto the line, viz., for the purposes of through traffic. There must be some reasonable limit to the amount of examination required, and the substantial question was whether the mode of examination adopted by the company was reasonably satisfactory." To the question whether it was the duty of the defendants to examine the axle by scraping off the dirt and minutely looking at it—so minutely as to enable them to see the crack—and so to prevent or remedy the mischief, the jury answered "No." To the question whether it became their duty so to do upon discovering the other defects the jury answered, "It was their duty to require from the Birmingham Wagon Company some distinct assurance that it had been thoroughly examined and repaired." But Jessel, M. R., said: "If the defect discovered were such as ought reasonably to induce a person of experience to think that some other defect existed, or was likely to exist, then there would be a duty to examine further, but if the defect discovered had no probable connection with any other undiscovered defect, then I see no reason why any further or other examination should be made. Now, I read the answer of the jury to the third question as meaning . . . that the defendants ought to have inquired. But there was no evidence on which they were entitled to find that such a duty existed, or that it had been neglected. . . . If it was the defendants' duty to inquire, it could only be because they were bound to satisfy themselves of the fitness of the trucks, and if so bound, they could not exonerate themselves by mere inquiry of the wagon company. If it had been proved that they relied on mere inquiry, I am not sure that might not, per se, be evidence of negligence. I do not think we ought to give any effect to this finding of the jury, and the case for the plaintiff therefore fails. The judgment must therefore be reversed."

The court of common pleas had taken the position that, under the circumstances, there had been a want of reasonable care on the defendants' part in not properly overhauling and repairing the car which had been found defective, the assumption apparently being that the case was one in which provision should have been made for general repairs.

This theory, as was pointed out by Mellish, L.J., in the court of appeals (1876) 1 C. P. Div. 347, 35 L. T. N. S. 351, 24 Week. Rep. 907, was based on a misapprehension of the facts, as there was really no question of repair at the junction station, other than with respect to the defects which the examination, as actually made, had disclosed.

A statute which makes it the duty of every railroad to receive and forward cars of other roads impartially and diligently does not require the transfer of cars unfit for passage; but it does require that no unnecessary delays or hindrances shall be interposed, and that all precautions against the use of improper cars shall be adopted with reference to reasonable despatch. Smith v. Potter (1881) 46 Mich. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 161.

It is not incumbent upon the receiving company "to repeat the tests which are proper to be used in the original construction of the car, but it may assume that all parts of the car which appear upon ordinary examination to be in good condition are in such condition;" but the duty of exercising ordinary care requires a more careful inspection of an old and dilapidated car than of one in appearance of which there is nothing unusual. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1896) 146 Ind. 584.

The receiving company is not liable for hidden defects "which could not be detected by such an inspection as the exigencies of traffic will permit." Patterson, Railway Accident Law, §§ 290, 291, Quoted with approval in Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Fry (1891) 181 Ind. 319.

No negligence can be imputed to the company where the car had been duly inspected at the regular station a short time previously. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Pratt (1883) 14 Ill. App. 346.

If, at the time the eyebolt in a braketstiff gives way, the car has run such a short distance from the place of the last inspection that a doubt arises whether the inspection was made with due care, that question should be left to the jury. Sheedy v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1893) 55 Minn. 357.

The duty of inspection is a positive and affirmative duty, to be continuously performed by the employer. Hence it is not for the court to say, as a matter of law, when, where, and how often a foreign car shall be inspected by a railroad company, or that it should not have been inspected at some time while the car was under the company's control. Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1880) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243. (As to how often inspections should be made, see, generally, subd. supra.)

In Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Avery (1880) 8 Ill. App. 133, the court, waiving the question of a railroad company's liability for the negligent acts of another company in the occupancy or use of its road, or of its liability for the negligence of appellee's fellow servants, thought it plain that, "no matter whose duty it was to keep the car in repair or to prevent its coming into appellant's yard in a damaged condition, if these duties were neglected, and the car permitted to come into appellant's yard for so many consecutive days that appellant, in the exercise of a high degree of care, might have known of its damaged and dangerous condition in time to avoid any injury therefrom, then appellant would be liable to its employees for any damage occasioned thereby, without any fault of their own."

A doctrine less favorable to the servant than that propounded in most of the above cases was laid down by the majority of the court in Railton v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1882) 54 Wis. 257, 41 Am. Rep. 31, where it was held that, although the fastening of a round of a ladder in a foreign car may be so insufficient as to show culpable negligence on the part of the company under whose supervision it was fastened, yet if it is in apparently good condition the company which receives it into its train is not guilty of negligence as regards a servant who is in the habit of handling the car and has the same means of knowledge as the company itself. This case contains one of the most elaborate discussions of the subject to be found in the reports. The majority of the court thought the case came under the rule that, where the risks of a service were unknown to the master and his ignorance is not owing to any negligence on his part, the risk is with the servant, not the master. This conclusion necessarily involved the corollary that the duty of a railway company with regard to the inspection of foreign cars is less onerous than that duty with respect to its own cars, for it was conceded that the fastening of the slat was insufficient, and was culpable negligence on the part of the company responsible for the fastening. Cassady, J., said in regard to the defect which caused the injury: "It was discoverable by taking out the bolts and looking beneath the slats or rounds. So the sufficiency of the bolts, as to length as well as size, might have been determined by the application of a heavy weight or by a strong man or some machine, wrenching the same. Assuming that some such test should have been applied, the questions would remain, when, by whom, and how frequently? If properly tested by the manufacturer, then, is it to be repeated by the purchaser and everyone who uses the same? And, if so, shall he go beyond ordinary inspection, while at rest or in use to the extent of unmaking what has already been made? There is much propriety in the law exacting rigid tests to the different parts in the first instance and while a car is in the process of manufacture, which would be impracticable, if not impossible, to repeat every time a loaded car passed from one railway company to another. May not the company so receiving such loaded car, and without being chargeable with negligence, assume that all parts of such car which appear to be in good condition are in such condition? Is the law so exacting as to the management of railroad trains as to impute negligence in not discovering what ordinary care would fail to detect? Is the law so stringent in such a case as to infer negligence without any omission of duty?"

The theory, however, upon which most stress was laid was that the injured servant had the same means of knowledge as the company, and that this fact negatived the existence of any right of recovery. "It appears from the testimony," said Judge Cassoday, "that the ladder in question was almost in constant use, not by the engineer, nor so much by the conductor, but by the brakeman. The straining test was necessarily applied whenever the brakeman ascended or descended the ladder in question. . . . His inspection and testing was the company's inspection and testing. His failure to discover any visible indications of insufficiency, while so inspecting and testing, was no more culpable in the company than in himself." Judge Taylor dissented in a very elaborate and well-reasoned opinion, both on the general ground that the measure of care incumbent on a company in regard to the inspection of foreign cars was the same as in regard to its own cars, and on the special ground that it was a question for the jury whether the company had been reasonably careful under the circumstances. The following extracts show the strength of his arguments, and the extreme difficulty there is in arriving at a definite conclusion with respect to this much controverted question. "There is no doubt, an implied warranty on the part of the furnishing company that the cars are reasonably fit for use, and, 41 L. R. A.

unless the defect be plainly visible, there is, as between these parties, no duty on the part of the receiving company to make any particular examination for defects; and if injury results from the use of the cars from defects which ought to have been known to the furnishing company, such company would, undoubtedly, be liable to make good the damages. This rule as to the duty of the receiving company, as between itself and the furnishing company, is not in my opinion the rule as to the duty of the receiving company to its employees. The fact that the car is not its own does not relieve the company using it from its general obligation not to subject its employees to unnecessary danger by the use of imperfect or defective machinery or appliances. . . . It seems to me that the liability of the company as to its employees is the same whether the company has purchased the defective machinery or cars, or whether it has received them for use upon its road from another company. There certainly can be no doubt upon this point as to such machines or cars as the company lease from the owner for a definite term, and use upon their road. In cases like the one at bar, the receiving company takes the car and transports it for its own benefit, and only incidentally for the benefit of the furnishing company. . . .

If the convenience of business prevents the receiving company from making such inspection and tests of the cars received as are usually made and required of a company purchasing or leasing cars for its permanent use, and it is compelled to rely upon the vigilance of the company from which the cars are received to detect imperfections therein, then, as between itself and its employees, the want of vigilance on the part of the company purchasing the cars must, as between the company using the same and its employee, be imputed to the company using them, and such employee may recover damages for any injury resulting to him from a defect in such car, which ought to have been discovered by the company furnishing them, either from the master in whose use the car was at the time of the injury, or from the owner of the car;" citing Pennsylvania Co. v. Roy (1880) 102 U. S. 451, 28 L. ed. 141, as to the liability of a railroad company to its passengers for injuries received by reason of a defective construction of a car constituting a part of the train not owned by them, and for the use of which the passengers pay another company a separate charge. The dissenting judge said further that the defendant "should have shown that no inspection or tests which are made by railroad companies of its cars and their appliances would have discovered the defect; or, at least, it should have shown that it made such inspection and tests by competent men as are made by railroad companies generally, and that the defect was not discovered. It is certainly a question of fact, and not of law, whether a proper inspection or test of the ladder would have discovered the defect therein; yet the learned circuit judge determined, as a question of law, that no proper inspection or test would have discovered such defect. . . .

The assumption in this case that reasonable care on the part of the defendant company would not have discovered the defect which caused the injury is the assumption of a fact not proved in the case, and to support which there is no evidence. The other assumption, that there was any duty imposed on the brakeman to make an inspection of the car or ladder to see whether it was fit or safe for use, is an assumption based upon no proof, and is in no sense a question of law except so far as the law might charge the brakeman with knowledge of a plain and visible defect, and defeat a recovery because the defect was so plain and visible that he could not but have known of its existence, and consequently took the risk of using that which was clearly dangerous to use."

The principles laid down in Ballou v. Chicago, M. & St. F. R. Co. (1882) 54 Wis. 290, 41 Am. Rep. 31, were approved in Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ledbetter (1885) 34 Kan. 323.

Of course, the rule that an employer is not liable for an injury caused by a latent defect is applicable to foreign cars. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Fry (1891) 131 Ind. 819, where the court reversed a judgment for the plaintiff supported only by a special finding that a crack which caused a brakestaff to give way could only have been detected by taking the staff off the car and striking it with a hammer.

3. Duty of inspecting foreign cars, considered with reference to the doctrine of common employment.

See also XIV. a, infra.

The effect of the doctrine of common employment upon the extent of the master's duty to inspect his instrumentalities will be discussed in its general aspects in the following subdivision. (See more especially XI., e.) The same difference of opinion which the cases there cited disclose as to the true scope of that doctrine in this particular connection reappears in the judicial discussion of the obligations of a railroad company with respect to ascertaining the condition of foreign cars. The decisions on this point do not proceed upon the theory that the receiving company is chargeable with one measure of care where the cars are its own, and with another measure of care where they are delivered to it by another company. They merely view the employer's responsibility from a different standpoint.

The duty of inspection may be regarded as either assignable or nonassignable; but even the courts which take the former view do not allow the fact that a car is a foreign one to excuse the receiving company for a failure to use ordinary and reasonable care to see that it is constructed safely,—as, for example, that it is furnished with such appurtenances as handles, ladders, or other safeguards in common use. Dooner v. Delaware & H. Canal Co. (1894) 164 Pa. 17.

The receiving company is held liable by such courts for its omission to provide for a proper system of inspection, and for its negligence in the selection of an inspector. Keith v. New Haven & N. Co. (1885) 140 Mass. 175. The difference of opinion, therefore, is merely as to the precise extent of a duty which is on all hands agreed to be obligatory to some extent; and the task of classifying the decisions reduces itself to one of defining the same lines of cleavage which show themselves in the more general discussions of the following subdivision.

The distinction between the legal consequences of a master's ignorance of abnormal conditions as an incident of the supply of instrumentalities, and as an incident of their use, as exemplified in the ruling that a railroad company is not liable for a failure to inspect foreign cars and see that they are properly loaded. Mexican C. R. Co. v. Shean (1891) (Tex.) 18 S. W. 151. Following Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Farmer (1889) 73 Tex. 86. See also Neutz v. Jackson Hill Coal & C. Co. (1894) 139 Ind. 411, and XI., e, infra.

The doctrine that inspection is a nonassignable duty emerges in the ruling that the neglect of a car inspector to make any inspection of a car, or his neglect to make it with reasonable care, having regard to the hazard of the service, is the neglect of the railroad company in respect to a brakeman. Terre Haute & I. R. Co. v. Mansberger (1895) 24 U. S. App. 551, 65 Fed. Rep. 196, 12 C. C. A. 574, Rehearing Denied in (1895) 24 U. S. App. 687, 67 Fed. Rep. 67, 14 C. C. A. 306; S. P. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Myers (1894) 24 U. S. App. 295, 63 Fed. Rep. 793, 11 C. C. A. 439, Disapproving the Massachusetts doctrine; Fay v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1883) 80 Minn. 231; Jones v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1897) 20 B. I. pt. 1, p. 212.

Courts which hold, on general principles, that inspection is not an absolute duty of a master, naturally adopt the conclusion that the receiving company is not liable for the negligence of its inspectors in failing to discover a defect which supervenes while a car is being used. Mackin v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 201. The court said: "Although perhaps the mere ownership is not material, a car so received, while in transit to its destination, and until ready for such inspection as would be suitable and necessary in preparation for its return, would not come within the rule applicable to machinery and appliances furnished by the defendant. According to the course of business, well known to the plaintiff, and notorious, the defendant was in the habit of receiving many such cars daily, and drawing them over its road as a part of its freight trains. Even in the absence of any statute, or special contract, regulating the terms of receiving and drawing such cars, the defendant was bound, as a common carrier, to receive and draw them. Vermont & M. R. Co. v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1867) 14 Allen, 462, 469, 92 Am. Dec. 735. The obligation of drawing cars over its road would not extend to such as were in an unsafe condition; but, as to cars so received, the duty of the defendant is not that of furnishing proper instrumentalities for service, but of inspection; and this duty is performed by the employment of sufficient, competent, and suitable inspectors, who are to act under proper superintendence, rules, and instructions; and, however it may be as to other cars, the inspectors must be deemed to be engaged in a common employment with the brakemen as to such cars, while in transit, and until ready to be inspected for a new service." To the same effect, see Keith v. New Haven & N. Co. (1885) 140 Mass. 175; Little Miami R. Co. v. Fitzpatrick (1884) 42 Ohio St. 318; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Gaines (1885) 46 Ark. 555; Kelly v. Abbott (1895) 63 Wis. 307, 53 Am. Rep. 292.

Still less can a railroad company under this theory be made liable for a defect in the original construction of a foreign car if proper provision has been made for its inspection. Thyng v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1892) 156 Mass. 18.

Perhaps the most elaborate exposition of this theory is to be found in the opinion delivered in Smith v. Potter (1881) 46 Mich. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 161, where it is said that if the inspectors committed an error, or were guilty of negligence, the employer was not to blame for it. "The work done is to be done at all hours and at every place where there are railroad connections with other roads. It is not a duty of management or general supervision but a task for which nothing is required but fidelity, and mechanical knowledge of a comparatively limited kind. It is such work as would seldom be delegated to an officer of extensive responsibility who has other interests to look after. But, whatever be its quality, it was in this case not claimed to have been placed in wrong hands. Nothing more could be asked of the employer. . . . There is no difference in the nature of the danger, or in the quality of the inspector's employment, between the case of shifting cars belonging to other roads and cars belonging to the same road. Defects in both lead to the same results, and the methods of examining both are identical. Where a car has been damaged by some injury which has escaped notice, it cannot fairly be said that employers ignorant of it, who have taken all the usual and reasonable precautions against it, are any more to blame in the one case than in the other."

In Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. McMullen (1888) 117 Ind. 439, the court inclined to the view that inspectors of foreign cars were fellow servants of the brakeman, the view being taken that "it is not the duty of the company to furnish appliances and instrumentalities, but to make proper inspection and give notice of defects if any are found, and that this duty is performed by the employment of a sufficient number of competent and skilful inspectors who are subjected to proper rules and instructions." The defective car in this case belonged to the defendant, but the suggestion was taken up six years later by the same court, and made the ground of a decision that a mining company fulfils its duty to its servants as to inspection of cars furnished it for temporary use, by supplying competent and skilful inspectors subjected to proper instructions; and the negligence of noninspection in such case is not that of vice principals. Neutz v. Jackson Hill Coal & C. Co. (1894) 130 Ind. 411, Rehearing Denied in (1894) 139 Ind. 418. The court said: "In the present case the inspectors and the appellant occupied a relation to the appellee in all respects identical with that occupied by the inspectors and brakemen of railway companies handling cars of other companies in the course of the master's business. The cars came, not as instruments of the service supplied by the master, but as incidents of its business, and from the dependence of the master upon those not in any manner connected with such business or subject to the master's control. If the defects had been in the original construction of the cars it could not be said that such defects were chargeable to the negligence of the appellee, nor can it be said with greater reason that the ill repair was from the fault of the appellee, or that a duty rested upon the appellee to make the repairs. The extent of the appellee's control over the cars was in the use of them for loading coal, and it was not responsible to the appellant, or anyone else, for their sufficiency as a means of transportation. The failure to inspect, to set brakes, or to block the wheels, when the first car was removed, was negligence in the use, and not in the supplying of instrumentalities. One line of distinction between vice principals and coemployees is in the duty, in one instance, to supply or maintain instrumentalities of the service, and in the other of using the instrumentalities supplied. Negligence in the first, though that of a servant, is the master's negligence, while in the second the negligence is that of a fellow servant. This distinction keeps in view the proposition that where the master himself participates in the use, and the negligence is his own, he may not be said to be a fellow servant."

But the suggestion in the earlier case, which, if finally accepted, would have committed this court to the Massachusetts doctrine, has been now rejected so far as regards foreign cars received in the ordinary way for transportation, for it has now been held specially that the inspectors of a foreign car received for transportation over their employer's road are not the fellow servants of employees operating the train in which the car is placed, although all are employed by the same company. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1896) 146 Ind. 564, explaining Neutz v. Jackson Hill Coal & C. Co. (1894) 130 Ind. 411, as a case in which the rule as to the liability of railway companies for the defective condition of foreign cars was not applicable, as the defective car was merely delivered to a coal company to be loaded with coal.

In Kelly v. Abbot (1885) 63 Wis. 307, 53 Am. Rep. 292, the coupling iron of a foreign car passed over those of a caboose to which the plaintiff's intestate was coupling it, and crushed him to death. A demurrer to a complaint, alleging the want of adaptation of the cars to each other and the negligence of the defendant company in allowing the foreign freight car to be brought on its track and requiring it to be coupled, was sustained,—the court saying: "There is no reason stated why the intestate did not or could not have discovered this apparent want of adaptation of the coupling irons of the caboose and car. It was presumably in the daytime, as it is not stated that it was in the night. That the coupling irons were so widely mismatched would seem to have been as observable and readily seen as the entire absence of coupling irons, one or both. It is not to be inferred that this was the only instance when the cars of different roads, brought together to be coupled, were so mismatched. It might rather be inferred that not unfrequently they have coupling irons higher or lower than each other, and that there is no reasonable assurance that they are always adapted to each other in this respect. This would seem to impose the duty upon the brakeman, before going between such cars and the caboose or cars of the road on which he is employed, to couple them together, to observe more closely and to use more caution than if he was attempting to couple the cars of his own road, which are adapted to each other by construction or selection, in order to ascertain whether their coupling irons would meet or pass each other. There is no allegation that he even looked to see, or that he could not have seen, if he had looked, this clearly apparent difference in the elevation of these coupling irons, or that his attention was diverted."

The difference in the elevation of the couplings irons of this foreign car and the caboose or other cars of the defendant's road would not have been very easily or readily observed when they were distant from each other, and yet the company is sought to be held liable for its want of ordinary care in not knowing this difference when consenting to take this foreign car into its train. When the car and the caboose were brought nearly together this difference could have been at least much more readily seen and observed by comparison. The company is charged with negligently endangering the lives of its brakemen by not knowing of this difference, and if presumed to know of it, in allowing this car to be attached to its train; and the intestate is alleged to have been in the use of proper care when he endangered his own life by not seeing, observing, or knowing of such difference in the elevation of the coupling irons. Did not the intestate have the same, if not superior, means of knowing of this difference, or as to that of the company? If the negligence of the intestate and that of the company in this respect are equally balanced, ought the plaintiff to recover? The duty of the company to know of this difference is not absolute, and it is not presumed to know of it as a matter of law."

XL. Assignability of the duty of inspection.

a. Introductory.

There is no difference of opinion as to the general principle, that the only ground of liability of the master to an employee for injuries resulting from the carelessness of a coemployee, which the law recognizes, is that which arises from personal negligence, or from want of proper care and prudence, in the management of his affairs, or in the selection of its agents or appliances. Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468.

"The master is not, and cannot be, liable to his servant, unless there be negligence on the part of the master in that which he, the master, has contracted to do." Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, per Lord Cairns.

Some of the conclusions to which this principle leads are obvious enough.

It is, of course, sufficient to negative the existence of any liability in cases where due care has been exercised in the selection of agents, and no fault can be imputed to those agents.

Thus, a railroad company is not liable for the death of an engineer from the explosion of a locomotive boiler because of error of judgment in the selection of steel for such boiler by competent, experienced, skilled, and careful workmen in its employ. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Du Bois (1896) 65 Ill. App. 142.

It is also evident that, however strictly the master may be required to account for the performance of the duty of supplying sound machinery, he cannot be held liable for an injury received by a servant through the act of a fellow servant in operating, without the master's knowledge and against his orders, worn-out machinery which he had condemned as being unfit for service. Durgin v. Munson (1864) 9 Allen, 400, 85 Am. Dec. 770, where this illustration is given arg., to indicate the dividing line between injuries attributable to the personal negligence of the master and the negligence of a fellow servant. See, however, V., supra.

The real difficulties of the subject begin when it is attempted to fix the precise meaning of the phrase "personal negligence."

(1) One construction placed upon the phrase would limit the master's responsibility to the exercise of ordinary care in choosing competent agents, and in furnishing them with adequate materials and resources for the work to be done, and absolve him entirely from any liability in regard to the subsequent maintenance of the agencies thus furnished. Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30.

(2) Another view is expressed in the doctrine that "a master is never exonerated by the negligent omission of subordinates to perform duties which are imposed on him in his character as master, resulting in injury to his employees." Bailey v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1893) 139 N. Y. 302. "That is to say, 'No duty required of the master for the safety and protection of his servants can be transferred so as to exonerate him from such liability.'" Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1886) 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755, Affirming (1882) 3 Dak. 38.

Or, as the rule may be also expressed, of some of the duties imposed by the law upon an employer, "he cannot relieve himself except by performance." Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Seeley (1894) 54 Kan. 21.

Both these doctrines seem to be consistent with the proposition that the duty of the master as to the furnishing of the machinery and other appliances is absolute. It is apparently an obvious deduction from this proposition that the employer ought not to be permitted to evade his responsibility even by the interposition of an independent contractor, and so some courts have held. Burnes v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & M. R. Co. (1896) 120 Mo. 41; Herdler v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. (1896) 136 Mo. 8; Wanamaker v. Rochester (1892) 44 N. Y. S. R. 45.

Yet, as will be seen by referring to subd. VIII., supra, this principle is qualified to a considerable extent by another, which gives an employer in his character of a purchaser of manufactured articles a right to rely in some degree upon the judgment and skill of the manufacturer.

Whatever may be the correct doctrine upon this particular point, it is manifest that the general principles which determine the extent of the responsibility of an employer for the acts of an independent contractor involve the corollary that the owner of premises cannot dictate that his building be constructed of improper materials or upon an unsafe plan, and escape liability for injuries caused thereby because he made a contract with a third person to build it; nor can he, with knowledge of a weakness or defect threatening the strength of the building, set a man at work immediately under it, and shift all responsibility upon the builder. Meler v. Morgan (1892) 82 Wis. 289.

The only point upon which the advocates of the two doctrines, therefore, are really divided, is the extent to which the master may assign to employees the duty of seeing that his machinery and appliances do not become unsafe after they are put into use. Even in Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, it was conceded that a mine owner may be liable for defects in the general arrangement or system of ventilation, but is not liable for a defect in the construction of a temporary scaffold for certain working operations, whereby the free action of a good system of ventilation is for awhile interfered with. Per Lord Chelmsford and Lord Colonsay.

The cases on this controversy fall into four categories: (1) Those which hold that duty to be assignable; (2) those which hold the duty to be assignable, but require the master to exercise a reasonably careful supervision over the conduct of the agents to whom it is assigned; (3) those which hold the duty to be nonassignable; (4) Those which turn upon the distinction between the nature of the duty in its relation to the supplying and maintaining of the agencies, and in its relation to the mere use of the agencies.

We shall now proceed to state the effect of the cases which belong to each of these categories, in so far as they have a direct bearing upon the special subject of the present note.

b. Theory that the duty of inspection is assignable.

Compare the cases cited in X. b, 3, supra.

In England the courts prior to the decision in Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, had wavered between the doctrine of the nonassignability of certain duties of the master and the doctrine that certain servants are vice principals to whom the master delegates certain duties at his peril.

The influence of the latter doctrine is distinctly traceable in the quotation from the charge of Cockburn, Ch. J., in Webb v. Rennie (1866) 4 Fost. & F. 608. But, so far as regards the duty of inspection, the former was undoubtedly the doctrine which had been most generally adopted. Hall v. Johnson (1865) 3 Hurlst. & C. 589, 34 L. J. Exch. N. S. 222, 11 Jur. N. S. 180, 11 L. T. N. S. 779, 13 Week. Rep. 411; Searle v. Lindsay (1861) 11 C. B. N. S. 429, 31 L. J. C. P. N. S. 106, 8 Jur. N. S. 746, 5 L. T. N. S. 427, 10 Week. Rep. 89; Ormond v. Holland (1858) Kl. Bl. & El. 102.

So, a servant whose duty it is to superintend the laying of temporary rails leading to a ballast pit, and to change their position as the work progresses, is a fellow servant of a laborer engaged in filling trucks with ballast. Lovegrove v. London, B. & S. C. R. Co. (1864) 16 C. B. N. S. 669, 33 L. J. C. P. N. S. 829, 10 Jur. N. S. 879, 10 L. T. N. S. 718, 12 Week. Rep. 988.

A decision to the same effect subsequent to that in Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, was Murphy v. Phillips (1876) 24 Week. Rep. 647, 35 L. T. N. S. 477.

The English doctrine has been adopted to a very considerable extent in this country, as the following rulings will show:

In Arkansas a car inspector is the fellow servant of the trainmen. St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rice (1889) 51 Ark. 467, 4 L. R. A. 173.

The decision in Wilson v. Merry was expressly approved in Columbus & I. C. R. Co. v. Arnold (1869) 31 Ind. 174, 99 Am. Dec. 615, which held that where the directors of a railroad company have devolved the duties of superintending the repairs of machinery and directing its use on a skillful, competent, and trustworthy master machinist, and furnished him with adequate materials and resources for executing repairs, notice to them that an engine is out of repair and unsafe for use is not of itself sufficient to render the company liable. Such machinery is often liable to get out of repair and become unsafe, and as they do not direct or authorize its use when in an unsafe condition, they are not responsible for its use in that condition, in the absence of notice that it was being so used. The following extract from the opinion may be quoted for the purpose of showing the rationale of the decision: "The directors of such a corporation, from the very nature of the organization and the business in which it is engaged, are not expected personally to superintend the various operations of the road. There is no implied obligation that they should do so; nor is it to be presumed that they are selected with a view to their qualifications and skill for the performance of many of the duties required in constructing, equipping, and operating the road. The master is not liable to his servant, unless there be negligence on the part of the master in that which the master has contracted or undertaken, either expressly or impliedly, to do. It is the duty of such a corporation to use every reasonable care in the proper construction of its road, and in supplying it with the necessary equipment, including properly constructed engines, and the necessary and proper materials for its repair, and the selection of competent, skillful, and trusty subordinates to supervise, inspect, repair, and regulate the machinery, and to regulate and control the operations of the road. If these duties are performed with care and diligence by the directors, and one of the persons so employed is guilty of negligence by which an injury occurs to another, it is not the negligence of the directors or master, and the company is not responsible." 41 L. R. A.

But this case was overruled in Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1884) 100 Ind. 181.

In Maryland a brakeman and an inspector of machinery and rolling stock are held to be fellow servants. Wonder v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1870) 32 Md. 411, 3 Am. Rep. 143. But the court recognizes the "vice principal" doctrine so far as to hold an employer liable for the negligence of a general superintendent, and to this extent departs from the English doctrine. State, Hamelin, v. Malster (1881) 57 Md. 287.

"In order to hold a railroad company responsible to an employee (as conductor on its train) for injuries sustained because of the road or its appurtenances being out of repair, it must be shown that the company is in default in its duty, either by the selection of incompetent servants or an insufficient number to do the work, or failure to furnish proper material, or that the company had notice of the bad condition of the road or is chargeable with negligence for not knowing." Howd v. Mississippi C. R. Co. (1874) 50 Miss. 178, following Wilson v. Merry, supra.

In McDermott v. Pacific R. Co. (1860) 30 Mo. 116, it was held that a brakeman could not recover for injuries caused by the fall of a defective bridge, there being no allegation that the company had failed to exercise ordinary care in the selection of its servants.

But this doctrine is now repudiated by the courts of Missouri, and replaced by one which has been thus stated in a recent case: "The duty of seeing that the place [of work] and appliances are such that the servant can perform his duties with reasonable safety is a personal one which the master cannot delegate to someone else [whether superintendent or independent contractor] and thus escape liability." Herdler v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. (1896) 136 Mo. 3.

The views of the New Jersey courts upon the question under discussion are somewhat inconsistent.

In Van Steenburgh v. Thornton (1896) 58 N. J. L. 100, it was held that the duty of furnishing a safe place of work was nonassignable.

It is also conceded that the president of a corporation is a vice principal. Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. (1880) 42 N. J. L. 467, 36 Am. Rep. 535.

Yet in Essex County Electric Co. v. Kelly (1894) 57 N. J. L. 100, it was said: "It is a matter of judicial disagreement whether a master can discharge the duty [of examining and ascertaining whether appliances have become unfit or unsafe from wear and tear or otherwise] and the similar duty of keeping tools and appliances in repair, by selecting and employing competent persons to make inspections and repairs. In our courts it is held that the master's duty may be thus discharged." The court cited Rogers Locomotive & Mach. Works v. Hand (1888) 50 N. J. L. 464, and Harrison v. Central R. Co. (1865) 31 N. J. L. 293. In the latter of these cases, where the plaintiff was injured by the fall of a bridge, the court remarked: "From the relation between the company and their brakeman, the legal consequence seems to have been deduced by the pleader that the former, with regard to the latter, was bound to keep the bridge in a safe condition. This is not a true statement of the obligation of the company. It was not near so absolute; for if the bridge was insecure from a secret defect which the company was not able to discern by the exercise of reasonable diligence and skill, no responsibility would have fallen on the defendants on account of its defective state. If, as was stated on the argument, the company, in point of fact, directed its agents, who were possessed of competent skill, to examine at stated periods the bridge in question, and such agents reported to the company that the structure was in a secure condition, and no circumstances existed which were calculated to impair a reasonable confidence in such report, I think it is plain, upon the principles of law above propounded, that even if the agents making such report acted carelessly in the discharge of their duties, or even falsely reported their conclusions to the company, that under such a state of facts the plaintiff could not sustain this suit. To warrant a recovery in this case in favor of the employee, who is here represented by the plaintiff, the fault which forms the basis of the action must be that of the company, and not simply the negligence of a fellow servant."

The position of this court on the distinction between inspection as incident to the use, and to the supply of instrumentalities, will be explained below.

In Ohio a car inspector is held to be a fellow servant of the trainmen. Little Miami R. Co. v. Fitzpatrick (1884) 42 Ohio St. 318; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Lamphere (1894) 9 Ohio C. C. 263, both following Columbus & X. R. Co. v. Webb (1861) 12 Ohio St. 475, which was itself based upon Ormond v. Holland (1858) El. Bl. & El. 102, one of the rulings in which, as already remarked, the decision in Wilson v. Merry was anticipated.

In Pennsylvania the doctrine is recognized that an employee placed in sole charge of his master's business, or of a distinct branch of it, is a vice principal. Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1861) 88 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467; Ardesco Oil Co. v. Gilson (1869) 63 Pa. 150; Mullan v. Philadelphia & S. Mail S. S. Co. (1875) 78 Pa. 25, 21 Am. Rep. 2.

In Tissue v. Baltimore & O. R. Co. (1886) 112 Pa. 91, 56 Am. Rep. 310, it was held that, where a dynamite magazine, from the explosion of which a servant lost his life, was placed in the position which it occupied by the direction of the superintendent of the work at a tunnel, in obedience to the instructions of the master of the road, the act, so far as it concerned subordinate employees, was by the corporation itself, and could not be attributed to any of the fellow servants of the deceased.

It is also held that "whenever it is sought to hold the master liable for the act or neglect of his foreman, the question to be considered is whether the negligence complained of relates to anything which it was the duty of the principal to do." Ross v. Walker (1891) 139 Pa. 42.

But in regard to the obligation of supervision the principle of the nonassignability of certain duties thus distinctly recognized has been departed from in a manner which appears to be quite arbitrary, when it is considered that this court has fully adopted the doctrine that the duty to which the duty of supervision is incidental,—viz., the duty to furnish a safe place of work and safe appliances,—is positive and personal in its nature. See Lewis v. Selfert (1887) 116 Pa. 628.

Thus, in Beimisch v. Roberts (1891) 143 Pa. 1, the court approved of an instruction in which the jury were told, among other things, that the defendant was not liable for an accident caused by a defect of which he knew, or ought to have known, provided he had a person in his employ whose duty it was to keep the appliances in good condition. But there was no testimony showing that the employer or any agent of his having control had any knowledge of the defect, and the case was ultimately made to turn on the facts that the state of the appliance was as open to the observation of the 41 L. R. A.

plaintiff as of the defendant, and that the proximate cause of the accident was the negligence of the plaintiff's fellow servants in selecting an unsound appliance when they had the opportunity of selecting one that was in good condition.

Similarly, in Mansfield Coal & C. Co. v. McEnery (1879) 91 Pa. 185, 36 Am. Rep. 662, we find the court committing itself to this doctrine: If a railroad company exercises ordinary care and skill in the selection of employees to construct a bridge, it will not be responsible for defects resulting from its original construction; but if it had knowledge of such defects, more especially if notice had been given to it thereof, and it neglected to make the necessary repairs, it will be responsible not only to strangers, but even to one of its employees, provided he was not chargeable with concurring negligence or want of proper care, or neglect of duty on his part.

So, also, it has been held that the fact that the insecure condition of a railroad track is remotely due to the negligence of some servant who failed to report its condition and put it in repair will not excuse the company from liability. O'Donnell v. Allegheny Valley R. Co. (1868) 59 Pa. 239, 98 Am. Dec. 336.

So, a car inspector has been held to be a fellow servant of a brakeman. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. v. Hughes (1888) 119 Pa. 301. The court said: "If, however, the company employ competent and skilful persons for the purpose of inspection, and afford them reasonable opportunities and facilities for the work under proper instructions, the company will not ordinarily be liable for the negligent performance of the work by their employees, to a fellow employee, unless the company knew, or by ordinary diligence ought to have known, of the defective manner in which the inspection was conducted. We are clearly of opinion, too, that a brakeman and a car inspector are in the same circle of appointment; they co-operate in the same business, and the former knows that the employment of the latter is one of the incidents of their common service. But while the performance of the duty of inspection must necessarily be committed in detail to the employees, the general regulation is in the hands of the company, and it is the duty of the company to provide suitable persons, in sufficient numbers, at proper places, with reasonable opportunities to accomplish the work."

In Nashville, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Foster (1882) 10 Lea, 351, the court cited Mobile & O. R. Co. v. Thomas (1868) 42 Ala. 672, to the point that a car inspector and brakeman were fellow servants.

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Rice (1889) 51 Ark. 467, 4 L. R. A. 173, the court said: "While we recognize the liability of the railway company for the wilful or negligent default of its chief inspectors and those deputed to supervise the condemnation of unsuitable tools, rolling-stock, etc., we cannot assent to the proposition that every yard inspector on the line of a railroad is a vice principal."

In an early case in Vermont, following, as may be surmised from the citations of counsel, the trend of the English decisions which preceded and anticipated the ruling in Wilson v. Merry, it was held that an engineer injured through the negligence of a master mechanic whose duty it is to see that the engines are kept in repair, cannot recover damages from the common employer. The ground was taken that the rule by which the master impliedly warrants the soundness of machinery, so far as the exercise of due care will enable him to discover any unsoundness therein, applies only to the condition of the machinery at the time it is put into the hands of the servant. There is no warranty that the servants shall faithfully discharge their duty in keeping the machinery in its original safe condition. Hard v. Vermont & C. R. Co. (1860) 32 Vt. 473, holding that an engineer injured through the negligence of a master mechanic whose duty it is to see that the engines are kept in repair cannot recover damages from the common employer.

This theory is not unlike the Massachusetts doctrine to be noticed presently, but it wants the saving qualifications of the latter in favor of the servant. But this decision is practically overruled by Davis v. Central Vermont R. Co. (1892) 55 Vt. 84, 46 Am. Rep. 590, holding that a railroad company is liable for injuries caused by a defective condition of its track, which would have been known to the company's bridge builder and roadmaster if proper inspection had been exercised.

The decisions of the Federal courts cited in the next section but one have virtually overruled Kidwell v. Houston & G. N. R. Co. (1877) 3 Woods, 813, where, in discussing a contention of plaintiff's counsel that the averment in the petition, charging that the "master mechanic was advised of the habitual negligence and general bad habits of said car inspector, and that he failed and refused to discharge him," takes this case out of the general rule, as being equivalent to a charge that the company had employed an unskilful or incompetent car inspector, the court said: "This charge, thus vaguely made, seems to me only to amount to a charge of negligence on the part of the master mechanic in not reporting the character of the car inspector to the officers of the company, and does not, therefore, constitute an exception to the general rule that a railroad company is not liable to one of its employees for the mere negligence of another employee. It does not appear that the master machinist was anything more than a fellow servant of the car inspector and the plaintiff, without the power of appointment or removal. Under these circumstances the defendant company could not be made liable."

The fact that the inspection of foreign cars is, under the rulings of the state where the action is brought, an assignable duty, will not prevent a servant who is injured by the failure of a co-servant to discharge that duty properly from maintaining the action, if he might have recovered under the law of the state where the injury was received. Walsh v. New York & N. E. R. Co. (1894) 160 Mass. 571.

c. Theory that the master is bound merely to supervise the inspectors.

This theory has been most fully elaborated by the supreme court of Massachusetts. In the earliest of the cases in which the assignability of the master's duties was directly involved (Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 598), no traces of it are discoverable, for the court there held that instructions were properly refused which said the defendants would not be liable for negligence of persons examining a boiler. The court said: "The corporation is equally chargeable, whether the negligence was in originally failing to provide, or in afterwards failing to keep, its machinery in safe condition. The duty is essentially the same. . . . The question was not whether the officers named knew, or might have known, of the defect, or of the incompetency of those who had charge of the repairs, but whether the corporation in any part of its organization, by any of its agents, or for want of of agents, failed to exercise due care to prevent injury to the plaintiff from defects in the instrument furnished for his use."

In Colton v. Richards (1878) 123 Mass. 484, it was recognized that the exercise of due care in selecting men and materials does not always represent the full measure of the defendant's duty, when, as master, he takes upon himself the business of furnishing a completed staging for the use of his workmen, but that it may still be his duty—especially when he superintends the work himself—to see that the structure is in itself reasonably safe and fit for the uses to which it is devoted. But as this was said merely with reference to the distinction, recognized by all courts (see e. infra), between the liability of the master for the quality of materials furnished for a structure, and for the quality of the structure itself erected by servants from those materials, as a part of their ordinary duties, the case does not cast much light upon the evolution of the doctrine.

The same distinction may, perhaps, be also sufficient to explain the actual decision in Johnson v. Boston Tow-Boat Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 209, 46 Am. Rep. 458, to the effect that a tow-boat company is not liable for the negligence of the captain of one of its lighters, who fails to replace a rope which he knows to be defective, where a sufficient stock of ropes is always kept on hand by the company, and a new one may be obtained at any time. But the following language used by the court can scarcely bear any other construction than one which commits it to a doctrine wholly inconsistent with that laid down in Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 598, although an elaborate attempt was made by Colt, J., to reconcile the two cases: "It was incidental to the use of the apparatus—a part of its contemplated use—that the rope should be occasionally renewed; and when the defendant had furnished the means for that renewal, and employed Moore to make the renewal whenever needed, it employed him as a servant, and not as agent or deputy. When a master has furnished suitable structures, means, and appliances for the prosecution of a business, all persons employed by him in carrying on the business by the use of the means furnished, including those who use the means directly in the prosecution of the business, those who maintain them in a condition to be used, and those who adapt them to use by new appliances and adaptations incidental to their use, are fellow servants in the general employment and business. One employed in the care, supervision, and keeping in ordinary repair of the means and appliances used in a business, is engaged in the common service."

The new doctrine was at length fully unfolded in Rogers v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. (1887) 144 Mass. 202, 59 Am. Rep. 68. "The rule of respondeat superior," said Field, J., "as applied to cases like the present, the exception of injuries caused by the negligence of a fellow servant, and the limitations of this exception, have been established by courts upon considerations of public policy, as well as of the legal principles which govern cases somewhat analogous. If a master who takes no personal part in the management of his business has any duty to perform towards his servants, it is difficult to say that it is always wholly performed by doing two things, namely, by employing competent servants, and by furnishing ample means. In order that the business may be properly managed, the servants should not only be competent, but they should be numerous enough to do, and they should have the means of doing, whatever ought reasonably to be done, and such regulations should be established as will insure the regulate subordination and control and the exercise of reasonable intelligence and care in the conduct of the business; and it is almost as difficult to define all the duties of the master in these respects as to define the duties of a person under other relations. If it is not the absolute duty of the master to furnish suitable machinery, and if he is not held to warrant that the servants he employs to furnish machinery, or to keep it in repair, shall always use reasonable care, then the duty of a master who does not personally conduct his business, if he is under any duty, we think, must be to use reasonable care in the management, and that is to exercise, or have exercised, a reasonable supervision over the conduct of his servants, as well as to use reasonable care in seeing that his servants are competent, and are furnished with suitable means for carrying on the business." Then, after reviewing some of the earlier cases, the learned judge proceeded as follows: "These decisions show that it is the duty of the master to exercise a reasonable supervision over the condition in which the machinery, structures, and other appliances used in his business are kept by his servants, and that he cannot wholly escape responsibility by delegating the performance of this duty to servants; that the negligence of his servants in repairing or in failing to repair machinery is not necessarily the negligence of the master, but that it is also to be determined in each case whether the master has exercised a reasonable supervision over his servants, and reasonable care in seeing that his machinery is kept in proper condition, although he may have employed competent servants, and furnished them with suitable materials, and instructed them to keep the machinery in repair. As was said in Johnson v. Boston Tow-Boat Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 215, 46 Am. Rep. 458, 'The master is liable in all cases for his own negligence, and that may be shown by a defect of such a nature, or so long continued, as to be of itself evidence of negligence in the master, or the negligence of a servant may be of such a character that negligence of the master may be inferred from it.' We are aware that this rule is somewhat indefinite, and is, perhaps, not precisely that which generally prevails in the United States. Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1886) 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755; Benzing v. Steinway (1886) 101 N. Y. 547."

In another case decided about the same time the court said: "Perhaps the whole question is whether the master has exercised reasonable care in employing competent servants, in providing suitable machines and implements, and in doing that part of his business which he has undertaken to do himself, and has exercised a reasonable supervision over his servants in the performance of the duties which he has intrusted to them. This is often a question for the jury. Courts have therefore held that they could not say, as matter of law, that a master was not responsible for injuries occasioned by defective machinery, when the defect was substantial and rendered the machine unfit for use, although it was through the neglect of a competent servant that the machine had not been repaired; and they have also held that, when the defect was one that must frequently arise from the use of the machine, and was such that the person employed to superintend the use of the machine should attend to in order to keep it in running order, the master performed his whole duty by furnishing suitable materials and employing competent servants to keep the machinery in repair. These decisions have been made in cases where it appeared that the defect in the machinery was unknown to the master. The general question is, what under the circumstances, the master ought reasonably to have known and done, and, in determining this, the nature of the defect, the length of time it has existed, and the means taken to remedy it, are important facts." Rice v. King Phillip Mills (1887) 144 Mass. 236, 59 Am. Rep. 80.

In Moynihan v. Hills Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 502, it was remarked: "The very nature of the implied contract created by the hiring, whereby he undertakes to use proper care in always providing safe tools and appliances, is inconsistent with his delegation of the duty to a fellow servant, for whose negligence he is not to be responsible. His obligation involves the exercise of every kind of care and diligence which is necessary to give him knowledge of the condition as to safety of his machinery and appliances, so far as such knowledge is obtainable by reasonable effort. His duty relates to the condition of these articles when they come to the hands of his servants for use, and the performance of that duty must carry him just so far into details as it is reasonably necessary to go, in view of the nature and risk of the business, to enable him reasonably to protect his servants from a danger which he should prevent."

"The servant charged with providing appliances stands in the place of the master, and performs the duty incumbent on him. It is not sufficient that he is an intelligent and competent servant; if he neglects this, the master is still responsible, unless he shall himself have exercised a reasonable care and supervision over him in seeing that the machinery was in proper condition. Nor is it enough that the master has employed suitable servants, and furnished them with suitable materials, and instructed them to keep the machinery in repair. He must see that such servants do their duty." Elmer v. Locke (1883) 135 Mass. 575; Rogers v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. (1887) 144 Mass. 198, 59 Am. Rep. 68; Daley v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1888) 147 Mass. 101.

The theory of the court was still further clarified by the ruling in Babcock v. Old Colony R. Co. (1890) 150 Mass. 467, where the plaintiff was injured by defects in a railroad track. The extremely vague character of the principles to which this court has committed itself in attempting to fix the boundary line between supervision as an assignable and as a nonassignable duty, will be apparent from the following passages of the opinion: "It is the duty of a railroad corporation to use reasonable care and diligence to keep its tracks in a safe condition for its employees to work upon. So far as the work of keeping its tracks in repair is left to its servants, it is its duty to exercise reasonable supervision to see that the work intrusted to them is properly done. How far into details this supervision must go before the domain which belongs exclusively to the master is passed and the domain which may be left to servants is entered, depends upon what it is reasonable to require of a master who is charged with the duty of providing safe works, machinery, tools, and appliances for his employees. In some cases this may be a difficult question to decide. . . . The next question in the case is, whether there was evidence to warrant the judge in submitting to the jury the question whether the section master was so far charged with the duty of supervision that the defendant might be liable to one of its servants for his negligence. It is well settled that one who is in some things a mere servant may be made the master's agent to perform duties which are primarily personal to the master. Moynihan v. Hillis Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 586, and cases cited. If in the present case the section master was intrusted by the defendant with the performance of the duty, or a part of the duty, of supervision of the tracks which a reasonable regard for the safety of its employees required the corporation to perform, the defendant is liable for his negligence in the performance of it. There was evidence tending to show that different persons had some responsibility in representing the defendant in this respect. A part of the printed instructions to section masters was in these words: 'They will see that no wood, lumber, ties, or other obstructions are piled within 6 feet of the track'. It does not very clearly appear what other measures were taken by the defendant promptly to ascertain the existence of defects or obstructions along the track. The evidence on this branch of the case is rather meagre, but we cannot say that there was not enough to warrant the judge in submitting the question to the jury under the instructions which he gave. . . . The refusal of the judge to instruct 'that, if the defendant had used reasonable care in the supervision of the section men and of the use of the yard, the plaintiff could not recover for the neglect of the section men in leaving the ties by the track, or the neglect of the yard master or the section master or roadmaster in failing to have them removed, or to report that they were there,' was upheld on the ground that it might possibly have been the duty of the yardmaster, or the roadmaster, to exercise this supervision, and if he discovered neglect, to see that the road was not left in a dangerous condition on account of the neglect."

In Coates v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1891) 153 Mass. 207, 10 L. R. A. 769, there was evidence that a jaw-strap had been gone for some time, from which it might be inferred that the company knew of its absence, an inference which would justify a finding that the company ordered the plaintiff into a place where there was a concealed danger known to the company, and not known to the plaintiff or to the superior servant giving the order, and of which the plaintiff received no warning. The court said: "We do not put our decision on the identification of master and servant, and a union of the knowledge of the corporation and the command of the conductor in one person, by a fiction. But we think the jury might have found, at least, this negligence on the part of the corporation; that, knowing the condition of the car, it put a conductor there with men under him, having reasonable ground to anticipate that such orders would be given as were given without warning either him or the men."

If a superintendent knew, or had reason to know, that there was danger of the caving of a trench, and had no materials for bracing it, and no power to procure them, it was negligence to allow the digging to go on before the necessary materials were procured. For such negligence of a superintendent, the principal is answerable, and cannot escape liability by showing that it was by his own act, and not by the fault of the superintendent, that suitable materials were wanting. Connolly v. Waltham (1892) 156 Mass. 368.

With the above cases may be compared Neveu v. Sears (1892) 155 Mass. 303, where it was held that one sued for personal injuries to a stone mason in his employ, caused by the explosion of dynamite left unexploded in a block of stone which plaintiff was dressing, is chargeable with knowledge of those facts as to the use of dynamite at his quarry which he either knew or ought to have known. His employment of competent quarrymen, and his furnishing them with proper means of preventing any dangers consequent on the use of dynamite, would not, it was said, justify him in relying on his actual want of knowledge that there had been carelessness at the quarry as an excuse for furnishing a dangerous stone for the plaintiff's use, if, knowing all that had happened at the quarry, he would then have had reason to believe that unexploded cartridges might remain in the blocks removed therefrom. An instruction was, therefore, held correct which left the jury to say whether, considering the knowledge which the master had, or ought to have had, of what occurred at the quarry, each block should have been examined for dynamite when it was transported from the quarry, or first appropriated for the work on which the plaintiff was engaged.

Traces of a similar doctrine are also to be found in the decisions of the New Jersey courts.

"A master cannot claim immunity on the ground that he has exercised due care in selecting mechanics of competent skill in the construction of machinery and buildings, but assumes the burden of seeing that such mechanics actually exercise reasonable care and skill in the execution of their work." Collyer v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1886) 49 N. J. L. 59.

In Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. (1880) 42 N. J. L. 467, 88 Am. Rep. 535, it appeared that one Scranton, the president of the defendant company, to whose care was committed the superintendence of the business of the corporation, introduced the use of giant powder. It was clearly shown that it was a highly dangerous explosive, and that the proper manner of using it was not made known to the plaintiff, although printed instructions were in the possession of the company. The court said: "Before allowing this new compound to be introduced, it was a duty which the company owed to the plaintiff to ascertain and make known its properties and the mode of using it, either to the plaintiff himself or those under whose direction he worked. The obligation to do so rested upon Scranton, as the head officer of the company, and his neglect in that respect was the neglect of the company itself. It was gross negligence in the company to furnish such an article for a laborer's use without giving him the requisite information. Whether the company was aware of its dangerous quality, or furnished it for use without having taken steps to obtain such knowledge, it is equally liable. It was a duty which the company, through Scranton, was bound to perform, to see that such reasonable care as the exigency of the case demanded, was taken, and to impart to the subordinates full information as to the manner of applying the new compound, before placing it in the hands of an ignorant laborer. This obligation resting on the company itself, the president could not shift its liability by referring the matter to one of his subordinates. The effect of such a rule would be to substantially absolve a corporation from all liability. There was a clear failure on the part of the president to use the care which, under the circumstances of the case, the law exacted from the defendant, and his neglect must be imputed to the company."

In Michigan C. R. Co. v. Dolan (1875) 82 Mich. 510, the court referred to, but declined to discuss, the question how far down in the chain of delegated appointments the master is to be held as bound to personal supervision, remarking: "The starting point that he is only liable for his own neglect is one from which we have no right to depart. And it is plain enough that, when he is held to any personal supervision which from the nature of his business is impracticable, the rule is violated, and there is no tangible distinction left between liability to servants and liability to strangers."

The nonexistence of a duty on the part of an employee alleged to be a vice principal to supervise his subordinates in the performance of their work to the extent claimed will, it is obvious, sometimes dispense with the necessity of inquiring into the correctness of that allegation.

A conductor, for instance, is bound to give orders as to the movement of the several parts of a freight train at a station, but he is not in duty required to follow up each brakeman, and see how each movement is executed. Relyea v. Kansas City, Ft. S. & G. R. Co. (1892) 112 Mo. 86, 18 L. R. A. 817, where it was held not to be negligence for the conductor to leave to the brakeman the work of seeing that the brakes were properly set on each of the cars which were left standing on a grade.

d. Theory that the duty of inspection is nonassignable.

1. General principles.

The general doctrine as to the nonassignability of the master's various duties has been thus laid down by the Supreme Court of the United States in a well-known passage: "A railroad corporation may be controlled by competent, watchful, and prudent directors, who exercise the greatest caution in the selection of a superintendent or general manager, under whose supervision and orders its affairs and business, in all of its departments, are conducted. The latter, in turn, may observe the same caution in the appointment of subordinates at the head of the several branches or departments of the company's service. But the obligation still remains to provide and maintain, in suitable condition, the machinery and apparatus to be used by its employees, an obligation the more important, and the degree of diligence in its performance the greater, in proportion to the dangers which may be encountered. Those, at least, in the organization of the incorporation who are invested with controlling or superior authority in that regard represent its legal personality; their negligence, from which injury results, is the negligence of the corporation. The latter cannot, in respect of such matters, interpose between it and the servant, who has been injured without fault on his part, the personal responsibility of an agent who, in exercising the master's authority, has violated the duty he owes, as well to the servant as to the corporation. Hough v. Texas & P. R. Co. (1879) 100 U. S. 213, 25 L. ed. 612. To the same effect, see Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1886) 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755; Northern P. R. Co. v. Peterson (1895) 162 U. S. 346, 4 L. ed. 905.

The following uncompromising assertion of the same doctrine is of special interest for the reason that it emanates from a court which, as has been shown above, has not carried that doctrine, in the case of the duty of inspection, to its logical results: "The rule of law which exempts the master from responsibility to the servant for injuries received from the ordinary risks of his employment, including the negligence of his fellow servants, does not excuse the employer from the exercise of ordinary care in supplying and maintaining suitable instrumentalities for the performance of the work required. One who enters the employment of another has the right to count on this duty, 41 L. R. A.

and is not required to assume the risks of the master's negligence in this respect. The fact that it is a duty which must always be discharged, when the employer is a corporation, by officers and agents, does not relieve the corporation from the obligation. The agents who are charged with the duty of supplying safe machinery are not, in the true sense of the rule relied on, to be regarded as fellow servants of those who are engaged in operating it. They are charged with the master's duty to his servant. They are employed in distinct and independent departments of service, and there is no difficulty in distinguishing them, even when the same person renders service by turns in each, as the convenience of the employer may require. In one the master cannot escape the consequence of the agent's negligence; if the servant is injured in the other he may." Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 240, 260, 14 Am. Rep. 598.

In Riley v. West Virginia, C. & P. R. Co. (1885) 27 W. Va. 145, the correct rule on this subject, as deduced from the more recent and better considered American cases, was said to have been that stated in Wood on Master and Servant, § 438, as follows: "Whenever the master delegates to another the performance of a duty to his servants which the master has impliedly contracted to perform in person, or which rests upon him as an absolute duty, he is liable for the manner in which that duty is performed by the middleman whom he has selected as his agent, and to the extent of the discharge of those duties by the middleman, he stands in the place of the master, but as to all other matters he is a mere coservant, and the question is not, whether the master reserved any oversight or discretion to himself, but whether he did in fact clothe the middleman with power to perform his duties to the servant injured."

The broad principles thus enunciated are undoubtedly those which are supported by the greatest weight of authority in this country, and by the majority of the courts they have been, as the subjoined rulings will show, construed in such a sense as to make the duty of inspection nonassignable.

"It is only at his own risk that a person engaged in excavating a ditch can depute to another the task of keeping it in a safe condition for the servants whom he puts to work in it." Van Steenburgh v. Thornton (1895) 58 N. J. L. 160. (See, however, as to the apparently inconsistent position of this court, b, and c, supra.)

It is observable that the fact of this nonassignability may be expressed by two different forms of statement. We may either say that the "nonfulfilment of a positive duty cannot be excused by the delegation of its performance to another" (Pennsylvania R. C. v. La Rue (1897) 55 U. S. App. 20, 81 Fed. Rep. 148), or that the employee entrusted with the performance of one of these absolute duties is not a mere coservant of the other workmen, but a vice principal. These alternative modes of statement, and the objects at which the courts have aimed in adopting the conception which underlies them both, are very clearly explained in the following passage from the opinion in Rogers v. Ludlow Mfg. Co. (1887) 144 Mass. 201, 59 Am. Rep. 68: "As a corporation must act by natural persons, and as all large corporations carry on their business by means of servants of different grades, it is manifest that, if it is held that these are all fellow servants, and that the corporation can delegate the whole duty of hiring and superintending its servants, and of providing its machinery and of keeping it in repair, to one or more principal servants, such as superintendents or managers, the corporation may escape all responsibility for injuries caused by defective machinery, except in the few cases where it can be shown that these principal servants were incompetent, or that the directors of the corporation, or its principal officers, knew that the subordinate servants were incompetent, or that the machinery used was defective. To avoid this result, some courts have held that superintendents or managers are not fellow servants with the men employed to work under them, or that servants employed in one department of the business are not fellow servants with those employed in another. Other courts have held that they are all fellow servants, but that the master cannot avoid his obligation to see to it that reasonable care shall be exercised in procuring suitable machinery, in keeping it in repair, and in hiring and retaining competent servants, by employing a servant to do these things for him, and that if he does employ a servant for this purpose, and the servant does not use due care, the master is responsible."

So far as the actual liability of the employer is concerned, it is, of course, quite immaterial from which standpoint the position of the inspector is considered, and, as might be expected, the courts are apt to pass from one form of expression to the other in the course of the same discussion.

The following passage from the dissenting opinion of Mitchell, J., in Tierney v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1885) 83 Minn. 311, 53 Am. Rep. 35, is worthy of notice as indicating some of the difficulties of fixing with precision the division line between nonassignable duties and the duties of fellow servants: "A familiar rule is that the master is bound to use ordinary care in furnishing suitable and safe instrumentalities for the use of his servants. Included in this is that of maintaining them in a safe condition. Repairing is, in a sense, furnishing. And, as necessarily incident to the duty of 'maintaining,' is the duty of providing an adequate system of inspecting, examining, and guarding these instrumentalities. It is also the rule that this duty of furnishing and maintaining safe instrumentalities is a primary duty of which the master cannot relieve himself by clothing some general agent with the power, and charging him with the duty, of making performance for him, but that the failure of such agent will be the failure of the master. This rule has been sometimes understood as meaning that the master is responsible to his servants for the negligence of every employee, however his station, who is engaged in performing the most common executive duties in the matters of repairing, examining, or watching the instrumentalities intended for the use of other servants. I think this is a misapprehension of the rule, which has sometimes arisen from losing sight of the distinction between one who is clothed with the powers of the master in the control and supervision of some department of the business, and who is pro hac vice the representative or alter ego of the master, and one who simply performs what may be termed mere executive details. . . . The management of an extensive business, like that of operating a railroad, includes so many departments and so many grades of service that it may not always be an easy matter to draw the line between those who are to be deemed 'vice principals,' or representatives of the master, and those who are to be deemed 'fellow servants,' as to other employees; but the fact of such a distinction is everywhere recognized. To hold that the master is responsible to his servants for the negligence of every employee of the most subordinate rank who is engaged in the department of repairing, examining, watching, or guarding the instrumentalities used by other employees, would virtually abrogate the whole doctrine of 'common employment.' There is hardly an employee in the service of any railroad whose duties do not, in part at least, relate to the matter of maintaining in safe condition the track or rolling stock. If the rule be that all these pro hac vice represent the master, and are performing his duty, the same rule must be applied to all masters alike. Such a rule, if applied to farmers, manufacturers, and others, would, I think, effect a radical change in what has been supposed to be the law. And yet this is, I think, the logical result to which the opinion in this case would seem to lead; for I can see no distinction in principle between these 'car-inspectors' and switch-tenders, station agents, guards, watchmen, and the like, in so far as their duties relate to maintaining in safe condition the machinery and other instrumentalities of the master, designed to be used by his employees."

2. Illustrative rulings.

Cases in which the former rather than the latter of the two conceptions referred to at the close of the preceding section seems to have been present to the mind of the court are the following; but it must be remembered that, as the nonassignability of certain duties is the basis of the "vice principal" theory, the judges afterward resort to both forms of statement in the same opinion.

The duty which rests upon a railroad company to see to it at an inspecting station, that the wheels of a freight car which is about to be drawn out on the road are in safe and proper condition, cannot be delegated so as to exonerate the company from liability to a servant for injuries resulting from the omission to perform that duty, or through its negligent performance. Union P. R. Co. v. Snyder (1894) 152 U. S. 684, 38 L. ed. 597, Affirming Daniels v. Union P. R. Co. (1890) 6 Utah, 357.

The sufficiency of the number of inspectors of railroad cars, and their competency, furnish no defense to an action for injuries caused by a defect which could have been detected by a proper inspection. Union P. R. Co. v. Snyder (1894) 152 U. S. 684, 38 L. ed. 597.

In Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett (1897) 166 U. S. 617, 41 L. ed. 1136, the following instruction was approved: "If the jury believe, from the evidence under the foregoing instructions, that the boiler which exploded and injured the plaintiff was defective and unfit for use, and that defendant's servants, whose duty it was to repair such machinery, knew, or by reasonable care might have known, of such defects in said machinery, then such neglect upon the part of its servants is imputable to the defendant; and if said boiler exploded by reason of said defects, and injured the plaintiff, the defendant would be responsible for the injuries inflicted upon plaintiff, if plaintiff in no way, by his own neglect, contributed to his injuries."

An instruction is properly refused which directs the jury to find for the defendant, if he has used care in the selection of the appliance and of a competent inspector, and the plaintiff's injury was due to the negligence of such inspector in not making proper tests. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett (1895) 30 U. S. App. 106, 67 Fed. Rep. 214, 14 C. C. A. 373.

In The Frank and Willie (1891) 45 Fed. Rep. 494, the evidence showed that the mate, after notice of the dangerous condition of a pile of lumber, which his own unskilfulness or negligence had brought about, and after complaint made at least an hour before the accident, refused to take the usual precautions to make the pile safe, and, in effect, required the libellant to continue work in this dangerous situation. The court said: "This was breach of a duty owed by the ship and owners to the seaman, for which the ship and owners are liable. The master was absent, and the mate was not only temporarily in command, but, as mate, he was the officer having charge in unloading the cargo,—the representative of the ship and owners in the supervision of that work. His attention was specially called to the dangerous situation, its correction was requested, and the libellant was practically helpless. I do not hold the ship liable for the mate's mere negligence as a fellow workman in producing the dangerous situation, but for his refusal to remedy it when complaint was made, and the danger pointed out to him."

A master cannot escape liability for the defective condition of appliances furnished his servants by delegating the duty of inspection in respect to those appliances to other employees. Baltimore & P. R. Co. v. Elliott (1896) 9 App. D. C. 341.

A master cannot avoid liability for failure to perform a duty he owes his servant, by delegating it to a fellow servant; but a fellow servant, in the performance of such duty, is the agent of the master, and his knowledge that a place is unsafe to work in charges the master with knowledge. Elledge v. National City & O. R. Co. (1893) 100 Cal. 282, Rehearing Denied in 34 Pac. 852; Distinguishing Daves v. Southern P. Co. (1893) 98 Cal. 19, where the place of work was "of itself a reasonably safe one," and became unsafe only through the negligence of the foreman.

The delegation of the duty of inspection to an employee does not relieve the company from liability because of the negligence of that employee in the discharge of that duty. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Kneirum (1894) 152 Ill. 458.

Where a servant of a railroad company is injured or killed in consequence of the giving way of a defective bridge, the company cannot escape liability from the fact that the bridge was constructed properly in the first place, and it employed skilful and competent subordinates to inspect and repair its bridges. Toledo, P. & W. R. Co. v. Conroy (1873) 68 Ill. 560.

An employer is not relieved from liability for injuries to an employee caused by the sudden starting of machinery due to the absence of a nut from an eyebolt used to hold a lever in place to keep the machinery stationary, where the nut had been gone for several weeks, by the fact that another employee having charge of the machinery knew of such defect, and did not report it or see that it was repaired, as the injured employee does not assume the risks of such negligence on the part of a fellow servant. Monmouth Min. & Mfg. Co. v. Erling (1894) 148 Ill. 521, Aff'd (1892) 45 Ill. App. 411.

It is the duty of a railroad company to provide and maintain reasonably safe and suitable cars and other appliances for its employees to work with; and it cannot escape liability to an employee, who, without fault or neglect on his part, suffers injury from the use of defective appliances or implements, by showing that the failure to discover and amend the defect was attributable to the neglect of an agent of the company to whom the duty of selecting and inspecting its cars and their appendages had been committed. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Pearcy (1891) 128 Ind. 197.

The employment by a railroad company of a competent inspector of its appliances does not relieve it from liability for injuries resulting from defects in the appliances, which would have been discovered by a reasonably careful inspection, but which were not in fact discovered. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Ward (1896, Ind.) 45 N. E. 325.

A railroad company does not discharge its duty toward a fireman by having a competent inspector inspect the engine, unless the inspection is a reasonably careful one. Cleveland, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Ward (1897, Ind.) 46 N. E. 462, Denying Rehearing in (1896) 45 N. E. 325; Durkin v. Sharp (1892) 88 N. Y. 225, followed.

As a corporation must act through its agents, the negligence of the employee in whom the duty of inspection is devolved is the negligence of the corporation. Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1880) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243.

But the scope of this decision is greatly limited by a subsequent ruling of the same court to the effect that the engineer in charge of an engine operating a machine for sawing, whose duties include that of keeping the machinery in good condition, and repairing it when broken or defective, is a fellow servant with another engaged in operating the saw. Theleman v. Moeller (1887) 73 Iowa, 108. The court said: "It is the rule of this court that an employee cannot, in an action against his employer, recover for the negligence of a coemployee engaged in the prosecution of a common business. But this rule does not extend to an employee who is charged with no other duty than to inspect the machinery, in the operation of which the injury occurs. Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1880) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243. But the engineer, it will be seen from the statement of the evidence just made, was not confined by his duty to the mere inspection of the machinery. He had it in charge, was required to see that it was in good condition, and to repair it when broken or defective. These duties were not separated from the operation of the machinery. The engineer and plaintiff together operated it. The engine furnished the motive of sawing,—the very purpose for which both engine and saw were used. The saw could not be operated without the engine. The engineer was engaged in operating the saw. He was therefore a coemployee of plaintiff in the common business of both."

It is submitted, however, that there is no rational ground upon which the later of these decisions can be based, for there is no reason why an employee should not be regarded as occupying the dual position of a vice principal and of a mere servant. In fact the courts have frequently recognized the possibility of this union of functions. See McKinney, Fellow Servants, § 42.

A railroad company is guilty of actionable negligence, under Mich. Laws 1883, p. 191, requiring railroad companies under pecuniary penalty to adjust, fill, or block frogs in their yards so as to prevent the catching of feet therein, in permitting a frog in its yard to remain unfilled or unblocked, with its knowledge, or for such a length of time that knowledge will be presumed, although it has employed persons expressly charged with the duty of keeping such frogs in proper condition. Ashman v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. (1892) 90 Mich. 567.

The negligence of a person employed to lay a water pipe in a ditch through a lumber yard, which it was the duty of the master to keep in a reasonably safe condition, in leaving such a yard in a dangerous condition, is attributable to the master, as regards an employee engaged therein. Sadowski v. Michigan Car Co. (1890) 84 Mich. 100. The court said: "Those employed by the master to provide or to keep in repair the place, or to supply the machinery and tools, for labor, are engaged in a different employment from those who are to use the place or appliances when provided, and they are not therefore, as to each other, fellow servants. In such case, the one whose duty it is to provide and look after the safety of the place where the work is to be done represents the master in such a sense that the latter is liable for his negligence."

In McDonald v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895, Mich.) 2 Det. L. N. 774, it was held that a railroad company which imposes on its engineers the duty of inspecting their engines, and provides no other method of inspection, to keep them in a reasonably safe condition, is liable to one of its brakemen for an injury received through the failure of the engine to respond promptly to the airbrake, which defect was known to the engineer, who continued to use the engine after knowing of the defect, whether such conduct be considered as a complete neglect of the master's duty of inspection, or the illegal imposition of such duty upon a fellow servant. The court said: "Such inspection, in the ordinary operation of the road, is the act of a fellow servant, as between the engineer and brakeman, and, as between them, does not constitute the engineer a representative of the master. . . . But if the company makes no other provision for inspection, and chooses to rely upon the reports of its men, deferring repairs until breaks occur, or until the operators, in due course of business, report defects, we must either say that it has neglected the duty of inspection altogether, or that it has imposed one of its duties upon its operatives, and that it does not fall within the limits of fellow service, or that it may avoid the duty which the law imposes, by invoking the rule of fellow servants."

In Tierney v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1885) 33 Minn. 311, 53 Am. Rep. 35, it was held that where, by a regulation governing the employees in the transfer yard of a railway company, car inspectors were required to inspect incoming cars immediately upon their arrival, and, if out of repair, to mark them "In bad order," indicating that they were to be sent to the "repair track," negligence on the part of the inspectors in failing to properly discharge this duty by reason of which plaintiff was injured while attempting to couple a damaged car without notice of its condition, and without fault on his part, may be imputed to the company. The court said: "In respect to patent defects in the coupling apparatus, brakes, wheels, etc., we may assume that the defendants had undertaken the duty of inspection, and intrusted it to the proper agents. As a rule, also, there is a distinction between the special duties of such persons and the service of other employees who are engaged in handling cars and operating trains. It is not the same in kind as that of switchman, brakeman, or other operative. Wedgewood v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1878) 44 Wis. 44; Schultz v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1879) 48 Wis. 375. The service of the former class relates wholly to the matter of the care and repair of machinery, the use of which is attended with constant danger to other employees unless maintained in a safe condition; and they represent the master, not in the capacity of superior officers placed over other employees, but because performing the master's duty in respect to safe instrumentalities."

The negligence of a general agent hired to conduct a business to which the employer gives no personal attention is in law the negligence of the employer himself so far as regards the duties which such employer owes to the subordinate servants. The employer cannot, by abstaining from taking any part in the business, exonerate himself from those duties or from the consequences of a failure to perform them. Corcoran v. Holbrook (1875) 59 N. Y. 517, 17 Am. Rep. 369. There a mill owner was held liable for the negligence of his general agent in omitting to repair a chain by which an elevator was raised and lowered, after he had been notified that the apparatus was in a dangerous condition.

This rule is as applicable to individuals as to corporations. Corcoran v. Holbrook (1875) 50 N. Y. 517, 17 Am. Rep. 369.

In Durkin v. Sharp (1882) 88 N. Y. 225, it was held that the inspection of a railroad track was a duty of the master and if carelessly and negligently performed, even by a competent inspector, the master would still be liable. To excuse him from liability the track must have been carefully inspected by a competent inspector.

In Fuller v. Jewett (1880) 80 N. Y. 46 38 Am. Rep. 575, an action against a railroad receiver to recover damages for the killing of a locomotive engineer by the explosion of a boiler, there was evidence that the boiler had been frequently reported and sent to the repair shop for repairs, and the defendant was held not to be excused from liability by the facts that there was no negligence in employing the superintendent of repairs, or in making proper regulations, that the master-mechanic in charge gave proper instructions for the repairing, and that the negligence was that of the workmen directed to make the repairs. The court cited Filke v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1873) 53 N. Y. 549, 13 Am. Rep. 545; Booth v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1878) 73 N. Y. 38, 29 Am. Rep. 97, and Mehan v. Syracuse, B. & N. Y. R. Corp. (1878) 73 N. Y. 585, as being decisive against a defendant, and said: "We understand the principle of these cases to be, that acts which the master, as such, is bound to perform for the safety and protection of his employees, cannot be delegated so as to exonerate the former from liability to a servant, who is injured by the omission to perform the act or duty, or by its negligent performance, whether the nonfeasance or misfeasance is that of a superior officer, agent, or servant, or of a subordinate or inferior agent or servant to whom the doing of the act, or the performance of the duty, has been committed. In either case, in respect to such act or duty, the servant who undertakes, or omits to perform it, is the representative of the master, and not a mere coservant with the one who sustains the injury. The act or omission is the act of omission of the master irrespective of the grade of the servant whose negligence caused the injury, or of the fact whether it was or was not practicable for the master to act personally, or whether he did or did not do all that he personally could do by selecting competent servants, or otherwise to secure the safety of his employees. It is sometimes difficult to determine what is the master's duty, within the rule. But when it is ascertained that the negligence by which an employee is injured relates to this duty, then there is no middle ground, and the case cannot be determined upon any distinction founded upon the particular grade, office, or function of the negligent servant or agent."

In Bailey v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1893) 129

N. Y. 302, it was held that "proper inspection to discover defects is a part of the master's duty," and that a railroad company is therefore responsible for an injury caused by a defect in a brake which would have been discovered if the inspectors had performed their duties properly.

A careless or negligent inspection of a boiler by a competent inspector does not relieve a master from liability for a defect not discovered by such inspection. To excuse him from liability the boiler must be inspected by a competent inspector at reasonably frequent intervals. Egan v. Dry Dock, E. B. & B. R. Co. (1896) 12 App. Div. 556, Following Durkin v. Sharp (1882) 88 N. Y. 225; Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1887) 107 N. Y. 874.

In Malone v. Hathaway (1876) 64 N. Y. 5, 21 Am. Rep. 573 (Church, Ch. J., and Rapallo J., dissenting), it was held that an employer is not liable for the negligence of a carpenter employed to examine and make repairs in the building in which his business is carried on. The majority of the court cited with approval Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, but it seems to be impossible to reconcile the ruling with the other decisions of the same court referred to above.

Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, is sometimes supposed to be an authority for the doctrine that a railroad company discharges its full duty to its servants in regard to the maintenance of its bridges when it has provided adequate materials for their construction and competent servants to inspect them.

In Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1873) 1 Thomp. & C. 528, the supreme court quoted the headnote of Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, as given at the commencement of the present subdivision, and proceeded to criticize the case as follows: "The rule as thus stated is obviously of small consequence as a protection to the servants or employees of a corporation, when it is considered that a corporation acts entirely through officers and agents, and there can be no other personal negligence committed by, or imputed to, it except the negligence of such officer or agent; and when it is held also that all the agents and employees of a corporation are fellow servants of a common master, it is difficult to see why, under such rules, corporations are not virtually absolved from all the common-law liability of a master to take care of his servants, and protect them from unjust and unreasonable danger and injuries resulting from the negligence of others. But the recent case of Lanling v. New York C. R. Co. (1872) 49 N. Y. 531, 10 Am. Rep. 417, shows that the present court of appeals is receding from this extreme ground. This case asserts a sounder and more reasonable rule. Judge Folger, who gives the opinion of the court, says: 'The duty of the master to his servants is to use reasonable care to provide and employ none but competent and skilful servants, and to discharge from his service, on notice thereof, any who fail to continue such.' This criticism, however, appears to be based on a misapprehension of the true purport of the case, which merely decides that in the absence of testimony going to prove negligence in the construction of a bridge or in the selection of the servants employed to supervise and test it, or in the performance of their duties by these servants, the injured servant must fall in his action unless he shows that the managing officers of the corporation had notice, actual or constructive, of the defective condition of the bridge. In other words, there are several states of facts upon which an employer may be charged with personal negligence, and, if the evidence is inconsistent with the theory that he was negligent in certain specified ways, the servant must fall back upon some other theory. Under the circumstances in Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, where the testimony shows that due care has been exercised by the directors themselves in seeing that sound structures and competent supervising agents have been provided, and that these agents themselves have not been guilty of negligence in the premises, there was no theory to fall back upon except one based upon the hypothesis that the directors had knowledge of the decayed condition of the bridge through some other avenue of information than the supervising agents appointed by them, and with any such hypothesis the evidence was quite inconsistent. That the case really goes no further than this, so far as the actual decision is concerned, is quite apparent from the opinion. But it must be admitted that, by citing with approval the ruling in Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, the court has shown a disposition to countenance that much more sweeping doctrine under which a master is not liable, even for the negligence of a servant to whom he deposes one or more of the duties which the law imposes on him for the benefit of all persons in his employment. The extent of the liability of a master for the negligent act of a competent servant is, however, a very different question from that raised in Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, and the approval of the English case may, for this reason, be regarded as quite supererogatory. Except in so far as the broad principle of Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 326, 19 L. T. N. S. 30, may be supposed to have been adopted by the court in Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468, it cannot be said that, as was suggested in Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1873) 1 Thomp. & C. 528, the court of appeals has changed its ground in Lanling v. New York C. R. Co. (1872) 49 N. Y. 531, 10 Am. Rep. 417, for there the master was held liable for the reason that personal negligence was shown by the retention of an incompetent servant—a species of negligence which was negated by the testimony in Warner v. Erie R. Co. (1868) 39 N. Y. 468.

In Chesson v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. (1896) 118 N. C. 59, the court said that if carpenters employed to inspect a platform failed to make an inspection, the employer was negligent, especially where there was testimony tending to show that an examination would have disclosed the condition of the platform, and probably have prevented the injury.

It is the duty of the railroad company to place a derrick constructed beside its track, and dangerous to its employees upon its trains when unfastened, in care of some competent person charged with the duty of seeing that it is properly fastened. Gates v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1892) 2 S. D. 422.

An employee does not assume the risk of the negligence of his employer or of a foreman in furnishing a tackle block in which the pin securing the wheel is not properly fastened, or in failing properly to inspect and keep the block in repair in that respect. Houston v. Brush (1894) 66 Vt. 331.

It is the duty of a railroad company, not only to employ a sufficient number of competent inspectors, but to secure a careful inspection. Texas P. R. Co. v. O'Fiel (1890) 78 Tex. 496.

In Cooper v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1884) 24 W. Va. 37, the court says that a railroad company cannot devest itself of the duty to furnish reasonably safe machinery and appliances so as to relieve itself from responsibility for the nonperformance thereof, by delegating the duty to any of its servants in any of its departments; and if it does delegate this duty to any of its servants and vests him with controlling or superior authority in regard thereto, the negligence of such servant is the negligence of the company; also that a brakeman employed on one of the freight trains of a railroad company and an inspector or master mechanic charged with the duty of keeping such machinery, cars, and appliances in repair, cannot be regarded as fellow servants in such a sense as to prevent the brakeman from recovering of the company for an injury sustained by him because of the negligence of such inspector or master mechanic.

For other examples of the same form of statement, see the following cases: Comben v. Belleville Stone Co. (1896) 59 N. J. L. 226; Indiana Car Co. v. Parker (1885) 100 Ind. 181; Brazil Block Coal Co. v. Young (1889) 117 Ind. 520; Johnson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1892) 36 W. Va. 73.

The following extract from the charge of Cockburn, Ch. J., in Webb v. Rennie (1865) 4 Fost. & F. 608, may also be quoted in the present connection, as a clear exposition of the doctrine respecting the nonassignability of the master's duties, though it is inconsistent with the subsequent decisions of the House of Lords in Wilson v. Merry (1868) L. R. 1 H. L. Sc. App. Cas. 328, 19 L. T. N. S. 80, which exploded that doctrine as a whole (see 6, supra): "In the case of a manufacturer employing machinery which might be attended with danger to the persons employed about it, a danger which might be greatly aggravated by the machinery not being in proper condition—as, for instance, in the case of the boiler of a steam engine bursting, as it would be more likely to do if in an improper condition—the master manufacturer might have no means of personally knowing its condition himself, and the question being whether he had used reasonable care and diligence to ascertain it, all that could be reasonably expected of him would be that he should employ some competent person from time to time to examine it. The master must either ascertain the state of the machinery or apparatus himself, or employ some competent person to do so; and if he did employ such a person and a workman was injured in consequence of that person's neglect of his duty in that respect, the master would not be liable to one of his servants for such negligence of a fellow servant in the particular matter."

B. Illustrative rulings expressed in terms of the doctrine of common employment.

The subjoined decisions may be referred to as illustrating the alternative form of statement by which the nonassignability of the duty of inspection may be expressed. An employer is liable for the negligence of the following employees:

An inspector of locomotive boilers. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Thompson (1895) 30 U. S. App. 549, 70 Fed. Rep. 944, 17 C. C. A. 524, reiterating doctrine of Texas & P. R. Co. v. Barrett (1896) 30 U. S. App. 198, 67 Fed. Rep. 214, 14 C. C. A. 373. Speer, D. J., dissented on the ground that the theory of the defendant as to the cause of the accident had not been brought to the attention of the jury by proper instructions.

A "fire boss" whose duty it is to inspect the working-places in a coal mine, and inform miners as to the condition. Cerrillos Coal R. Co. 41 L. R. A.

v. Deserant (1897, N. M.) 49 Pac. 807, following Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1885) 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 735.

Employees charged with the duty of going through a mine inspecting it and seeing whether it is free from explosive gas. Gowen v. Bush (1896) 40 U. S. App. 349, 76 Fed. Rep. 349, 22 C. C. A. 196.

An engineer in exercising the permission given him by a railroad company to place the engine in charge of a fireman whom he deems competent. Harper v. Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1871) 47 Mo. 567, 4 Am. Rep. 353, citing Brickner v. New York C. R. Co. (1870) 2 Lana. 506.

One employed to keep a railroad track in good condition. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Moore (1883) 29 Kan. 632.

Carpenters employed to inspect and make needed repairs in a platform which a servant is obliged to use in his work. Chesson v. John L. Roper Lumber Co. (1896) 118 N. C. 50.

A carpenter while engaged in making and placing a handle in a hand-car. Indiana, I. & I. R. Co. v. Snyder (1895) 140 Ind. 647.

Servant employed to inspect and keep machinery in good condition. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. McKee (1887) 37 Kan. 592; Jennings v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1895) 12 Misc. 408; Houston v. Brush (1894) 66 Vt. 331; Wells v. Coe (1886) 9 Colo. 159; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Mulligan (1895) 34 U. S. App. 1, 67 Fed. Rep. 569, 14 C. C. A. 547; Coontz v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1894) 121 Mo. 652.

A servant charged with duty of furnishing side stakes for a lumber car. Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1887) 107 N. Y. 374.

Car inspectors. Macy v. St. Paul & D. R. Co. (1886) 35 Minn. 200; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Pearcy (1891) 128 Ind. 197; Little Rock & M. R. Co. v. Moseley (1893) 12 U. S. App. 514, 56 Fed. Rep. 1009, 6 C. C. A. 225; Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. McMullen (1889) 117 Ind. 439; Missouri P. R. Co. v. Dwyer (1886) 36 Kan. 58; Carpenter v. Mexican Nat. R. Co. (1889) 39 Fed. Rep. 315; Cooper v. Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. (1884) 24 W. Va. 37; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Hilliard (1896) 18 Ky. L. Rep. 505; Long v. Pacific R. Co. (1877) 65 Mo. 225; Condon v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1883) 78 Mo. 567; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Reardon (1894) 56 Ill. App. 542; Brann v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1890) 53 Iowa, 595, 36 Am. Rep. 243; St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Putnam (1892) 1 Tex. Civ. App. 142.

The distinction has been taken that, where the relation sustained by a car inspector to car repairers is merely that of a foreman directing their labors, he is not a vice principal. Fordey v. Briney (1893) 58 Ark. 206. But the introduction here of the familiar rule that difference of rank has in itself no bearing upon the question whether an employee is a vice principal or not seems to be altogether out of place, and to have led the court to an erroneous conclusion.

It has also been held in Illinois, under the "consolation" theory, that car inspectors are not fellow servants of employees working on the trains. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Hoyt (1887) 122 Ill. 369; but this is a case in which the injury was received by the car inspector himself.

C. As dependent upon the distinction between the furnishing and the use of agencies.

See also X. 3, supra.

One line of distinction between vice principals and coemployees is in the duty, in one instance, to supply or maintain instrumentalities of the service, and in the other of using the instrumentalities supplied. Neuts v. Jackson Hill Coal & C. Co. (1894) 139 Ind. 411.

In the recent case of Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebrigsten (1894) 57 N. J. L. 402, the court observed that, "In determining whether an employee, through whose negligence defects in the machinery have failed of discovery or repair, is a representative of the master in the discharge of the master's duty to the servant, or is a fellow servant of the latter engaged in a common employment, many incongruous decisions have been rendered," and explained its own views as follows: "On this topic a rational distinction would seem to be that when the employee's duty to inspect or repair the apparatus is incidental to his duty to use the apparatus in the common employment, then he is not intrusted with the master's duty to his fellow servant, and the master is not responsible to his fellow servant for his fault, but that if the master has cast a duty of inspection or repair upon an employee who is not engaged in using the apparatus in a common employment with his fellow servant, then that employee in that duty represents the master, and the master is chargeable with his default. This distinction is noticeable in McAndrews v. Burns (1876) 30 N. J. L. 117; Smith v. Oxford Iron Co. (1880) 42 N. J. L. 467, 36 Am. Rep. 535; Collier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1886) 49 N. J. L. 59; Ross v. Walker, 139 Pa. 42; Moynihan v. Hills Co. (1888) 146 Mass. 586; Daley v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1888) 147 Mass. 101, and many other cases."

In other words, where the conditions from which the servant's injury resulted were produced by the ordinary use of the appliance, and not by any defect in the substance, size, or adjustment of the part of the appliance which caused the injury, and the master maintains a thorough and adequate system of constant inspection, and the defect was not known to any of the persons engaged in that inspection, no action can be maintained. Mensch v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1892) 150 Pa. 598, 17 L. R. A. 450.

This compromise is, of course, traceable in a large measure to the influence of the principle by which the servant is presumed to accept the obvious and ordinary risks of the employment. It is thought not to be unfair to charge him, the servant, with the consequences of his knowledge of the fact that small repairs and changes may be necessary in the ordinary routine of business, and that a certain amount of discretion must, in regard to such matters, be left to employees, who cannot be considered as being in any legitimate sense of the word representatives of the master.

The following decisions will show how the courts have interpreted the doctrine under a variety of circumstances.

Cases in which the distinction was referred to, and the employer held to be liable, are these:

A storekeeper who is charged with the duty of seeing that an apparatus is in good condition before it is delivered to the stevedores for use, but is not himself to be engaged in using it, is in that service the representative of the defendant, and is not serving in a common employment with the deceased. Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebrigsten (1894) 57 N. J. L. 402.

So, on the ground that it was not merely a case of "a defect arising in the daily use of an appliance, for which proper and suitable materials are supplied" (Cregan v. Marston (1891) 126 N. Y. 568, cited in this section d, infra), the owners of a brewery have been held liable for an injury to an employee caused by the fall of a beer keg through a run in which the kegs were lowered into a cellar, resulting from the rivet holes in the rods and brackets of the run becoming enlarged by use and rust, where the defect could have been discovered by proper examination and the employee was free from contributory negligence. Mayer v. Liebmann (1897) 16 App. Div. 54.

In Fox v. Le Comte (1896) 2 App. Div. 61, the court remarked: "As to the defendant's negligence, it is undisputed that if the plunger moved without pressure on the treadle, the press was defective. It was alleged that though this was the case the defendant had no knowledge of the fact. It was not necessary that the defendant should personally have such knowledge. The repair of the press was not a mere detail of the work, as in Webber v. Piper (1888) 109 N. Y. 496, but a part of the master's duty to use reasonable care to provide safe appliances for his servants. This duty was committed to the machinist, but, being the master's duty, the machinist in the discharge of it was not a coservant, but represented the master. For his neglect the master was liable."

"A machine may be so constructed, and its operation may be such, as to call for a frequent replacement of one or more of its constituent parts. Such parts when adjusted in the machine become as much a part of it as if included in the original construction, and a defect in one of them is a defect in the machine. The duty of seeing that such parts are not defective is one incumbent on the master. It is not a matter of ordinary repair from day to day, which may be intrusted to a servant. The defendant could not therefore avoid responsibility by delegating this duty to persons whom it believed to be competent, and who were in fact competent to perform it. If the injury to the plaintiff was due to a defect in the punch, which might have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable care on their part, but was not, the defendant is liable for their negligence." Toy v. United States Cartridge Co. (1893) 150 Mass. 313.

When a spur track is constructed for permanent use, it is an instrument for the use of those who conduct and manage the trains, and the liability of the master is referred to the principle that he cannot escape responsibility where it is his duty to supply suitable structures, instrumentalities, or appliances by proving that he delegated to a proper agent their construction, superintendence, or repairs, and not to the rule under which it is held, in regard to temporary stagings erected for the repair or completion of buildings, that if suitable workmen and materials are provided his obligation is discharged. Elmer v. Locke (1883) 135 Mass. 575.

In Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Echols (1897, Tex. Civ. App.) 41 S. W. 488, it was shown that a remnant stack of ties was liable to topple over and fall upon men at work which rendered the premises unsafe. The court said that "if, by the exercise of such care, its servants and agents charged with the duty of keeping the premises in a safe condition, knew or could have known of the dangerous condition in which the remnant stack of ties was left in time to have removed the danger, and failed to do so, the company would be liable."

The improper adjustment of a brake rod constitutes a "defective appliance," and not a mere "neglect or failure in the detail of the work" within the rule relating to the liability of the master for defects in appliances, where according to the regular course of the business, it was the duty of inspectors to make the adjustment, and not the duty of the train employees. Woods v. Long Island R. Co. (1896) 11 App. Div. 16.

In the following cases the employer was absolved:

Servants entrusted with the making of such ordinary repairs as the use of a machine requires to keep it in order from day to day are not vice principals. McGee v. Boston Cordage Co. (1886) 139 Mass. 445.

An employer owes one who is about to enter his service no duty to inspect all the work which has been done by his servants previously, and which ordinarily may be entrusted to them without liability to their fellow servants for their negligence. O'Connor v. Rich (1895) 164 Mass. 560, where the servant was injured by the fall of a scaffold erected by his fellow workmen a few days before he entered the service, from suitable materials supplied by the master.

Nor is a master chargeable with negligence because of a defect of which he had no knowledge, in a rope, used to steady a swinging scaffolding upon which his servants were working, where "he did not undertake to furnish the scaffolding as a complete structure, but entrusted the making of it to the servant" whose death was the result of such defect, and his fellow servants. Adasken v. Gilbert (1896) 165 Mass. 443.

In Albro v. Agawam Canal Co. (1850) 6 Cush. 75, the act of the superintendent which caused the injury did not relate to the maintenance of an appliance in safe condition, but to the improper use of an appliance which was not in any way defective.

An employer discharges his duty when he furnishes an abundance of materials from which his servants can select what they need for a scaffold. He is not required to supervise the selection of every piece of timber out of the mass for every purpose. Roas v. Walker (1890) 139 Pa. 42.

Inspection of an engine by the engineer in the ordinary operation of a railway is the act of a fellow servant as between the engineer and brakeman. McDonald v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1835, Mich.) 2 Det. L. N. 774.

A railroad company is not liable for injuries to a conductor from the turning of a loose step upon the engine, where the engineer was furnished with proper tools for its repair, and the company had no knowledge, actual or constructive, of its condition. Miller v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (1892) 90 Mich. 230.

As regards a mechanic working in the repairing of locomotives in a railroad shop, the negligence of the boiler-maker in failing to discover a defect in a boiler is that of a fellow servant, not of a vice principal. Murphy v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1882) 88 N. Y. 146, 42 Am. Rep. 240, Distinguishing Fuller v. Jewett (1890) 80 N. Y. 46, 38 Am. Rep. 575, as being a case where a locomotive had been placed for use in the hands of a servant in a different department.

Where a coal company receives cars to be loaded, and, owing to the defective condition of the brakes, and the want of the proper blocking, they escape from control while being let down to the place of loading, and cause injury to a servant of the company who is working on another car, the failure to inspect, to set brakes, or block the wheels, is negligence in the use of, and not in the supplying of, instrumentalities, and is consequently the negligence of fellow servants not of vice principals. Nantz v. Jackson Hill Coal & C. Co. (1894) 139 Ind. 411 (adopting a suggestion made in Cincinnati, H. & D. R. Co. v. McMullen (1889) 117 Ind. 439).

An employer is not chargeable with negligence for the failure of his foreman employed to superintend mason work to see that the check rope was attached to a derrick employed about the building. Jenkinson v. Carlin (1894) 10 Misc. 22.

An employer is not liable for the death of an employee caused by the breaking of a belt on a machine in charge of a fellow servant to whom the employer delegated the duty of inspection, and to whom other belts were supplied,—especially if the deceased knew that the belt in use was unsafe. Headifen v. Cooper (1893) 6 Misc. 263.

In Cregan v. Marston (1891) 126 N. Y. 568, where the controversy was as to whose duty it was to observe and examine the condition of a rope, and change it when so worn that it became unsafe, the court explained its position as follows: "It is conceded that the defendants kept on hand and ready for use at any moment, an adequate supply of these falls, and of the best and most approved character."

... If one was wanted, word was sent to the office and the new fall at once supplied for use at the dock. Usually the engineer or his assistant made the application, but anybody engaged in the work could give the notice and get the new fall. It does not appear that any such application coming from any of the workmen was ever unheeded or refused. The workmen, therefore, were left in a position of perfect safety as to the sufficiency of the falls against everything save their own negligence or error of judgment. The rope was swinging before their eyes, and would disclose its approaching weakness on the surface before it became rotten or pulpy within, and they were able to know how long it had been used, and so whether prudence required it to be changed. They were at liberty, and knew they were at liberty, to supplant one which exhibited marks of weakness with another both new and sufficient, from the supply kept on hand. They were in the daily habit of observing its condition, and it was specially the custom of the engineer to do so. He had examined it a day or two before the accident and deemed it safe." On this state of facts it was held that the negligence of the engineer, if it existed, was not that of the master.

In Strourbridge v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 129, the master procured the timber for a structure from a reputable dealer; as a "lot" or quantity of it was good, but some of the sticks were found defective, or with curls in them. It was therefore necessary to test the timber so that knots or curls should be cut off or rejected. With respect to this test, the court said: "We think that the master discharged its duty when it supplied a sufficient quantity of proper and suitable material; that the choice of material, the selection of sound beams, the rejection of such beams or parts as were defective, work necessarily involved in the erection of structures of wood, were details of the work and strictly the duty of the fellow servants. (Webber v. Piper (1888) 109 N. Y. 496; Butler v. Townsend (1891) 126 N. Y. 105; Cregan v. Marston (1891) 126 N. Y. 568; Mahoney v. Vacuum Oil Co. (1894) 76 Hun, 579; Smith v. Empire Transp. Co. (1895) 89 Hun, 588.) It is here that the vital distinction occurs between the question of a place to work and that of a part of the work itself; a question of liability to employees who might use the structure when built and the liability to those engaged in building it. It may well be that, after the construction of the trolley carrier, the defendant would be liable to any lineman who might be injured from its defective condition, whether occasioned by the negligence of the employees who put up the structure or those who selected the materials. Such rule does not apply to the plaintiff."

The rule that a servant has a right to rely on his employer's having examined the place where he is put to work has no application to a case where a servant is sent into a room on the day of the explosion of a flywheel to clear away the ruins. Kans v. Page (1897) 168 Mass. 217. The court said: "There are many momentary dangers which, though hidden, it is impracticable to guard against by inspection, and for which on this ground the employer is held not liable. Whittaker v. Bent (1897) 167 Mass. 588. There are others which, even if permanent conditions of the business, are obvious without warning, and of which the workmen must take the risk if he accepts employment there. Leary v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1885) 139 Mass. 580, 587, 52 Am. Rep. 733; O'Maley v. South Boston Gaslight Co. (1893) 158 Mass. 135. There are others which are both transitory and obvious, or at least equally easy to be discovered by employer and employed. When a room has been shattered by an explosion, it is plain to everybody that things are not in their normal condition, that the usual support of part by part has been shaken or interfered with, and that some portion may have been weakened to the point of being ready to fall. If the explosion was of an iron wheel, it is plain that the fragments probably have flown in different directions, and that they may have lodged above or below. When a workman is sent into such a room on the day of the explosion to clear away the ruins, it is manifest that he is taking one of the steps which are necessary to disclose just what has happened. It is not a natural inference on the part of one so sent that the place has been inspected, and it is not a natural interpretation of the offer to take it as implying that the superior knows that it is safe. Such an inference and interpretation are not based on the experience of life; they are mere deductions from the letter of an inaccurately stated rule of duty assumed beforehand to cover the case. Someone must be first in the place of possible danger. The workman sent in to clean it up has no right to assume that he is not the first, nor is the employer bound in formal language to notify him that no one as yet has made certain that nothing will give way."

It is upon the distinction between the maintenance and the use of appliances that those cases hinge which involve the liability of railway companies for injuries caused by the improper loading of their cars.

It has been held that a railway company is liable for an injury to a brakeman caused by his being thrown off the car and under the wheels by the negligent loading of smokestacks on such car by a station agent intrusted with such loading, where the brakeman was not guilty of negligence contributing to the injury. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Seeley (1894) 54 Kan. 21. The court said: "An authority is cited to the effect that, where the company has employed a competent inspector to see that the cars are properly loaded and in good condition, it cannot be held liable for the negligence of the inspector in failing to observe that the car was improperly loaded. (Dewey v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. (1893) 97 Mich. 343, 16 L. R. A. 342.) This authority is not satisfactory to us nor in line with the decisions that have been cited. We are unable to see any reason for a distinction between the preparation and inspection of the car itself as a fit instrumentality to be placed in a train and the preparation and inspection of a loaded car to be placed in the train for transportation. Each is an instrumentality to be used in connection with the services necessary to be performed by the trainmen in its transportation, and no distinction between them is seen, so far as the obligation of the company or the safety of the employees engaged in handling it are concerned. The inspection in either case is made with reference to the same end, and the person to whom this duty is delegated stands in the place of the company, and the latter is responsible for his acts."

But this decision is opposed to the weight of authority.

The subject was elaborately discussed in Byrnes v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1889) 113 N. Y. 251, where the court said: "We think the defendant had fulfilled its duty to the servants in its employ when it furnished a perfectly safe car and appliances, and when it also provided a system of inspection of cars, and proper persons to inspect them after they were loaded and before they were taken away. The failure to inspect, or, if inspection were made, the failure to rectify the improper loading by which the brake was rendered useless, was not the failure of the master to fulfil his duty to his servant, but it was the negligence of a co-servant in carrying out the orders of the master. The master is not an insurer that all his servants shall perform their duty, and he performs his duty to the servant in this regard in providing a system of inspection and intrusting its performance to competent hands. If, thereafter, such servants are guilty of negligence, the master is not responsible therefor to a co-servant. We do not see that the question is in any way altered by the fact that the car was loaded by the servants of the owner of the lumber which was placed upon it. Whoever loaded it, the master had provided for an inspection of the car before it was to be taken away, and if the inspection were neglected, it was still the same neglect of a servant of the defendant to do that which he ought to have done, and such neglect was not that of the master in fulfilling any of the duties which he owed as master to his servants. It cannot, we think, be properly contended that the master fails to provide a car which is a safe and proper one, or that he fails to provide one with proper appliances, because through the negligent manner in which the car is loaded the appliance is, on that account only, made useless for the purpose for which it was intended." Ruger, Ch. J., and Andrews and Danforth, JJ., dissented, the latter on the ground that when the car was furnished the deceased, it was a loaded, not an empty car, and at that moment the movement of the brake was obstructed, and therefore the car was imperfect, and unfit for use.

This case was cited in approval and a similar ruling made, in Dewey v. Detroit, G. H. & M. R. Co. 97 Mich. 323, 22 L. R. A. 292, Rev'g on rehearing (1893) 97 Mich. 343, 16 L. R. A. 342, (McGrath, J., dissenting). At the first hearing the majority had taken the ground that the duty of inspection went to the extent contended for by the plaintiff, and that Smith v. Potter (1881) 46 Mich. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 161, holding that a car inspector and a brakeman were fellow servants, had been overruled by Irvine v. Flint & P. M. R. Co. (1891) 89 Mich. 419, where it was held that it was as much the duty of a railway company to see that the cars are so loaded that brakemen will have reasonably safe access to the brakes as it is to see that proper appliances are provided. The further statement that an inspector provided in pursuance of the obligation would be a fellow servant was thought to be erroneous. Other cases relied upon by the majority of the judges were Van Dusen v. Letellier (1889) 73 Mich. 492, where it was held that a lumber manufacturer could not escape the responsibility for making proper inspection of the structures on which the lumber was piled by delegating the duty to an employee, and Morton v. Detroit, B. C. & A. R. Co. (1890) 81 Mich. 423, where the duty to inspect the parts of cars was held to be non-assignable. The minority drew a distinction between the duty of furnishing a safe place and safe machinery, and the duty of seeing that the appliances are properly used, and considered that the duty of seeing that a car is properly loaded came under the latter head. "The injury" said Montgomery, J. (see p. 347 of the report), "resulted not from any fault in the appliances used, but because in making use of suitable cars and machinery, a fellow servant neglected his duty." The view of the minority prevailed upon the subsequent hearing of the case. The court said (see p. 332 of the report): "The real point in controversy here is whether the duty of the master is to be extended so that he may be made liable for the neglect of a car inspector in not observing that a car is improperly loaded when it is to be put into the train for transportation. There is no complaint here about the car itself. It was proper in construction, and a safe car for use in that service. Upon the first argument of the case in this court the real point in controversy was not so fully pointed out and considered as upon the reargument, and the case was regarded as very similar in principle to Smith v. Potter (1881) 46 Mich. 238, 41 Am. Rep. 161, which Mr. Justice McGrath considered as virtually overruled by the later cases cited above. There is, however, a broad distinction between Smith v. Potter and the present case. In the former case, the injury complained of was received by reason of a defect in the framework of the car itself, while here the accident is attributable to improper loading. In the later decisions the doctrine of Smith v. Potter has been doubted, and the rule broadly stated that the master must furnish to the servant a safe place to work, and safe appliances to work with. . . . But, in regard to the proper loading of cars, quite a different rule must necessarily prevail. The master must undoubtedly exercise care in the selection of inspectors to see that cars are not improperly loaded or overburdened, so that they are dangerous to an employee, but, after this has been done, it cannot be claimed that the master is to be held responsible for the faithful performance of the inspector's duty. Any other rule than this would make railroad companies insurers of the lives and limbs of employees. In the present case, the projection of the lumber over the end of the car was as apparent to the brakeman, if he had taken precaution to make observation, as to an inspector. It requires no special skill or training to ascertain the fact. The duties of a brakeman are known to be dangerous, and when one enters such service he must be held to have assumed the risks of the employment. He must exercise care himself in going between moving cars to make couplings."

The opinion at the first hearing, which was thus reversed was written by McGrath, J., who also composed an elaborate dissenting opinion after the second hearing. Some extracts from the latter may with advantage be given to indicate the arguments adduced to 41 L. R. A.

support the view which was finally rejected. The learned judge said: "The duty of inspecting the car itself, and that of the inspection of its condition with its load upon it, have a common origin. Both spring from the duty of protection which the master owes to the servant. There is no ground for saying that one of these duties may be delegated so as to relieve the master from all liability, and that the other may not; nor is there any reason in saying that the person who inspects the car itself, its appliances, and, instrumentalities, with reference to the safety of those engaged in its transportation, is not a fellow servant, while he who inspects the loaded car for a like purpose, and to see whether it affords proper facilities for the performance of the duties which must necessarily be performed in its transportation, is a fellow servant. In the present case, both duties were delegated to the same person, both are performed with reference to the same end, and the person to whom delegated must be held in the performance of each to occupy the same relation to plaintiff and defendant. It certainly cannot be said that, with reference to stationed machinery, belting, shafting, and gearing, the master must, at his peril, provide the necessary guards and coverings, and arrange the surroundings so as to render the place reasonably safe, yet, as to a train of cars, between which a brakeman is required, in the ordinary discharge of his duties, to go, while one section is being driven against a standing section or car so loaded as to render the position of the brakeman one of greatly increased hazard to life or limb, the master may, in case of injury, escape liability. The employment is at best a dangerous one. It is as essential to the protection of the brakeman that these spaces be kept clear as that the spaces be provided. This danger can be guarded against. As is said by Mr Justice Long, in Palmer v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1891) 87 Mich. 290: 'In all cases where the danger can be readily guarded against, the employer is in duty bound to protect the employee at his peril.'

Indianapolis & St. L. R. Co. v. Johnson (1885) 102 Ind. 352, is another authority for the principle that negligent loading is merely the improper use of appliances.

In Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1889) 117 N. Y. 638, the employees who had loaded cars were held to be fellow servants of a switchman who was injured by a piece of timber which fell from one of them; but on a subsequent appeal the plaintiff was permitted to recover on the ground that it had not established proper rules prescribing the manner in which cars should be loaded with lumber.

Where an express rule of the company makes it the duty of conductors to see that cars are properly loaded an injury which results from improper loading is deemed to be caused by the fault of a fellow servant. Jarman v. Chicago & G. T. R. Co. (1893) 98 Mich. 135.

The duty of a station agent to see that a car is properly loaded before it is ordered into a train is a duty which he owes as a servant merely, and not as a vice principal. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Farmer (1889) 73 Tex. 85.

The New York and Michigan rule was applied to the case of foreign cars, in Mexican C. R. Co. v. Shean (1891, Tex.) 18 S. W. 151.

In some cases an attempt has been made to extend the operation of the principle laid down in these cases so as to exempt the company from liability for its failure to exercise a proper supervision in regard to the condition of the side stakes furnished to secure a load, but this theory has been rejected.

In Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1885) 37 Hun, 104, it was argued by the defendant's counsel that as car stakes are uniformly furnished by the shipper, the defendant was under no obligation in respect to them, except to inspect them, and that that duty was performed in the present case; but the court held that the defendant could not divert itself of the duty it owed to its employees by leaving that duty to be performed by the shipper, or by making an arrangement with him whereby he undertook to perform it. This view was adopted by the court of appeals in (1887) 107 N. Y. 374. Panforth, J., remarking, the defect complained of was not in the loading, but in the preparation of the car to receive the load,—that is, in the car as a "lumber car."

"In the case of a low-sided gondola car employed in the transportation of lumber, side standards to keep the load in place, whether such standards are for constant use and permanently attached to the car by chains or are unattached and intended for use on a single occasion, are appliances necessary for the proper equipment of the car, and as essential to the safe transportation of the load as is a proper car-body. These side standards to all intents and purposes are part of the car." Pennsylvania R. Co. v. La Rue (1897) 55 U. S. App. 20, 81 Fed. Rep. 148, Approving Bushby v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1887) 107 N. Y. 374, and Distinguishing Byrnes v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1889) 113 N. Y. 251, and Ford v. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. (1889) 117 N. Y. 638, as cases in which the fault was not in the character of the car or its appliances, but wholly in the negligent loading of the car by the defendant's servants. Dallas, J., dissented on the ground that the case was one where the company had done its whole duty by supplying standards of the right kind and in sufficient quantity, and was not responsible for the act of a coemployee in using those of the weaker description of timbers at the place where the pressure was unusually great.

Compare also McIntyre v. Boston & M. R. Co. (1895) 163 Mass. 189, where the defendant was held liable for defective side stakes, the court saying: "The case is not one where an implement designed for repeated use has been weakened and made unfit for further service by such use; it is rather the case of the furnishing of an implement never fit for use, and evidently unfit. Such a stake could not, without negligence, have been placed where stakes were kept to be used for the purpose to which this was put. We need not inquire whether, if it had been taken from a number of sound and suitable stakes provided for that purpose by a workman whose duty it was to equip the car, the careless taking of this stake would have been negligence of a fellow workman the risk of which the plaintiff must stand, or whether negligence in equipping the car with stakes is something for which the defendant is responsible, whether it intrusts the work to one person or another."

Cases involving injuries from the improper loading of cars often turn upon the question whether the servant assumed the risk as one of those ordinarily incident to the service. With these we are not concerned in this note.

In other cases the liability of a railroad company for injuries caused by foreign cars so loaded that the freight upon them projects over the ends has been referred to the consideration whether it is negligence to receive into a train cars loaded in this manner.

In one case the ground has been taken that its acceptance is merely a fact bearing upon 41 L. R. A.

the question of the company's negligence. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Gower (1886) 85 Tenn. 473. In another it has been held that the court may pronounce the company, as a matter of law, not to be guilty of negligence in exposing a servant to a risk of this character. Northern C. R. Co. v. Husson (1882) 101 Pa. 1, 47 Am. Rep. 630; Day v. Toledo, C. S. & D. R. Co. (1880) 42 Mich. 523.

It would appear, however, that the responsibility of the company cannot be made to turn on the consideration here relied upon without entertaining a theory of the legal situation which is essentially unlike that of the cases which discuss that responsibility from the special standpoint of a duty to ascertain the condition of the foreign cars which the servants are required to handle and test the right to maintain an action by an examination of the question whether that duty is assignable or absolute. This question can only be material when it has been determined that there has been a breach of duty.

XII. Employer's liability qualified by the servant's duty to acquaint himself with his environment.

a. Generally.

In the earliest of the cases upon the liability of an employer for injuries received by a servant, it was emphatically declared that "the mere relation of the master and the servant never can imply an obligation on the part of the master to take more care of the servant than he may reasonably be expected to do of himself," and the decision was based to a large extent upon the fact that, in employments like the one in question, which did not involve the use of any complicated instrumentalities, "the plaintiff must have known as well as his master, or probably better," whether he would be exposed to any danger. Priestley v. Fowler (1837) 2 Mees. & W. 1, Murph. & H. 305, 1 Jur. 387.

To these principles the courts, both of England and the United States, have ever since steadily adhered, such divergencies of view as are disclosed by the actual decisions being due entirely to the differences of opinion which must inevitably arise in practically determining the extent of the responsibility thus cast upon the servant.

The right of the servant to rely on the master's having performed his duty is qualified by the principle which requires the servant to exercise a vigilance and care corresponding to the exigencies of the situation in which he is placed by his employment. No instruction can be complained of which sets this mixture of rights and obligations with reasonable clearness before the jury. Northern P. R. Co. v. Everett (1894) 152 U. S. 107, 88 L. ed. 373.

The duty of a servant to use proper care may exhibit itself under several aspects. At present we are concerned only with one, viz., that which it assumes when it is considered as the source of the special obligation of the servant to be reasonably vigilant in observing his surroundings to the end that he may ascertain whether any of the instrumentalities which he is required to use or to which he is brought into proximity while engaged in his work, are in an abnormal condition and therefore likely to injure him. The existence of this obligation enables a master who continued to use a defective instrumentality after he knew, or ought to have known, of its condition to excuse himself, under appropriate circumstances, by one of these three defenses:

- (1) That the servant's injury is traceable to his having failed to use his faculties of observation in the manner in which a prudent man would have used them under the circumstances, to the end that he might ascertain whether there were any imperfections in his master's instrumentalities. (2) That his injury was proximately caused by his failure to adopt, at the moment when the accident occurred, the course which a prudent man would have selected. (3) That having the opportunity of obtaining knowledge of some particular danger, and being thus chargeable in law with the responsibility attaching to the possession of actual knowledge, he accepted the increased risks, such acceptance being referable either to the implied terms of the contract of service, or to the operation of the maxim, Volenti non fit injuria.

A complete review of the decisions which exemplify these three defenses would carry us beyond the scope of the present note. But the effect of the servant's duty to exercise the care appropriate to his position is a matter which is so closely interlaced with the subject we are discussing that some allusion to it seems to be necessary for the purpose of making the position of the employer perfectly plain.

Obviously the servant's duty to keep himself acquainted with his environment may be made the basis, either of a theory that the master was not negligent in being ignorant of the existence of the danger from which the injury resulted (see XII., b, 8, infra), or of a theory that, although the master may have been negligent in the premises, the servant's conduct has been such as to debar him from relying on that negligence as a cause of action.

The first of these positions is illustrated by the cases which proceed upon the hypothesis that a temporary want of knowledge on the master's part may be innocent, where it concerns those abnormal conditions which suddenly arise in the everyday use of the instrumentalities, and which could not be guarded against without imposing on him the unreasonably onerous obligation of supervising those instrumentalities at every single moment they are in use. Assuming that the imperfection was one which was open to the observation of a person in the servant's position provided he had used ordinary care, the duty to notice it must clearly have arisen in his case before it can be said to attach to the master at all, and if that duty was not discharged, he, and not the master, must be regarded as the derelict party.

A servant cannot continue to use a machine which he knows to be dangerous at the risk of his employer. Dynen v. Leach (1857) 28 L. J. Exch. N. S. 221, per Pollock, C. B.

"The duty which the master owes to his servants is to provide them with safe tools and machinery where that is necessary. When he does this, he does not, however, engage that they will always continue in the same condition. Any defect which may become apparent in their use it is the duty of the servant to observe and report to his employer. The servant has the means of discovering any such defect which the master does not possess." Baker v. Allegheny R. Co. (1880) 95 Pa. 211, 40 Am. Rep. 634.

Where the defect in the machine or other appliances from which the danger arises is of such a character, or occurs at such a time, that the employer cannot reasonably be expected to have knowledge thereof, it is the duty of the employee to give him notice, and the neglect of such duty exempts the employer from responsibility. Patterson v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. (1874) 78 Pa. 389, 394, 18 Am. Rep. 412.

For instance, an electric-light company is not liable for an injury to an employee caused by the breaking of an electric-light pole, where such breaking was due to a fracture of the pole shortly before the accident, while the employee was taking it down preparatory to setting it up in another place, of which fracture the employee did not inform the company. Essex County Electric Co. v. Kelly (1894) 57 N. J. L. 100.

Of course, the servant cannot be debarred from maintaining an action on the ground that he did not report a defect, except where he is also chargeable with a knowledge of that defect. Dale v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. (1878) 63 Mo. 459.

A mine owner who goes on using a hoisting rope with full knowledge that it is defective cannot escape liability to a miner who is injured by its giving way, on the ground that the plaintiff failed to give information as to its condition, when he had only been in the defendant's employ for twenty days, and the proof shows that the defects could not have been detected by ordinary observation. Perry v. Ricketts (1870) 55 Ill. 234.

Original fault on the master's part may also be negated by the fact that a servant of skill and experience in some particular occupation did not suppose himself to be imperiled by the existence of the conditions which ultimately developed the specific danger which caused his injury. Thus, the owner of a mine is not liable for the death of an experienced miner in its employ caused by the caving in of a shaft while sinking it, where such shaft was at the time only 12 feet deep, and the former, on being informed that the shaft needed timbering, immediately began to place the timber, which was being done when the injury occurred. Stiles v. Kichle (1896) 8 Colo. App. 393. There, in order to negative in advance the defense of contributory negligence, the following peculiar allegation was inserted in the complaint: "That at the time deceased was killed as aforesaid, he thought, and any man of ordinary prudence, with the knowledge the deceased had of the ground he was working in, would have thought, that said shaft could be timbered before it would cave in." The court commented upon the averment as follows: "If such was the conclusion of an experienced miner, who had done the work, and would have been the conclusion of any man of 'ordinary prudence,' how could defendants be charged with negligence, and made liable for failing to exercise extraordinary and prophetic prudence previous to the preceding Friday? It is clear beyond controversy that deceased had greater knowledge of the shaft and the character of the ground than Hook could have had, and that deceased, a practical miner of years, possessed of all knowledge that could be obtained, voluntarily prosecuted the work and incurred the risk incident to the employment."

Compare the cases cited at the end of XII. b, 8, infra.

To this principle there is, of course, the important limitation that the opinion of an experienced servant that there was no danger will not excuse the master, if he has omitted to provide an adequate system of inspection. The gist of the action is, then, not the master's failure to ascertain the existence of the particular danger which caused the injury, but his failure to exercise a proper supervision over the conduct of his business.

In O'Driscoll v. Faxón (1892) 156 Mass. 527, the defendant contended that, upon the whole evidence, no want of due care on his part was shown; and in support of this view it is urged that no notice was given to him that the bank was dangerous, that the plaintiff and his witnesses did not regard it as dangerous; that if the plaintiff, with his experience, was not guilty of carelessness in failing to anticipate that earth from the bank might fall upon the plaintiff, and that, if the cutting of the bank was such as to cause no reasonable apprehension of danger, then the falling of the earth was a mere accident. The court said: "We thing the jury might be allowed to take a broader view of the defendant's responsibility. The duty rested upon him of using reasonable care in providing a safe place for the masons to do their work in building the wall, and the jury might hold him bound to use reasonable care to guard against accidents which at the moment of their occurrence a workman might not anticipate, though himself in the exercise of reasonable care under the circumstance in which he was placed. (Holden v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1880) 129 Mass. 268, 276, 37 Am. Rep. 843; Ryan v. Tarbox (1883) 135 Mass. 207; Elmer v. Locke (1883) 135 Mass. 575.) There was some evidence tending to show that the general plan which was adopted for protecting the bank from falling was inadequate. If the jury were of opinion that it was so, and that the defendant failed to use reasonable care in making it safe against accidents, they might lawfully hold him responsible to one who was himself in the exercise of due care at the time of the injury. Such seems to have been the view taken by the jury, and we cannot say, upon the evidence, that it was the duty of the presiding justice to withdraw the case from their consideration."

The second position, however, is the one which is most frequently taken up in actions of this type. Its rationale, and the various circumstances to which it is appropriate, are sufficiently illustrated by the rulings which are cited for another purpose in the following section.

b. Obligations of the master and servant as to inspection compared.

The principles upon which we have been dwelling are applicable only to cases in which the defect was one which the servant ought, as a careful man, to have observed. In practice, therefore, they are restricted by the important rule which declares that a servant is not ordinarily required to make a detailed examination of his master's instrumentalities, nor to take notice of any defects which would not be apparent to one who usually has neither time nor opportunity for more than a casual hurried glance at the instrumentalities in the condition of which he is interested, and who is entitled to rely on the master's having adequately discharged his duty of inspection.

The cases in which this rule has been stated and applied are very numerous. For the purposes of this note the following will suffice to indicate its scope and effect:

1. General statements of principles involved.

"It is, in most cases, impossible that a workman can judge of the condition of a complex and dangerous machine, wielding irresistible mechanical power, and, if he could, he is quite incapable of estimating the degree of risk involved in different conditions of the machine; but the master may be able, and generally is able, to estimate both." Clarke v. Holmes (1862) 7 Hurlst. & N. 937, 948, 31 L. J. Exch. N. 41 L. R. A.

S. 356, 8 Jur. N. S. 992, 10 Week. Rep. 406, per Byles, J.

It is not the business of the servant nor has he the means of ascertaining whether the machinery or structure on which he is employed to work is defective. Porter v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1895) 60 Mo. 160.

The duty of inspection is by law imposed upon the master. He is under obligation to search for and discover, if discoverable by proper examination, those things which are hidden from even the careful observation of the servant in the discharge of his ordinary duties. As to those hidden or concealed defects, master and servant are not upon an equality of obligation. The master must search diligently; the servant observe carefully. Pennsylvania Co. v. Witte (1896) 15 Ind. App. 583, citing Wabash & W. R. Co. v. Morgan (1892) 132 Ind. 430 and 444; Linton Coal & Min. Co. v. Persons (1894) 11 Ind. App. 264; Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Quinn (1896) 14 Ind. App. 554; Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Woodward (1894) 9 Ind. App. 169; Salem Stone & Lime Co. v. Tepps (1894) 10 Ind. App. 516.

The servant's duty to use "reasonable care" does not cast upon him the duty to discover latent defects. Wabash & W. R. Co. v. Morgan (1892) 132 Ind. 430.

"We think it equally well settled that it is not incumbent upon the employee to search for latent defects in machinery or implements furnished him by the employer, but that without such investigation he has the right to assume that they are safe and sufficient for the purpose." Porter v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1879) 71 Mo. 66, 38 Am. Rep. 454, citing Lewis v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. (1875) 59 Mo. 506, 21 Am. Rep. 385; Porter v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1875) 60 Mo. 100; Gibson v. Pacific R. Co. (1870) 46 Mo. 163, 2 Am. Rep. 497; Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1872) 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 598; Snow v. Housatonic R. Co. (1864) 8 Allen, 441, 85 Am. Dec. 720.

"It is the duty of the master, not of the servant, to exercise due care and diligence to ascertain whether the appliances furnished are safe and suitable: a servant has a right to assume, without inquiry or examination, that the appliances furnished to him are safe and suitable." Lasure v. Grantville Mfg. Co. (1882) 18 S. C. 231, Approved in Carter v. Oliver Oil Co. (1890) 34 S. C. 211.

"An employee is required to observe and avoid all known or obvious perils, even though they may arise from defective machinery and appliances; but he is not bound to search for defects, or make a critical inspection of the appliances which are provided for his use. These are duties of the employer, who is required, not only to furnish reasonably safe and suitable tools and machinery, but to exercise such a continuing supervision over them, by such reasonably careful and skilful inspection and repair, as will keep the implements which employees are required to use in such a condition as not necessarily to expose them to unknown and extraordinary hazards." Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Pearcy (1891) 128 Ind. 197; Little Rock, M. R. & T. R. Co. v. Leverett (1886) 48 Ark. 333.

"The servant has a right to presume on the master's compliance with the obligations implied by the contract between them, and the real question in reference to a particular case is whether the servant has had equal opportunities with his employer to observe the defects in the machinery or materials, and, having such opportunities, intends to waive any objection to them." Dale v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. (1876) 63 Mo. 459.

"The employee must also exercise ordinary care in the use of appliances. The difference in the duty of the master and servant is, the master is bound to look for defects, while the servant is bound only to discover what the ordinary use of the appliance would make known to a man of ordinary prudence. The master is held to know the defect, if by the exercise of ordinary care he might know it. The servant has a right to assume that the master has furnished him safe machinery, unless its condition is such that by the exercise of ordinary care he would have discovered its defects." Gutridge v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1891) 105 Mo. 526.

"Unless the defects are such as to be obvious and open to common observation to anyone giving attention to the duties of the occasion, the employee has the right to assume that the employer has performed his duty in respect to the implements and machinery furnished." Carpenter v. Mexican Nat. R. Co. (1889) 39 Fed. Rep. 315.

"The master and servant do not necessarily stand upon an equal footing in this regard (the knowledge of dangers). The servant, although a man of ordinary prudence, as well as experience, may be quite incapable of appreciating the degree of risk involved in the use of a certain kind of machinery, while the master may be and generally is. It is the master's duty to inform himself in that regard, for on him is involved the duty of exercising ordinary care to supply safe instrumentalities to his servant; whereas, the latter has a right to assume, in the absence of notice to the contrary, or of something to put him on inquiry, that the master has performed his duty, and hence, to a certain extent to rely on the superior judgment of his master." Russell v. Minneapolis & St. L. R. Co. (1884) 82 Minn. 230.

"These extra hazards, which result from the master's failure to perform his duties to his employees, do not come within the risks which the latter assume as a part of their contract of service. For all such extra hazards resulting in injury to the servant, which are not obvious, and of which the servant has no notice, the master is liable. And in such case, it is no answer to an action to say, as is alleged here, that the plaintiff might, by the exercise of proper diligence, have ascertained if the defendant was conducting his business in disregard of a positive duty which he owed the plaintiff as his servant." United States Rolling Stock Co. v. Wilder (1888) 116 Ill. 100.

"The burden of furnishing safe machinery, appliances, surroundings, etc., is upon the master, and while the master is not to be held liable for defects and dangers of which the servant is fully informed, yet the servant is authorized to rely upon the acts of the master in that respect, and is under no primary obligation to investigate and test the fitness and safety of the machinery, surroundings, etc., in the absence of notice that there is something wrong in that respect." Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hines (1890) 132 Ill. 169.

"While it is true that both master and servant will be held to know that which by the exercise of reasonable diligence they might have learned, still this rule does not by any means place the master and servant upon equality as to the acts necessary to constitute diligence. He is not bound to search for defects, or make a critical inspection of the appliances which are provided for his use. These are duties of the employer." Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Woodward (1894) 9 Ind. App. 169.

"While the employer may expect that an employee will be vigilant to observe, and that he will be on the alert to avoid all known and obvious perils, even though they may arise from defective tools and machinery (Atlas Engine Works v. Randall (1885) 100 Ind. 293, 50 Am. Rep. 798), yet the latter is not bound to search for defects, or inspect the appliances furnished him, to see whether or not there are latent imperfections in or about them which render their use more hazardous. These are duties of the master, and unless the defects are such as to be obvious to any one giving attention to the duties of the occasion, the employee has a right to assume that the employer has performed his duty in respect to the implements and machinery furnished." Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Buck (1889) 116 Ind. 566, 2 L. R. A. 520.

"A servant is expected to observe such objects only, in the absence of notice, as would in an instant convince him of their danger." Johnston v. Oregon Short Line R. Co. (1892) 23 Or. 94.

If an appliance has just been inspected the obligation of the servant to examine it may be said to reach a vanishing point. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Kneilm (1894) 152 Ill. 458.

A verdict for plaintiff is proper, where there is evidence that a defect is one which would not have been discovered by simply using the defective appliance, but that it could and would have been discovered by an examination made by a competent person. Nichols v. Crystal Plate Glass Co. (1894) 126 Mo. 55.

Compare also, as illustrative of the same general principle, Ryan v. Fowler (1862) 24 N. Y. 410, 82 Am. Dec. 315; James v. Emmet Mining Co. (1894) 55 Mich. 335; Boyce v. Fitzpatrick (1861) 80 Ind. 526; Nord Deutscher Lloyd S. S. Co. v. Ingebregeten (1894) 57 N. J. L. 401; Faren v. Sellers (1887) 39 La. Ann. 1017; *St. Louis, Ft. S. & W. R. Co. v. "The servant is especially entitled to assume that his master had furnished him with suitable and safe materials, machinery, and surroundings, and relieved him of investigation and inquiry in that regard, where the performance of his duties requires constancy of attention to other matters. A man whose attention is constantly directed to moving cars, and their coupling, cannot possibly give much attention to the ties, switch-bars, etc., over which he may, from time to time, have to pass." Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hines (1890) 132 Ill. 169.

The limits of the principle are sufficiently indicated by such statements as these:

"The statement that the servant is under no primary obligation to investigate and test the fitness and safety of the machinery, surroundings, etc., in the absence of notice of defects, is very good law in a proper case. This proposition is not applicable, however, to the case of one who has been in the employment of his master for such a length of time as to require him, in the exercise of ordinary prudence, to take some notice of his surroundings. A man cannot decline to see, and then hold the master liable, excusing his own negligence by saying that he was under no primary obligation to investigate." Illinois C. R. Co. v. Sanders (1894) 58 Ill. App. 117.

"It is a fair presumption, not only that men take the risks of their employment, but that they are competent to keep themselves out of manifest and unnecessary exposure to danger. It is argued that the storm made the situation one of unprecedented peril to Nye and his fellows, and the court therefore could not say, as matter of law, that the railroad owed no unusual duty for the protection of its employees. But the situation was no more unprecedented for one than for the other, and the danger, though greater in degree, was no different in kind from that under ordinary circumstances, and the more manifest the danger the more the employer was entitled to rely on the presumption that the employee would not unnecessarily incur it." Nye v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1896) 178 Pa. 134.

2. Statements of the general rule with reference to particular instrumentalities.

The following additional passages from the opinions of the courts will be useful as showing the concrete operation of the general principles laid down above:

"Of the master is required a care and diligence in the preparation and subsequent inspection of such a place as a room in a mine that is not in the first instance demanded of the servant. The former must watch, inspect, and care for the slopes through which and in which the servant works as a person charged with the duty of keeping them reasonably safe would do. The latter has a right to presume when directed to work in a particular place, that the master has performed his duty, and to proceed with his work in reliance upon this assumption, unless a reasonably prudent and intelligent man, in the performance of his work as a miner would have learned facts from as a miner, would have learned facts from himself. . . . The degrees of care required of the master and servant also differ because defects in a piece of machinery or in the roof of a mine that to the eye of a competent inspector, such as the master employs, portend unnecessary and unreasonable risks and great danger may have no such significance to a laborer or miner who has had no experience in watching or caring for machinery or roofs of slopes in a mine, and the latter is not chargeable with contributory negligence simply because he sees or knows the defects unless a reasonably intelligent and prudent man would, under like circumstances, have known or apprehended the risks which those defects indicate." Union P. R. Co. v. Jarvi (1892) 10 U. S. App. 439, 53 Fed. Rep. 65, 3 C. C. A. 433.

"A person when employed and instructed to commence work at a particular place . . . is under no obligation, in order to protect himself from the charge of contributory negligence, to first go all through the building, and make himself familiar with each piece of machinery, and the danger he may incur in case he comes in contact with it in its then condition. It is sufficient for him that in entering upon the active discharge of the duties assigned him, he ascertains what he is expected to do, and the dangers directly connected therewith, and he has a right to assume that in the performance of that particular duty, reasonable facilities therefor will be afforded him, without coming in contact with other unforeseen or unsuspected dangers." Swobda v. Ward (1879) 40 Mich. 423.

"A servant when he goes upon the roof of a building as an employee of his master, to work thereon, has a right to assume, without particular investigation or inquiry into the fact, that the master has exercised due care and caution in the erection of the building, and has omitted the performance of any duty in respect thereto which should have been observed by an ordinarily careful and prudent man." Diamond State Iron Co. v. Giles (1887) 7 Houst. (Del.) 557.

In Dale v. St. Louis, K. C. & N. R. Co. (1876) 63 Mo. 459, the proof was that the plaintiff was a fireman, and the extent of his knowledge as to the existence of danger was that, in passing over the section of the road on which the accident ultimately occurred, he had observed that it was a rough part of the track, and that the rails were short, and had inferred that it was a bad track from the bumping of the cars in passing over it. The court refused to absolve the company, saying: "No particular inspection of the track was ever made by him nor any report of its supposed deficiencies. It was not his business. Nor does it appear that he was aware of the particular defect which resulted in overturning the locomotive. The defendant, of course, had in its employment persons whose business it was to examine the track and see to its repairs, and it was their neglect if it was not kept in proper condition. It would be a harsh conclusion to say that the plaintiff, who was merely a fireman, would be required to abandon his employment upon a merely speculative apprehension that the defendant had not seen and would not see that the road over which their locomotive and cars passed was properly and safely constructed. The immediate cause of the accident was a defective joint of the rails, of which he could have known nothing as a fireman passing over the road, and which the defendant might have known by the exercise of proper diligence."

A master is liable for injuries to an employee, sustained by the falling of a bale of cotton which he was helping to put in the hold, because hooks by which it was lowered were defective, when it was the duty of others not engaged in handling the cotton to inspect the hooks, and he was ignorant of their condition and was obliged to use them when furnished. Ocean S. S. Co. v. Matthews (1890) 86 Ga. 418.

A workman who is merely employed to load, ride on, and unload an elevator is not necessarily negligent in assuming that the elevator chain is sound. Though the chain is in plain sight, the defects may not be patent to a casual inspection, and, as it is not his duty to carefully examine the chain, he may act on the assumption that the servant to whom that duty is assigned has performed it. Mulvey v. Rhode Island Locomotive Works (1885) 14 R. I. 204.

In Guthrie v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1883) 11 Lea, 373, 47 Am. Rep. 286, where the plaintiff was injured by a defective maul, the court remarked: "In reference to a case like this, the true rule is, that the duty of the master is absolute to use active diligence to prevent improper or unsafe tools or implements being furnished an employee, by which he may be injured. [Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Elliott (1880)] 1 Coldw. 613, 78 Am. Dec. 508. In reference to this matter the employee may well rely, to some extent, at least, on the faithful performance of duty on the part of his employer, and therefore what might be ordinary care in avoiding an independent danger, might well not be required to the same extent to guard against a breach of duty on the part of another, which the party could have no reason to anticipate. The employee had no duty to perform, under the facts in this case, as to the repair of the tools; nor was he called on to inspect them to see whether the master might not have neglected his duties in this reference. There being no special care imposed by the nature of his position, nor obligation to inspect the tools, there could be no want of it, or negligence, or carelessness, in not doing what he was not bound to do by the nature of his employment and the legal obligations arising out of the relations existing between the parties. We do not intend by this, however, to say that the employee is not bound to proper attention, and bound to freedom from actual negligence in avoiding risks incident to his employment. The defendant cannot complain that the employee did not suspect or anticipate a breach of legal duty on his part, nor watchfully guard against danger from such breach. It is not for him to object that the plaintiff has relied on his faithful discharge of his duty, nor to insist that he should have inspected the tools he was ordered to use for the purpose of seeing whether the master had not violated his duty. The proof shows he was ordered to take the place of Dual in this case, who was using this maul, and it was but natural that he should have done so without suspicion; and the failure to examine before using was not carelessness on his part."

In Pennsylvania Coal Co. v. Kelly (1895) 156 Ill. 16, it was held that one who had opportunity to inspect any defect in the latch of the bucket that caused the accident, for some time before the accident and continued to work with such bucket, was not thereby chargeable with notice of the condition of the latch. The court said: "It was the unquestioned duty of the defendant to furnish plaintiff a safe bucket, and he had a right to assume that it had performed that duty, and was not bound to make a personal inspection of the same before using it. . . . If the servant must, at his peril examine for himself, what becomes of the primary duty of the master to see that safe and suitable machinery and implements are furnished his employee?"

In Griffin v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1889) 148 Mass. 143, 1 L. R. A. 698, respecting a broken coupling link, the court said: "The history of this broken link is not disclosed,—whether it was new or old, whether originally sufficient or insufficient, worn or not worn, whether it was furnished by the defendant itself as a part of its own equipment, or whether it came from some other railroad. These facts it is reasonable to assume were not within the plaintiff's knowledge, or means of knowledge. The railroad train was under the management of the defendant. The defendant knew, or had the means of knowing, where and by whom the train was made up, of what cars it was composed, and what degree of care and diligence had been observed in making it safe to run."

"The law applicable to the facts in this case is that the servant was not bound to investigate and find out at his peril whether the common master had used reasonable care in the selection of those employed in the same branch of service, but, on the contrary, he was warranted in assuming his employer had discharged his duty in that respect, and until notice to the contrary was brought home to him, he could act upon such assumption." Charles Pope Glucose Co. v. Byrne (1895) 40 Ill. App. 20.

8. Rule where the servant has equal or superior knowledge or means of knowledge.

Sometimes the servant's right of action is made to depend upon whether he possessed, in comparison with the master, "equal" or "superior" knowledge or means of knowledge; and 41 L. R. A.

we even find courts taking opposite sides in pronouncing upon the effect of this equality or superiority of information.

Thus, on the one hand, we have cases in which the equality of the servant's means of knowledge has been declared to be a sufficient reason for absolving the master.

In Ogden v. Rummens (1863) 3 Fost. & F. 731, Bramwell, B., charged the jury that, if they thought that the employer had no knowledge and no reasonable means of knowledge of the danger at the time the arch fell, or that the deceased had the same knowledge or means of knowledge, then they should find for the defendant; but in the opposite view of the case, for the plaintiffs.

In Dunlap v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1888) 81 Ga. 130, an engineer employed by the month to run trains upon the road of his employer consented to go for temporary service on another road, and was injured by reason of the bad condition of the track, and the want of adaptation of the engine (which belonged to his employer) to the track in its actual condition. The court held that he could not recover, saying: "It is not alleged that the employer knew either of the bad condition or the want of adaptation. For aught that appears, the parties were on equal terms as to their knowledge or information touching both these matters. Had the engineer needed information more than he had, he should have obtained it or declined to go. The question is, whether he had a right to take for granted, as against his employer, that the track of the other company was not defective, but in a fit condition to be used under this particular engine with safety. Did the employer owe to him the diligence of seeing that this was so, before requesting him to go, and accepting his consent to do so? The employer could not by authority of the contract order him to go, for the duty of going was not embraced in the contract of employment. Had he objected and been discharged for it, his wages for the unexpired month would have gone on notwithstanding. We think the case is much like that of a farmer sending his hired man to plough for a neighbor a few days. If the neighbor's field is not safe, has sink-holes in it, for instance, or the plough is not adapted to the soil, and from one or both of these causes the hired man is injured, his employer, it seems to us, would not be to blame, and would not be responsible, unless he knew the facts which exposed his servant to unusual peril, and concealed his knowledge, or failed to communicate it."

On the other hand, we find it laid down that an employee's mere means of knowledge of defects in machinery or appliances is not equivalent to actual knowledge, as he has the right to presume that the employer has used due and reasonable care in seeing that they are not defective. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Nunnally (1892) 88 Va. 546.

The same principle was affirmed in Porter v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1879) 71 Mo. 66, 36 Am. Rep. 464, where the court said: "The doctrine that the servant cannot recover if he had equal means with the master of ascertaining the defect, is not applicable to a case of latent defects in machinery, but only to cases where the defect is obvious to the senses, or would have been disclosed to an ordinarily observant man in the ordinary use of the machinery in the business the servant was engaged in within the time the injured servant operated such machinery before the accident, or in the case of the negligence of a fellow servant and probably others, but certainly not to the one now under consideration, if we adhere to the doctrine announced in this case, when here on a former occasion. If the servant, as was then held, is not, and the master is, required to exercise diligence to discover defects in machinery with which the servant is employed to work, the latter may recover, although he may have had equal means of ascertaining its defects, if in fact he was ignorant of their existence and they were not patent or such as would have been disclosed by operating it as above stated. If the master did not know of the defect, and reasonable care on his part would not have disclosed it, he would not be liable. If, however, by the exercise of reasonable care the employer could have discovered, although a like exercise of care on the part of the servant would also have disclosed to him, a latent defect, yet, if in fact he did not know it, the master would be liable, although the servant's opportunities to ascertain it were equal to those of the master. The servant has a right to assume that the machinery or implements furnished him by the employer are safe and suitable for the business, and he is not, while the master is, required to examine them for that purpose. The master is chargeable with knowledge which he might have acquired by the exercise of due care, the same as if he actually possessed it, whereas, the servant has the right to assume that all necessary examinations have been made by the master, and is not required, either in person, or by another employed by him for the purpose, to examine the machinery as to its fitness and sufficiency."

In Muldorney v. Illinois C. R. Co. (1873) 36 Iowa, 470, it is held that an employee having the same knowledge or means of knowledge that his employer has will not be held to have incurred all the risks of the employment incident to the use of defective cars or machinery, if he does not object thereto when attempting to use cars having bumpers of different heights. The court said: "It is the duty of the employer to exercise reasonable care to furnish safe machinery, and to discover defects therein. But the employee is not under like obligation to resort to means for the discovery of defects. He has a right to presume that his employer has done his duty, and complied with the requirements of the law. And it is only when he has knowledge of defects in the machinery which he is required to use, and continues to use them without objection, that he is presumed to waive the defect. (Kroy v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1871) 32 Iowa, 357.) . . . Of course, the situation of the plaintiff and his means of knowledge may be proved in order to enable the jury to determine the fact of his knowledge of the condition of the machinery with which he works. But it is his knowledge, and not his means of knowledge, which affects his right to recover." The court also refused to hold that knowledge of the condition of the bumpers would be imputed from the fact alone that they were of different heights.

The same doctrine in substance is declared in Nichols v. Crystal Plate Glass Co. (1894) 126 Mo. 55.

For other examples of the use of the same phrase respecting equal means of knowledge, see Bailey, Personal Injuries Relating to Master & Servant, pp. 198 et seq.

In some cases we even find the equality of the means of knowledge possessed by the master and servant somewhat unnecessarily referred to, when the action is already conclusively barred by the inability of the servant to prove knowledge on the master's part. See, for example, McCarthy v. Mulr (1893) 50 Ill. App. 510.

argument based upon these expressions is, in most instances, merely barren and unprofitable logomachy. The master's nonliability is really predicated from the fact that the servant, under circumstances, possessed either actual or constructive knowledge of the risk to which he was exposed, and is therefore regarded as having assumed that risk, or as having been guilty of contributory negligence in continuing to expose himself to it. Whether the servant's knowledge was equal to, or greater or less than, that of the master is wholly immaterial. If his knowledge amounts to a full appreciation of the conditions the law will preclude him from maintaining the action. Should it fall short of that appreciation, it cannot be pleaded in bar of the action at all, and the master's case will not be strengthened by drawing a comparison between his own knowledge and that of the servant.

This aspect of the matter is clearly stated in the following passage of the opinion in Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Woodward (1894) 9 Ind. App. 169: "Where the danger is open and obvious to either master or servant, it might doubtless be properly said that master and servant stand upon an equality. Brazil Block Coal Co. v. Hoodlet (1891) 129 Ind. 327. But even then the servant's assumption of the risk depends not upon the equality of his opportunities with those of his master, but upon the fact that by the exercise of reasonable care he ought to have known of the danger, and is therefore held to have known it. It is conceded by counsel for both parties that the defect in this case was a latent one. We think it clear that as to such a defect the master and servant are not upon an equality. The duty resting upon them is different, and the acts required of them to constitute care with reference to the discovery of the defect are different. It could not, therefore, have been correctly said that the servant assumed the risk because his opportunities to observe the defect were equal to those of his master." Pittsburgh, C. C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Woodward (1894) 9 Ind. App. 169.

But the difference of opinion disclosed by the conflicting decisions as to the disabling consequence of the possession by the servant of equal means of knowledge is more apparent than real, for both the courts which affirm and the courts which deny that, under such circumstances, the servant is precluded from recovering damages, merely intend to assert the proposition that this disability ensues where the failure of the servant to ascertain the existence of the danger and to govern himself accordingly is due to his failure to exercise that degree of care which a prudent man in his position would have exercised. There is no force in the objections to the rule that a servant who has the same means of knowledge cannot maintain an action unless it be assumed that this phrase implies that the employee is bound to be as vigilant as the master in searching for defects, and there is absolutely no authority for putting such a construction upon the phrase, except in cases where the servant is especially charged with a duty of inspection.

Examples of such cases are the following: Fort Wayne, C. & L. R. Co. v. Gruff (1892) 132 Ind. 13; Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Orr (1890) 91 Ala. 554; Austin v. Appling (1891) 88 Ga. 54; Kans v. Page (1897) 168 Mass. 217.

But in the absence of specific evidence the court will not presume that the duty of examining the appliance which caused the plaintiff's injury rested upon him. Goodrich v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1880) 116 N. Y. 393, 5 L. R. A. 750.

Where the servant professes to have special skill in the work for which he is hired and the master disclaims the possession of such skill, the obligation of ascertaining the peculiar construction of the appliances to be handled and the proper mode of handling them rests on the servant and not on the master. Hence, an instruction is erroneous which leaves the jury to infer in such a case that the master was bound to know the character of an appliance and the manner in which it should be used so as to prevent injury. Ray v. Jeffries (1887) 86 Ky. 367.

Possibly the only cases in which this process of determining the rights of the parties by instituting a comparison between the extent of the opportunities of knowledge possessed by each of them respectively has any real practical significance are those in which it is used with the result, either of disabling the employer from relying on the defense that his ignorance of the danger was excusable, or of strengthening the inference that he was not negligent in failing to observe it.

Thus, on the one hand, where a rule of a railroad company makes it the duty of all employees to report omissions of duty, and the negligent acts of the culpable servant took place on the train on which the plaintiff was working, it is more reasonable to suppose they were done in his presence, or under his observation, than to imply knowledge on the part of the company, and to imply that, having failed to report the acts of negligence, he intended to assume the additional risk. Cameron v. New York C. & H. R. Co. (1895) 145 N. Y. 400.

So, negligence cannot be imputed to an employer for failure to shore up a ditch in which an employee, injured by the caving in of the sides thereof, was working, where the latter and those at work with him were better informed than the employer as to the danger to be apprehended from the liability of the earth to cave, and the shallowness and other physical characteristics of the ditch were not such as to suggest danger, either to the employer or the employees. Fairmount Cemetery Asso. v. Davis (1894) 4 Colo. App. 570.

"If a defect in a car was such as to deceive human judgment, the company, as well as the plaintiff, stands excused. And whatever diligence he exercised in seeing to the apparent safety of the vehicle goes to the credit of his employer, as well as to his own credit." Central R. & Bkg. Co. v. Kenney (1877) 58 Ga. 485.

In Reid v. Central R. & Bkg. Co. (1888) 81 Ga. 604, a nonsuit was held to have been properly granted, where, so far as the testimony shows, the rope furnished to the plaintiff for the purpose of cleaning out a well was a good rope, and it was also in evidence that it was carefully examined by both the plaintiff and the overseer of the road, that there was no defect in it which would be discovered by the use of ordinary care, and that both parties pronounced the rope good.

In Alton Lime & Cement Co. v. Calvey (1892) 47 Ill. App. 343, the defendant's foreman testified that if the plaintiff had been careful he might have seen the dynamite before he struck the rock which caused the explosion. The court's comment upon this evidence was that, if it was true, the company, whose duty it was not to allow any dynamite to remain in the quarry that by the exercise of proper diligence could have been discovered, should have had it removed.

that he had not complained of the machine during the thirteen years he had worked with it because it had "never entered his head that it was dangerous."

On the other hand, the fact that only one out of ten employees engaged in handling a chain noticed any defect in it, is in itself evidence that the defect was not such an apparent one as to put them or their employers on their guard. Kinney v. Corbin (1890) 132 Pa. 341.

So, it has been said that "where the railway company has furnished, in the first instance, such reasonably safe tools and implements to the employee, to be used in the performance of the work he undertakes to do, and the tools become worn, or some latent defect exists of which the company has no knowledge, or by the exercise of ordinary care and diligence it could not have discovered, and the employee using them has the same means of knowing the condition of the tools that the company has, and the tools are by each considered reasonably safe, and the employee is injured by the use of them, it is a mere accident or misfortune, for which the company is not liable." Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Young (1896) 4 Kan. App. 219.

As to the circumstances under which the knowledge of certain employees that a rule is habitually violated will be held to justify the inference that the rule is virtually abrogated see the forthcoming note on the Master's Duty to Make Rules.

a. General principles.

As a general rule it may be laid down that a master is chargeable with the knowledge which any employee who is intrusted with the performance of any of the nonassignable duties of the master acquires with regard to the condition of the instrumentalities to which those duties relate, while he is engaged in the performance of such duties. See Goldie v. Werner (1894) 151 Ill. 551.

This doctrine is merely a special application of the more general rule that notice to an agent of a corporation or individual relating to a matter of which he has the management and control is notice to his employer. Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby (1871) 38 Ind. 294, 10 Am. Rep. 111; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Collari (1881) 73 Ind. 261, 38 Am. Rep. 134; Crown Coal Co. v. Hiles (1892) 43 Ill. App. 310.

"It is the officer to whose care is committed any particular department of a company's business who is expected to use ordinary care in the conduct thereof, and whose negligence therein is the negligence of the company." Patterson v. Pittsburgh & C. R. Co. (1874) 76 Pa. 380, 18 Am. Rep. 412.

The practical considerations upon which the doctrine is based were thus tersely stated by Byles, J., in Clark v. Holmes (1862) 7 Hurlst. & N. 937, 31 L. J. Exch. N. S. 356, 8 Jur. N. S. 902, 10 Week. Rep. 405. "If a master's personal knowledge of defects be necessary to his liability, the more he neglects his business and abandons it to others the less will he be liable."

In Sangamon Coal Min. Co. v. Wiggerhaus (1887) 122 Ill. 279, one of the instructions informed the jury that if they believed, from the evidence, that an agent of the defendant whose duty it was to fix said door or cause the same to be fixed, was notified that the opening of the door across the gangway was difficult and hard, then such notice was notice to defendant, etc. The plaintiff contended that notice to a servant of appellee is not notice to the common employer, but the court said: "We do not think it important to discuss the doctrine indicated by the objection urged. It is, we think, sufficient to say that, when a duty is imposed upon and entrusted to an agent by a corporation, notice to such agent of matters falling within his line of duty is notice to the corporation. The instruction, we think, stated the rule correctly."

In Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie (1885) 81 Va. 71, the court refused to adopt the theory contended for by the railroad company, that it was not bound by the knowledge which employees charged with the duty of keeping its tracks in good order possessed as to its defective condition, saying: "To hold otherwise would be to hold that a corporation, whose lines—as we know from the record in the present case—extend into several states of the Union, and over which numerous employees are daily carried, is, so far as the guarding of its track is concerned, virtually without a representative at all. It would be to declare that to be law, which is consistent neither with reason nor sound policy, and the evil consequences of which it is easy to imagine. But if this be not the correct view, and if in the present case the company is not affected by notice to Flynn and Foster, how, it may be asked, could notice affect it? Would notice to an executive officer suffice? And if so, to whom? We are at a loss to answer. On the other hand, let it once be settled that the humblest watchman who walks the track is, within the scope of his employment, the representative of the company, that he has eyes to see, ears to hear, and lips to communicate to his superiors the knowledge he acquires as to the condition of the track, or of impending danger, and the law upon this important subject will be placed upon such a footing as that none can misapprehend, and all reasonable men must approve it. That such is the law is clear, we think, not only upon reason, but from the authorities already referred to; from which it will appear that, in cases like the present, the proper inquiry is not, What is the rank of the servant? but, Does he represent the company? And if he does, then the result is the same,—no matter whether his rank be high or low, whether he be the president of the company, or the conductor of a train, a section master, or a common watchman."

It is, of course, immaterial that the individual servant who acquired the knowledge had left the master's employment when the injury in suit occurred. The master's liability, so far as it depends upon his imputed knowledge, is complete in law, as soon as the actual knowledge of the servant would have reached him if such servant had used due diligence in imparting the information which he possessed. Bland v. Shreveport Belt R. Co. (1896) 48 La. Ann. 1057, 36 L. R. A. 114.

Still less should a verdict for the plaintiff be directed where there is evidence which goes to show that the dangerous condition from which his injuries resulted had been discovered by a former foreman of the defendant corporation, and actually communicated by him to its officers. Linton Coal & Min. Co. v. Persons (1894) 11 Ind. App. 264.

Declarations of an agent of the master, made after an accident, will not bind the master unless they are of such a character as to show that he had previous knowledge of the defect in the machinery. Baker v. Allegheny R. Co. (1890) 95 Pa. 211, 40 Am. Rep. 634.

On the other hand, admissions or statements of the general manager of a railroad 41 L. R. A.

company, made directly after an accident, as to the condition of a road while he is in the line of his duty and upon being informed by an agent of the road of the wreck, are admissible, both as showing knowledge of the corporation as to the improper construction and condition of the road before the accident, and also because it is his business, as the alter ego of the company, to know the condition of the road, and what he says under such circumstances is said dum ferret opus. Krogg v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. (1886) 77 Ga. 202.

b. Illustrative cases of notice to various employees.

1. Servant in complete control of the master's business.

It is an obvious consequence of the general principles stated in the preceding section that as an employee who stands in the master's shoes in respect to the control of the entire business is his representative in the performance of each and all of the nonassignable duties incumbent on the master, the knowledge of such employee must necessarily be imputed to the master. Thus, it has been held that the master is chargeable with knowledge acquired by any of the following agents:

A general manager. Krogg v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. (1886) 77 Ga. 202; Goggin v. D. M. Osborne & Co. (1896) 115 Cal. 437; Delaney v. Hilton (1883) 18 Jones & S. 341.

A partner who personally manages a concern. Mellors v. Shaw (1861) 1 Best & S. 437, 30 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 333, 7 Jur. N. S. 845.

A superintendent. Patterson v. Pittsburg & C. R. Co. (1874) 76 Pa. 389, 18 Am. Rep. 412; Huntingdon & B. T. Mountain R. & Coal Co. v. Decker (1876) 82 Pa. 119 (1877) 84 Pa. 419; Pantzar v. Tilly Foster Iron Min. Co. (1885) 99 N. Y. 388; Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1860) 88 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467; Caldwell v. Brown (1866) 53 Pa. 453; Quincy Coal Co. v. Hood (1875) 77 Ill. 68; Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Whitmore (1883) 58 Tex. 276; Deweese v. Meramec Iron Min. Co. (1895) 128 Mo. 423, Aff'g (1893) 54 Mo. App. 476; Speiman v. Fisher Iron Co. (1870) 56 Barb. 151; Eureka Co. v. Bass (1896) 81 Ala. 200, 60 Am. Rep. 152; Bowers v. Union P. R. Co. (1885) 4 Utah, 215.

A "general agent having charge of a mill, with power to purchase all supplies and discharge operatives." Corcoran v. Holbrook (1875) 59 N. Y. 517, 17 Am. Rep. 369.

A "foreman in exclusive control." Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Graham (1890) 124 Ind. 89.

A "foreman and manager." Higgins v. Williams (1896) 114 Cal. 176.

A "mine-boss." Rima v. Rossie Iron Works (1890) 120 N. Y. 433.

A captain of a ship. The A. Heaton (1890) 43 Fed. Rep. 592; The Norway v. Jensen (1869) 32 Ill. 375.

A like principle is applicable where the notice has been received by one who customarily superintends a mill in the absence of a superior officer. Chapman v. Southern P. Co. (1895) 12 Utah, 30.

A complaint which alleges that a plaintiff was injured by the negligence of the defendant's superintendent, in furnishing for the plaintiff's use a newly invented blasting powder, "without first informing himself whether it could be safely used," is not demurrable on the theory that it does not show that the injury was caused by the negligence of the defendant. Speiman v. Fisher Iron Co. (1870) 56 Barb. 151.

2. Servants charged with the duty of seeing that the place of work is safe.

The subjoined decisions furnish specific ex amples of the operation of the principle which renders nonassignable the duty to provide a safe place of work.

A railroad company is affected with knowledge of defects which make its track an unsafe place of work, where such knowledge is in the possession of any of the following servants:

Any agent appointed to keep its track in repair. Porter v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1879) 71 Mo. 66, 36 Am. Rep. 454; Wellman v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1892) 21 Or. 530; Elledge v. National City & O. R. Co. (1893) 100 Cal. 282 (roadmaster).

A night watchman intrusted with the duty of guarding a track at a dangerous place. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. McKenzie (1885) 81 Va. 71.

A division superintendent. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Welch (1869) 52 Ill. 183, 4 Am. Rep. 593.

Division engineer. Illinois C. R. Co. v. Welch (1869) 52 Ill. 183, 4 Am. Rep. 593.

A section boss or foreman. Lewis v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. (1875) 59 Mo. 495, 21 Am. Rep. 385; Hollenbeck v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1897, Mo.) 38 S. W. 723; Clowers v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (1896) 21 Mo. App. 213.

A section boss and overseer of the road. Skidmore v. West Virginia & P. R. Co. (1895) 41 W. Va. 293 (principle assumed to be correct); Riley v. West Virginia C. & P. R. Co. (1885) 27 W. Va. 145.

A yardmaster. Bessex v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1878) 45 Wis. 477.

An engineer. Nashville & C. R. Co. v. Elliott (1860) 1 Coldw. 611, 78 Am. Dec. 506. (There the imputed knowledge was in respect to the condition of one of the company's bridges, but the precise rank and functions of the engineer are not stated.)

A master-builder. Bunnell v. St. Paul, M. & M. R. Co. (1882) 29 Minn. 305.

Other examples of the same principle are found in the rule which charges any employer with notice of what is known to a superintendent of the construction of a bridge. Brothers v. Cartter (1873) 52 Mo. 372, 14 Am. Rep. 424.

Or to an employee whose duty it is to select the materials for a scaffold. Goldie v. Werner (1894) 151 Ill. 551.

The knowledge of a boss placed in control of the work of excavating a ditch, that it is in a dangerous condition, is imputed to his employer. Van Steenburgh v. Thornton (1895) 68 N. J. L. 160.

The knowledge of a master mechanic that the door of a round house under his charge is in an unsafe condition, is imputed to the railroad company. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Tasse (1893, Tex. Civ. App.) 22 S. W. 687.

A mine owner is affected with the knowledge of a timberman whose duty it is to see to the propping of the roofs of the tunnels that they are in a safe condition. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Schelber (1896) 65 Ill. App. 304.

And with the knowledge of a "fire boss" whose duty it is to find out where dangerous gases have accumulated. Cerrillos Coal R. Co. v. Deserant (1897, N. M.) 49 Pac. 807.

Where there is evidence that defects in a railroad track at a place where a train was derailed had been pointed out to the foreman of a repair gang, the question whether the company had notice of the defects before the accident occurred should be submitted to the jury. Gage v. Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. (1878) 14 Hun. 446. (The report does not mention whether the basis of the decision was that the foreman was a vice principal.)

3. Servant charged with the duty of providing and maintaining appliances.

The general rule is that the knowledge of a servant employed to repair appliances is imputed to the master. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Thompson (1895) 30 U. S. App. 549, 70 Fed. Rep. 944, 17 C. C. A. 524; Covey v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1885) 86 Mo. 635 (Citing Porter v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1879) 71 Mo. 66, 36 Am. Rep. 454); Krogg v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. (1886) 77 Ga. 202; Dedrick v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1886) 21 Mo. App. 433; Dutsl v. Gelsel (1856) 23 Mo. App. 676; St. Louis & S. W. R. Co. v. Threat (1896) 12 Tex. Civ. App. 375; Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1896) 116 U. S. 642, 20 L. ed. 755.

Thus, railroad companies have been held chargeable with the knowledge of the defective condition of a car possessed by any employee appointed by a railway company to look after the condition of its cars, and see that the machinery and appliances used to move and stop them are kept in repair. Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1896) 116 U. S. 642, 20 L. ed. 755 [a yardmaster]; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Ampey (1896) 93 Va. 108 [a conductor].

With the knowledge of the foreman of a switch crew under whose supervision a train is made up, that one of the cars is defective. Reed v. Burlington, C. R. & N. R. Co. (1887) 72 Iowa, 166.

With the knowledge of the foreman of a railroad company's machine shops, that an engine is defective. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Stein (1894) 140 Ind. 61.

With the knowledge of an assistant roadmaster and assistant foreman in control of a trackman, that a handcar is defective. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Napole (1896) 55 Kan. 401.

With the knowledge of an agent who made and adjusted the handles of a hand-car that unsuitable material had been placed in the handles. Indiana, I. & I. R. Co. v. Snyder (1896) 140 Ind. 647.

With the constructive knowledge of a section foreman that the wood used for making the handle of a hand-car is decayed. McGhee v. Bell (1897, Ky.) 38 S. W. 702. (Reversed on rehearing in 19 Ky. L. Rep. 267, but merely on the ground that the evidence showed that the servant was fully aware of the danger, and voluntarily used the hand-car at his own risk.)

With the knowledge of an employee in full control of the work of building a culvert that a derrick is defective and unsafe. Kansas P. R. Co. v. Little (1877) 19 Kan. 287.

With the knowledge of the foreman in control of a pile-driver crew that the machine is defective. Schultz v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1879) 48 Wis. 875.

So, a receiver operating a railroad is chargeable with the knowledge of a master mechanic as to the defective condition of any appliances under his control. Kain v. Smith (1882) 89 N. Y. 375.

A private corporation is chargeable with the knowledge of a bookkeeper having authority to purchase supplies. Eureka Co. v. Bass (1886) 81 Ala. 200, 60 Am. Rep. 152.

A street railway company is liable for an injury to a driver from the breaking of a hame strap of poor quality and insufficient for the service, where the company has knowledge of the defect through the foreman of its car barn, who is its representative in that behalf, and through its manager. Toledo Consol. Street R. Co. v. Yunker (1893) 9 Ohio C. C. 262.

The knowledge of the overseer of the yards of a stock company as to the defective condition of a drawhead is imputed to the company. Union Stock Yards Co. v. Larson (1893) 38 Neb. 462.

Where a stevedore has full charge of the loading and unloading of a vessel, which furnishes the tackle, and his foreman called the attention of the mate of the ship to the unsafe character of one of the slings used in lowering cotton, the vessel is liable where one of the gang of the stevedore is injured by the breaking thereof. The Phoenix (1888) 34 Fed. Rep. 760.

In Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Rung (1882) 104 Ill. 641, it was held that a jury might properly find a railroad company liable for an injury caused by a defect in an engine which had been frequently reported by the engineer to his immediate superior, the court taking the ground that "upon the principle that everyone is presumed to do his duty, it was reasonable to assume that through the foreman the company obtained the requisite notice, whether he had immediate charge of the machinery or not." This ruling seems to be opposed to the general current of authority, and is perhaps attributable in some degree to the influence of the "superior servant" limitation upon the doctrine of common employment which prevails in Illinois.

Compare Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Jackson (1870) 55 Ill. 492, 8 Am. Rep. 661, where it was held that, as employees having charge of the inspection and repair of railway cars are superior in authority to a brakeman, he cannot be prejudiced by their negligence, and notice to them of a defect is notice to the company. But doubtless the ruling under these circumstances would be the same whether the "superior servant limitation" is acknowledged or not.

In Brabbitt v. Chicago & N. W. R. Co. (1875) 38 Wis. 289, an action against a railroad company for injuries sustained by a brakeman while coupling cars, owing to a defect in the engine, the following instruction was held correct: "If the company had any individual in their service, whose duty it was made by the company itself to take charge of the repairs of engines, to whom engineers were to report when engines became out of repair, and whose duty it was made by the company to act on such reports,—to see that the engines were put in repair,—I must instruct you that if such notice was given to any person thus acting in behalf of the defendant in this case, such notice is good notice to the company."

In Johnson v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1888) 96 Mo. 340, it was insisted that the trial judge erred in overruling defendant's objection to the reception of the evidence of two blacksmiths, Smith and Hardy, which tended to show that the hammer which caused the injury had not been repaired with reasonable skill. But the court said: "The petition alleges that the hammer in question had been repaired at defendant's own shops, and it was owing to the imperfect and brittle condition and flaws in the hammer negligently furnished him, that plaintiff was injured. Under these averments, the evidence was admissible, and also as bearing upon the question of defendant's knowledge as to the defective condition of the hammer, the repair of it having been made or done by defendant's agent in its repair shops, thus making the knowledge of the agent the knowledge of its principal; and in this respect this case is distinguishable from the case of Gutridge v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 94 Mo. 468."

indicates that although the officers mentioned would, from the nature of their functions, always exercise some power in regard to the employment of a larger or smaller number of subordinates, the doctrine which charges the master with their knowledge is not based upon that fact. In other cases the exercise of these powers is itself the controlling element.

As the special object of conferring this kind of authority upon an employee is to insure that only competent servants shall be hired and retained, the logical conclusion from the general principles stated at the beginning of this subdivision is that, so far as respects the imputation of knowledge to the master, the possession of such authority can be material only when the issue raised is whether the master was aware of the servants' unfitness. In some states, however, as a consequence of certain peculiar modifications of the doctrine of common employment, the delegation of the power of employment casts a more extended responsibility in this regard upon the master.

The doctrine deduced from the former conception of the effect of the possession of this power by an employee is that, as the duty of the master to provide competent servants is absolute and nonassignable, such employee must be a vice principal in respect to the function of ascertaining the qualifications of the subordinates under his immediate control, and seeing that none of them are so unfit for their places that they are likely to imperil the safety of those with whom they work. Any knowledge, therefore, whether it be actual or constructive, which he may acquire as to the incompetency or unfitness of his subordinates, is imputed to the master. The following cases will indicate the scope of this rule:

Knowledge of a servant's unfitness is imputed to an employee where such knowledge is possessed by a general agent for hiring and discharging men of the class to which the servant belongs. Lauing v. New York C. R. Co. (1872) 49 N. Y. 521, 10 Am. Rep. 417; Baulec v. New York & H. R. Co. (1874) 59 N. Y. 356, 17 Am. Rep. 325; Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1874) 55 N. Y. 579; Gilman v. Eastern R. Co. (1866) 13 Allen, 433, 90 Am. Dec. 210; Maxwell v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1884) 85 Mo. 95; McDermott v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1885) 87 Mo. 285; Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Whitmore (1883) 58 Tex. 276.

"It is not the company, but the officer having charge of this department of their business, that is expected to use ordinary care in the employment of proper conductors and other servants. His carelessness in this respect is theirs. [Wright v. New York C. R. Co. (1858) 23 Barb. 80.] It was therefore quite relevant and important to show that Thomas A. Scott, the superintendent, did not know that the conductor was a careless officer; supposing that the employment and oversight of conductors was part of the functions of the superintendent, which does not appear in the evidence but seems to have been assumed. Standing for the company in this respect his knowledge becomes one of the very issues in the cause, and the court was in error in rejecting the evidence." Frazier v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (1890) 38 Pa. 104, 80 Am. Dec. 467.

This general principle has lately been declared to be applicable also to the case of an officer entitled to suspend a servant of the company temporarily. Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. Henthorne (1896) 43 U. S. App. 113, 73 Fed. Rep. 634, 19 C. C. A. 623. The court said, on the contention that knowledge must have been brought home to the division superintendent or to the superintendent of motive power, whose office was several hundred miles distant: "It would be exceedingly difficult to bring home in any way the knowledge of an engineer's incompetency to these two officers under the circumstances. For the safety of the road, the company was obliged to intrust to many other agents than those mentioned the power to suspend incompetent servants, in order that the company's property, and the persons whose lives were in its custody, should not be exposed to extraordinary dangers. Clearly, the men whose duty to the company it was to exercise this power were those through whom the company sought its knowledge of the manner in which its servants were discharging their duties. They were agents for the very purpose of discovering habitual negligence, and of preventing danger from its presence, when discovered, by immediate suspension. We entirely concur with the court below in holding that an officer entitled to suspend a servant of the company temporarily is an officer who has authority to receive notice for the company of the incompetency of the person to be suspended. If, as was testified to, Fitzgerald, the yard master, had power to suspend the engineer from a further discharge of his duties when he found that he was intoxicated, if the master mechanic had the power to suspend an engineer pending inquiry for any dereliction of duty, if the train master had the same power, then all these officers were persons whose knowledge of the incompetency of employees under their supervision was the knowledge of the company, and the failure on their part to use due diligence in observing the competency and sobriety of those whom it was their duty to suspend for incompetency or inebriety was the negligence of the company. This obligation of a railway company to use due diligence in the selection and retention of its employees is one which, in view of the assumption of risk by the employees of any casual negligence of their fellow servants, it is most important to maintain, and it should not be frittered away by limiting those whose knowledge shall be the knowledge of the company to one or two officers so far removed from possible knowledge as to make it a hopeless task to bring the incompetency of subordinate servants to their notice."

"We think," said the court in Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby (1871) 88 Ind. 294, 322, 10 Am. Rep. 111, "that notice to an agent of a corporation, relating to any matter of which he has the management and control, is notice to the corporation, and we do not see any reason why this rule is not applicable here. Danville Bridge Co. v. Pomroy, 15 Pa. 151; Mechanics' Bank v. Schaumburg, 38 Mo. 228. As it was the duty of the master of transportation to communicate all matters concerning his agency to his principal, it may be presumed that he did so. But whether he did so or not, notice to him is notice to his principal, when it relates, as it did here, to the business which he was transacting for the company. He was placed in his position that he might make himself acquainted with the conduct of those who were placed under his direction and control, and he seems to have had the power to appoint and remove, promote and degrade, those who were engaged in the business of which he had the oversight. All that we have decided in this case, on this point, is that the fact that the master of transportation was present on one occasion when Kiser is alleged to have been guilty of negligence, was competent evidence to go to the jury, and from which, and the other circumstances, the jury might find that the company had notice of the carelessness of Kiser, or with the use of proper diligence might have had such notice."

Knowledge of the incompetency of engineer, possessed by trainmaster, fireman of roundhouse, and yardmaster, is imputed to the company. Francis v. Kansas City, St. J. & C. B. R. Co. (1896) 127 Mo. 658.

Knowledge of a yard master empowered to employ and discharge employees in a railway yard, and also of a yard foreman by whom a minor was put to work in the yard, as to such minor's minority and inexperience, is binding upon the railway company. Missouri P. R. Co. v. King (1898) 2 Tex. Civ. App. 122.

In Illinois C. R. Co. v. Jewell (1867) 46 Ill. 99, 92 Am. Dec. 240, the fact that the incompetency of an engineer was known to some officers of the company was held sufficient to make it liable, but it is not stated what officers these were—apparently not the directors.

As illustrating the other theory of the consequences of delegating the power of employment, the following cases may be noted:

In Texas an employee with power to hire and discharge hands, and to exercise the control over them by which that power is customarily accompanied, is deemed a vice principal, not merely for the purpose of receiving notice of the incompetency of his own subordinates, with a view to the protection of other employees, but also for the purpose of ascertaining the condition and quality of the appliances with which they are required to work, and guarding those subordinates themselves against injury therefrom. Texas Mexican R. Co. v. Whitmore (1883) 58 Tex. 276.

Thus, the knowledge of a superintendent authorized to employ and discharge hands and to direct and control workmen under him, as to the dangerous character of the machinery at which he sets an employee to work, is imputed to the employer. Connor v. Saunders (1894) 9 Tex. Civ. App. 58.

So, the knowledge of a foreman as to the dangerous disposition of a steer which an employee is directed to remove is chargeable to the employer, where the employee was subject to the orders of one who had authority to employ and discharge such employees, and had by him been placed under the orders of such foreman. International & G. N. R. Co. v. Smith (1895, Tex. Civ. App.) 80 S. W. 501.

The same doctrine is recognized in Illinois. Richardson v. Cooper (1878) 88 Ill. 270.

Thus, notice to a foreman who has been put in charge of workmen using an elevator, of the defective condition of the cable by which the same is operated, binds the master and renders him liable for an injury to a servant who is without fault, from the parting of the cable. Falgenau v. Abrahamson (1896) 66 Ill. App. 352.

b. Employees whose knowledge is not imputed to the master.

The effect of the above decisions will be more clearly understood when we contrast them with others in which it was held that the master was not chargeable with knowledge. The rulings of course reflect the various views which are entertained as to extent to which a master may assign his duties to his agents.

Under the rigorous English doctrine (see X., b. supra), which repudiates the vice principal theory altogether, it will necessarily follow that the knowledge of defects in machinery which is possessed even by such an officer as the chief engineer of a steamboat will not be imputed to the owners so as to render them liable for an injury to the third engineer. Searle v. Lindsay (1861) 11 C. B. N. S. 429, 31 L. J. C. P. N. S. 108, 8 Jur. N. S. 746, 5 L. T. N. S. 427, 10 Week. Rep. 89.

But the American cases under this head are all applications to various groups of facts of the converse of each of the general principles reviewed in the preceding subdivisions.

Knowledge of a servant of a defect in the appliances furnished by the master to another servant is not chargeable to the master unless the former servant had "authority to deal in reference to the matter which the notice affects, as a vice principal." Brown v. Hershay Land & Lumber Co. (1896) 65 Mo. App. 162.

In other words, the master will not be regarded as negligent in not knowing of a defect which is not known to any officer or agent for whose negligence the master would be responsible. Smoot v. Mobile & M. R. Co. (1880) 67 Ala. 13.

"To charge the master with knowledge, the notice must be brought home to the person whose duty it is to furnish or repair the machinery when that is necessary." Richardson v. Cooper (1876) 83 Ill. 270.

In the following cases this general principle has been applied to various groups of facts:

The knowledge possessed by a carpenter in a railway shop, of the timber used in the manufacture of the handle of a hand-car is that of a mere fellow servant of one who uses it, and is not imputed to the company. Inulana, I. & I. R. Co. v. Snyder (1893, Ind.) 82 N. E. 1129.

Where a railroad employee is thrown from a car while setting a brake, in consequence of the absence of any nut to hold the wheel on top of the brake rod, and there is no evidence that the brake was out of order when at the last car inspecting station or at any previous time, and the testimony merely goes to prove that another employee not an inspector, nor in any way responsible for the condition of the car, testified that he had noticed the defect three or four hours before the accident, no negligence on the part of the company is shown. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hagar (1882) 11 Ill. App. 498.

Notice of a defect in a railway track, given to an official of the company who is not in charge of that part of the track, is not notice to the company. Union P. R. Co. v. Springsteen (1889) 41 Kan. 724.

A master builder is not chargeable with knowledge which is imparted merely to a foreman superintending a branch of the work quite distinct from that on which the injured servant was engaged. Richardson v. Cooper (1878) 83 Ill. 270.

The temporary physical unfitness of a conductor for service is not presumed to be known to the railroad company, when the only person who was aware of his condition was a subordinate employee whose duty it was to call the conductors in a certain order, when trains were ready, and, if one could not go, to call the next. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Dolan (1875) 32 Mich. 510.

Under the "consociation" theory, a night watcher employed by a railroad company to note and report upon the conduct of the foreman of a night crew whose duty it is to make up trains is a fellow servant with the foreman. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Geary (1884) 110 Ill. 383; Following Chicago & N. W. R. Co. v. Moranda (1879) 93 Ill. 302, 34 Am. Rep. 168, as to general rule.

A complaint by a switchman in railway yards, of the incompetency and inexperience of a fireman, made to a switchman having direction of the work of the former and certain other switchmen, but having no authority to employ and discharge any employee, will not affect the company with notice so as to render it liable for personal injuries sustained by a switchman because of such inexperience and incompetency. Galveston, H. & S. A. R. Co. v. Eckols (1894) 7 Tex. Civ. App. 429.

An instruction is erroneous which allows the jury to find for the defendant, if any of its servants knew of the defect which caused the plaintiff's injury. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. v. Threat (1896) 12 Tex. Civ. App. 375.

Or one which singles out an agent of the employer upon whom none of the duties devolve which would supervene as a result of knowledge of a defect and predicate a right to recover upon his knowledge. Covey v. Hannibal & St. J. R. Co. (1883) 36 Mo. 635.

In Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Finlayson (1884) 16 Neb. 578, 49 Am. Rep. 724, the following instruction was sustained: "Even if the agents of the defendant who had charge of the engines on defendant's road, and the duty of their repair, did not positively know that the engine was unsafe, yet if it was in fact unsafe, and they had received such reports in regard to it as ought to have put them on their guard, and to have led, by the use of proper diligence, to knowledge of the facts, the defendants must be held to the same liability as if their agents had actual knowledge." The objection made to the instruction was that "It held the defendant liable, regardless of who of its agents had knowledge of the defects of the engine, or to whom reports of such defects were made." But the court said that the proposition could not be maintained, as the instructions as a whole, and the entire case, made it perfectly plain what agents were referred to.

Where the servant with whose knowledge it is sought to charge the master is not one of those whose knowledge is, as a matter of law, imputed to the master, liability can be brought home to the master only by showing that the danger was actually reported. Kidwell v. Houston & G. N. R. Co. (1877) 3 Woods, 313. There the principle was applied with somewhat doubtful propriety in a case where a defect in a car had been reported by the plaintiff to the car inspector, and by the car inspector to the master mechanic. A demurrer to the petition was sustained on the ground that it did not appear that the master mechanic had the power of appointment and removal. The standard of pleading thus applied is extremely strict, and at the present day most courts would probably hold that the precise capacity and powers of the master mechanic were matters to be disclosed by the evidence.

In Kain v. Smith (1882) 89 N. Y. 375, the knowledge of a master mechanic was held to be imputable to a receiver operating a railroad.

Of course, where no relation whatever exists between the person notified and the injured person's employer, there is no principle upon which the latter can be charged with notice. Thus, an employer is not liable for an accident to a servant caused by an insufficient fastening of a ladder, of which he had no other notice than that the architect, who was not his agent, discovered its dangerous condition ten minutes before. Quinn v. Fish (1893) 6 Misc. 105.

XIV. Duties of a master after learning of a danger to which his servant is exposed.

a. Introductory.

If we leave out of consideration the defense of contributory negligence, which is in no respect dependent upon, nor characteristic of, the relation of master and servant, the only grounds on which a master can be absolved from liability for the consequences of any extraordinary risk to which the servant may be exposed through the abnormal condition of the instrumentalities of the business are: (1) that the master did not know, either actually or constructively, that such a risk existed, and (2) that the servant was aware of its existence, and agreed to accept the responsibility for any accident which it might cause. From this principle it is an obvious deduction that the master, after receiving notice of the existence of an extraordinary risk, may escape responsibility by the adoption of one or other of two courses. He may either remove the cause of the risk by the immediate restoration of the defective or unusually dangerous instrumentality to its normal condition, or, if an immediate restoration is impossible, impart his knowledge to his servants to the end that they may have an opportunity of deciding whether they will take the risk upon themselves and continue working. Whether the acceptance of the risk in the latter case is qualified or absolute depends upon whether the notification which the servants received of its existence was or was not accompanied by a promise to effect a restoration with reasonable despatch. But this is a subject which falls outside the scope of the present note, since the giving of a promise is merely a voluntary act on the part of the master, and not a positive duty for the violation of which he can be sued. The general rule has been thus tersely stated: "If the master knew, or under the circumstances ought to have known, that a machine in use was out of repair and dangerous, it is his duty to see that it was put in proper repair, or to warn those using it of the danger, if they were ignorant of it." Rice v. King Philip Mills (1887) 144 Mass. 229, 59 Am. Rep. 80. Compare Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Bates (1897) 146 Ind. 564.

The following cases also recognize the duties to which the employer thus becomes subject in the alternative, after the danger comes to his knowledge: Alton Lime & Cement Co. v. Calvey (1893) 47 Ill. App. 343; Denver, T. & Ft. W. R. Co. v. Smock (1897) 23 Colo. 456; Carlson v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1892) 21 Or. 450.

The mere fact that the master may have provided for an effective system of inspection is wholly immaterial after any particular risk has been found to exist. Inspection is merely a preliminary proceeding which is necessary to enable the master to ascertain whether the instrumentalities are defective or not, and when it has served its purpose by disclosing an imperfection, other obligations come into play.

"It is not sufficient," as has been remarked in one case, "to be simply cautionary when a manifest danger exists that may and ought to be removed." Bean v. Western N. C. R. Co. (1890) 107 N. C. 731. There the fact that a railroad company employed a track walker, whose duty it was to examine and see, just after a train had passed a dangerous point, whether rock had fallen, was held to be no excuse for allowing a mass of rock to remain in such a position and condition that it fell upon the track and injured an employee, where the danger was obvious.

It should be observed that the master's liability depends upon different considerations, according as his failure to obtain knowledge is a specific issue in the case or not. If such failure is relied upon and demonstrated to be due to the want of proper care, it is evidently quite unnecessary to inquire into the character of the master's conduct after the time when he should have been in possession of the knowledge. On the other hand, if actual knowledge is brought home to the master, and the plaintiff makes such knowledge the starting point and foundation of his charge, not averring or attempting to prove any dereliction of duty in the matter of keeping watch upon the condition of the instrumentalities, his cause of action is not complete unless he demonstrates, not only that the master possessed knowledge of the existence of some extraordinary risk, but that he did not take such steps as a prudent man would have taken under the circumstances.

The defectiveness of a machine, and the master's knowledge of it, do not alone constitute actionable negligence. "The character of the machine and the operator's knowledge being established, it still remains a question of fact whether, under all the circumstances, a case of actionable negligence has been made out. That which caused the danger may have been irremediable, and it is no violation of duty by an employer to put one in his employ at the operation of a dangerous machine if the employee is fully informed as to its character, and voluntarily accepts the employment. Wherever force is applied to machinery there is more or less danger to those operating it; so that the duty of the employer towards his employee is not to furnish a perfectly safe machine, but one as safe as can be provided in the exercise of ordinary care and prudence. Whether the employer is negligent in this regard does not depend solely upon the fact that the machine is known by him to be a dangerous appliance, but whether, with such knowledge, he neglected to do what a person of ordinary care could and would have done under such circumstances." Findlay Brewing Co. v. Bauer (1893) 50 Ohio St. 565.

It cannot reasonably be contended that a tool or implement which has become worn and defective by use, but which still answers its purpose, should be cast aside as dangerous unless there is some apparent cause of danger in its continued use. It is an error, therefore, to instruct the jury that, irrespective of any probability of danger or harm, if a tool was defective and such defect might have, by the use of ordinary care and diligence, been known by the defendant, the defendant was liable to the plaintiff for the injury he received. Little Rock & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Duffey (1890) 35 Ark. 602.

The care which an employer is bound to use on any particular occasion on which the conditions are rendered specially perilous from some cause, which is not operative under the normal circumstances of the employment, must of course be proportioned to the danger to which he knows his servants will be exposed. Inter-State Consol. Rapid Transit R. Co. v. Fox (1889) 41 Kan. 715. (A case where men were at work on a trestle over which trains were run at intervals, and the company did not take such precautions as were proper in view of the morning's being very foggy.)

b. Duty to remove the causes of the unusual risk; illustrative cases.

The subjoined rulings will serve as examples of the manner in which the courts have applied to different groups of facts the rules which require the master to rectify any abnormal conditions in his instrumentalities which he may discover, and to warn his servants that those abnormal conditions exist.

1. Machinery and appliances.

In Mad River & L. E. R. Co. v. Barber (1856) 5 Ohio St. 541, 67 Am. Dec. 312, the court remarked: "The duty imposed on the company by the relation occupied by the conductor was to use reasonable and ordinary care and diligence in furnishing him with sufficient, sound, and safe cars and machinery for the train. This duty required, not only that the company should use proper skill and diligence in procuring and furnishing sufficient and safe cars and machinery, but also when notified that they had become insufficient and unsafe, or when they had been in use as long as they could with safety be used, to take them off the road until repaired and made sufficient and safe."

A railway company is bound to discover and remedy a defect in an engine within a reasonable time, where there is clearly something wrong with it and has been for a considerable time, and is liable for injuries to a switchman whose hand is caught between two deadwoods while he is making a coupling, owing to the engineer's inability to control the engine. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. McHenry (1894) 10 Ind. App. 525.

"It is culpable to use cars or engines of any particular pattern which an ordinary inspection would show to be defective." Mason v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1892) 111 N. C. 482, 18 L. R. A. 845.

If a foreign car comes to a company with defects visible or discoverable by ordinary inspection, it should either refuse to receive it, or immediately repair it sufficiently to make it reasonably safe. Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Fry (1891) 131 Ind. 319; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Myers (1894) 24 U. S. App. 295, 63 Fed. Rep. 793, 11 C. C. A. 439; Gottlieb v. New York, L. E. & W. R. Co. (1885) 100 N. Y. 462.

A railroad company which fails to put in good order the couplings on cars which have been injured in a wreck of which the company knows or ought to know is liable for an injury to a brakeman caused by such failure. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Amper (1896) 93 Va. 108.

An electric-light company is guilty of negligence in failing to replace a cable in use on an elevator by which employees ascend to an electric-light tower, or to make any examination to see if it is defective, after notification that it has become broken and ragged. Welden v. Brush Electric Light Co. (1889) 78 Mich. 268.

Other cases to the same effect in relation to machinery are Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Sadler (1887) 38 Kan. 128; Johnson v. Armour (1883) 18 Fed. Rep. 490; Johnson v. Boston Tow-Boat Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 209, 46 Am. Rep. 458.

An employer is not, as matter of law, free from negligence toward an employee injured by the fall of a freight elevator, although it had just been repaired by an expert, where it was of class of rather poor elevators and the manager in charge knew of defects which were not repaired at all. Goggin v. D. M. Osborne & Co. (1896) 115 Cal. 437.

Where a locomotive boiler explodes killing the fireman, and there is evidence that the engine was frequently taken to the repair shops for repairs, that it would not hold water, nor sustain a full head of steam, the question of the employer's negligence is one of fact for the jury. Kirkpatrick v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1879) 79 N. Y. 240.

In Rodney v. St. Louis S. W. R. Co. (1895) 127 Mo. 676, the duty with respect to a car discovered to be defective was discussed as follows: "The defendant did not discharge its full duty to the plaintiff by inspecting and marking the car. The duty to furnish reasonably safe appliances and machinery for the use of its servants in the course of their employment was not only an imperative, but a continuous, duty. It ran, so to speak, with the defective car from the moment it was discovered to be defective, continually calling upon the master to repair it, or to warn those of its servants, whom it required in the course of their employment to handle it, of its dangerous character. These duties were not only imperative and continuous, but they were personal duties of the master, to whomsoever delegated, and if neglected by those to whom they were delegated, their negligence was the negligence of the master."

Where there is evidence that the eye-bolt was smaller than those used by defendant at the time of trial; that the breaking of the chains had formerly been of frequent occurrence; and that larger eye-bolts had been adopted since the accident, the proof of negligence on the part of defendant is slight, but is sufficient to justify the submission of the question to the jury. Painton v. Northern C. R. Co. (1880) 83 N. Y. 7.

Sometimes the duty to remove the cause of the danger may take the form of a duty to furnish special appliances in view of the possibility that the servant may be occasionally exposed to dangers against which those appliances will be an adequate protection. Thus, as a railroad company is bound to know that foreign cars may often have drawheads of different heights, and to appoint inspectors to ascertain the existence of this as well as other dangers incident to the handling of such cars, it is error to rule that the want of the crooked links which are necessary for the safe coupling of such cars is one of the risks assumed by a brakeman. Bennett v. Greenwich & J. R. Co. (1896) 84 Hun. 216.

2. Place of work.

If a railway corporation knows of the improper construction of its roadbed, and that the cross-ties and other superstructures are rotten, and if it fails to make suitable repairs, this is negligence which makes it liable for any injury that may occur on that account to anyone, whether he be a servant of the corporation or not, notwithstanding the failure to repair was owing to the negligence of the general manager or superintendent of the road, or road master, or section boss. Krogg v. Atlanta & W. P. R. Co. (1886) 77 Ga. 202.

It is error to direct a verdict for a defendant railroad company which has continued to use, after notice, a locomotive so defective that water leaking from it forms ice which makes it hazardous for switchmen to couple moving cars. Flynn v. Wabash, St. L. & P. R. Co. (1885) 18 Ill. App. 235.

An employer who, after a sufficient period to enable him to discover the defect, fails to replace a barrier whose absence renders a plank walk over a pit containing a shaft dangerous, but not so imminently dangerous that no prudent person will use it, is liable for injuries to a servant from falling into such pit while in the performance of his duty because of the absence of such barrier. Bennett v. Standard Plate Glass Co. (1893) 158 Pa. 120.

A mining company is liable for injury to a workman by the fall of a stone from a slope under which he is set to work, where he does not know that pebbles and stones in unusual numbers have been falling there during the day, but this fact is known to the superintendent of the mine, who orders him to work there, without first having the stones raked off, or taking any other precautions to prevent accidents. Deweese v. Meramec Iron Min. Co. (1895) 128 Mo. 423, Aff'd without comment (1893) 54 Mo. App. 476.

It is the duty of a foreman who discovers that a charge of dynamite has been left in a quarry, to make diligent search to have it all removed, or at least to warn the employees so as to put them on their guard. Alton Lime & Cement Co. v. Calvey (1893) 47 Ill. App. 343.

An employer who knows that a tall and heavy pole is merely resting on the surface of the ground, with nothing but guys to retain it in an upright position, and that his servants are engaged in removing a pile of coal around its lower section, is bound to know that their safety requires the presence of a competent person to supervise the work of taking it down while the removal of the coal is in progress. Trainor v. Philadelphia & R. R. Co. (1890) 137 Pa. 148.

While men are rightfully at work on a trestle over which a railroad is operated, with the knowledge of the officers and persons operating the road, who know that the men are thereby placed in great danger, it is the duty of the company to operate and run its trains with care proportionate to the danger; and if it does not do so it is guilty of culpable negligence. Inter-State Consol. Rapid Transit R. Co. v. Fox (1889) 41 Kan. 715.

So far as the danger of making repairs in a railroad bridge may be increased by the damaged condition of the track from natural causes a trackman assumes the risk of such enhanced danger; but if it were increased by the neglect of the master to use proper care before the storm to keep the bridge in repair, or to ascertain the condition of the track or bridge after the storm, or to take such due and proper precautionary measures to prevent accidents to its employees as the exigencies of the situation might require, such risks are not assumed. The fact that he knew the track to be in a dilapidated condition and out of repair will not relieve the master from the discharge of his duty in the premises. Carlson v. Oregon Short Line & U. N. R. Co. (1892) 21 Or. 450.

In Knapp v. Sioux City & P. R. Co. (1887) 71 Iowa, 41, a request of defendant for the following instruction was held to have been rightly refused for the reason that it failed "to present the thought that defendant's employees used proper care in the inspection of the road, and in the exercise of such care, there was 'an apparent necessity' discovered by them to make the repairs required. . . . If the jury find from the testimony that the officers of the defendant employed skilful and competent men to look after and keep in repair its track, and furnished the requisite men and material to do the work and keep the track in good repair, and if you further find from the testimony that the track was frequently inspected by them, and that the old ties were taken out and replaced by new ties as often as there was any apparent necessity for so doing, you cannot find that the defendant was negligent in keeping and maintaining its track."

In Union P. R. Co. v. Jarvi (1892) 10 U. S. App. 439, 53 Fed. Rep. 65, 70, 3 C. C. A. 433, the roof in a dip slope where the accident happened was composed of a clay rock about 3 feet thick, which defendant's inspectors knew to be a treacherous rock needing constant watching, as it was of a kind that water disintegrated, while the only way it could be properly tested was by sounding it with the hand or a pick or cane. It had not been so tested or sounded for weeks although the chief inspector testified that it needed watching; that through the greater part of this dip slope the roof had proved so poor that the defendant had supported it with timber; that it had not done so at this point, and that at a point but a few feet distant, where the two slopes joined, this rock had so crumbled and fallen that defendant had blasted it all down, and removed it, two months before; and there was testimony that the roof at the place of the accident had long been wet. It was held to be a fair question for the jury whether or not the failure to protect this particular portion of the roof by timbers, or to remove it by blasting, was not a lack of ordinary care.

In Pantzar v. Tilly Foster Iron Min. Co. (1885) 99 N. Y. 368, where a piece of a cliff fell upon the plaintiff, the evidence was conflicting. On the part of the defendant it tended to show that the cliff was composed of gneiss, a mineral naturally marked by seams, joints, and foliations, and that it was in the frequent and continued habit of causing it to be examined, but that no appearances indicating immediate danger had been observed before the accident. Plaintiff's evidence showed that a large crack, parallel with and about 10 feet back from the upper angle of the face of the cliff, had long existed and was plainly visible; that the superintendent and foreman were warned of its dangerous character; that after an experiment which showed that it was increasing in width, they still took no precautions to support the rock while the workmen were engaged under it, although such precautions were practicable and frequently adopted in other mines, such as the use of braces of timbers or blasting off the overhanging rock. Also that a wall would have furnished a support to the projecting mass. The plaintiff's evidence also tended to show that the rock broke off at the place where the crack had been observed, and that with the fall the crack disappeared. The court upheld a verdict for the plaintiff, saying: "It must therefore, be assumed from the verdict of the jury that it was determined that the rock fell from a cause of which the defendant had notice, and that precautions which would have prevented the injury were not adopted, although they were practicable and of easy and safe application."

The falling of the roof of a mine is not one of the ordinary hazards of the service of a driver therein, where the employer upon notice of the condition of the roof has appointed a timberman to secure it, and the roof has been left in an insecure condition. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Scheiber (1896) 65 Ill. App. 304.

A railroad company which has notice of the violation of a rule adopted for the protection of an employee is charged with the duty of taking the necessary steps to correct the evil and obviate the injury. St. Louis, A. & T. R. Co. v. Triplett (1891) 54 Ark. 239, 304, 11 L. R. A. 773.

A master is bound by promulgating a proper rule or otherwise, to change a practice which, to its knowledge, has for a long time been followed by one set of his servants to the peril of another set. Dolng v. New York, O. & W. R. Co. (1897) 151 N. Y. 579, Reversing (1893) 73 Hun, 270. The practice complained of was the shunting of cars onto tracks leading to a repair shop, without adopting proper precautions for preventing the cars from running through doors of the shop, and for warning such employees as might be at work there.

The duty of the master to make rules will be fully treated in note to be shortly published in this series.

So far as regards the master's liability, the same result as if the cause of the danger were actually removed may obviously be attained if he refrains from ordering the servant to work in a place which has been ascertained to be dangerous. Consolidated Ice Mach. Co. v. Klefer (1888) 26 Ill. App. 486.

A master who is notified that posts upon which girders are to be set are insecurely fastened is guilty of little less than criminal negligence in sending carpenters to work upon them without bracing them. Herdler v. Buck's Stove & Range Co. (1896) 136 Mo. 3.

3. Servants.

The action which a master is bound to take after circumstances tending to prove the incompetency or unfitness of a servant have come to his knowledge is different according as those circumstances are such as to leave no doubt as to the incompetency or unfitness, or are merely such as would put a prudent man on inquiry as to the servant's capacity for his work.

On the one hand, therefore, it is the duty of the master to a servant to discharge any servants who, to his knowledge, have ceased to be competent and skilful. Laning v. New York C. R. Co. (1872) 49 N. Y. 521, 10 Am. Rep. 417; Michigan C. R. Co. v. Dolan (1875) 32 Mich. 509; Poirier v. Carroll (1883) 35 La. Ann. 699; Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Guyton (1888) 115 Ind. 450.

If the company continues the employee in its service after receiving such notice, it does so at its own risk, notwithstanding the fact that it may have made inquiry and decided that such servant was not negligent or incompetent. It is bound by the fact, whatever it may be. Ross v. Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. (1881) 2 McCrary, 235 (in charge to jury).

Where an employee was injured through the negligence of an engineer, evidence that the latter had frequently shown his recklessness and unfitness, and, notwithstanding complaints against him, was retained by the master, makes a case on which the plaintiff is entitled to recover, unless it is overthrown by a successful defense. Northern P. R. Co. v. Mares (1887) 123 U. S. 710, 31 L. ed. 206; Loe v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1894) 57 Mo. App. 350.

"When a master employs a competent and careful servant he has the right to rely upon the presumption that he will continue careful and skilful, and when notified that he has become careless, he is not ordinarily bound to discharge such servant without an investigation into such charge, unless such notice is accompanied by such evidence as leaves no doubt of the truth of such charge. A rule that would require the master to discharge a servant, careful and competent when employed, without investigation upon a charge of carelessness, would be a harsh one, and would often result in great injustice to employees." Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Stupak (1889) 123 Ind. 210. In that case the material charge against the defendant was that with notice of the negligence and carelessness of an engineer, it carelessly and negligently retained him in its service. The court said: "The jury found that the appellant had knowledge of the careless habits of Pool before the day on which the injury occurred, but this does not authorize us to say, as a matter of law, that it negligently retained him in its service after such knowledge."

culpable if he retains in his employ a servant with a bad repute well founded. Gier v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. (1895) 108 Cal. 129.

Reputation is not proof of incompetency, for a man's reputation may be at variance with his character or in accord with it. Gier v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. (1895) 108 Cal. 129.

The retention of a servant by the defendant's superintendent, after being informed by a servant of a single dereliction of duty, may be justifiable, but the receipt of such information imposes upon the superintendent greater vigilance in observing the conduct of such servant afterwards. Chapman v. Erie R. Co. (1874) 55 N. Y. 570.

All that a master is bound to do in regard to a servant who has been guilty of one act of negligence is to use ordinary care in investigating the cause of the accident and the competency of the servant. If by such an investigation the facts ascertained were such as would justify a prudent man in retaining the servant, the master is not liable as for negligence. Baulec v. New York & H. R. Co. (1872) 62 Barb. 623.

After the knowledge of the master has been established it is still for the jury to say where he was negligent in retaining the servant. Hoey v. Dublin & B. Junction R. Co. (1870) Ir. Rep. 5 C. L. 206.

Where the officers of a railroad company have had their attention directed to the intemperate habits of an employee it is their duty to make careful and frequent investigation as to the fact if they retain him in their service. Whether they performed this duty is a question for the jury to pass upon, for such information is sufficient to put them upon their guard. Michigan C. R. Co. v. Gilbert (1881) 46 Mich. 176.

A finding by the jury that the defendant had knowledge of the careless habits of its engineer before the day on which the injury occurred does not authorize it to be said, as a matter of law, that the defendant negligently retained him in its service after such knowledge. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Stupak (1889) 123 Ind. 210.

A case which seems to be wholly opposed to the general current of authority is Texas & N. O. R. Co. v. Tatman (1895) 10 Tex. Civ. App. 434, where it was held, for reasons which are not explained in the opinion, that the mere fact that a railroad company knows that its servants are negligent and careless will not render it liable to one for injuries inflicted on another by such negligence. This ruling is certainly wrong unless the court intended to make a distinction between habitual and isolated acts of negligence.

a. Length of time during which the employer has had knowledge of a danger.

That the master is liable if he does not at least begin to remove the cause of danger within a reasonable time after it is brought to his notice is a point upon which there is no difference of opinion.

If defects in fact exist, and are sufficiently patent to be discovered by careful inspection, the longer they are permitted to remain the greater the negligence. Hence it is not error to allow a plaintiff to prove that a defective switch which caused a derailment had been in the same condition for several weeks previously. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Webb (1893) 97 Ala. 162.

After defects in tools used by the employee have been called to the attention of the employer, and reasonable time has expired within which the employer ought to have furnished new or perfect tools, their continued use is gross negligence of the employer. Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Sadler (1887) 38 Kan. 128.

A master is liable for injuries caused by a defective elevator which he fails to repair within a reasonable time after the defect comes to his knowledge. Johnson v. Armour (1883) 18 Fed. Rep. 490.

A verdict finding a railroad company liable for the death of a brakeman killed while making a coupling, by steel rails which projected over the end of a flat car, will not be set aside, where the conductor in charge of the train observed the position of the rails thirty hours before the accident, and the company's practice was to side-track a car when in bad order, or to adjust rails when thus misplaced so that they should not project beyond the end of the car. Corbin v. Winona & St. P. R. Co. (1896) 64 Minn. 185. It should be observed that by the Minnesota statute of 1894, § 2701, the doctrine of common employment was abolished as to railroad companies.

A railroad company which has actual notice of the defective condition of a foreign car several hours before a servant is injured in handling it is liable for negligence if not in failing to repair it, at least in failing to place some sign upon it, warning employees of its condition. Denver, T. & Ft. W. R. Co. v. Smock (1897) 23 Colo. 456.

An employer whose machinery is defective and unsafe because of its long-continued use and wear and improper adjustment, of which defects and the consequent unsafe and dangerous condition of the machinery it has due notice and knowledge several weeks before an accident to an employee, is negligent where it fails without excuse to make the necessary repairs. Romona Oolitic Stone Co. v. Phillips (1894) 11 Ind. App. 118.

In Quincy Coal Co. v. Hood (1875) 77 Ill. 68, it was said that if the defendant company's superintendent had received notice of the dangerous condition of the roof of one of the gangways in its mine, long enough before the accident to have given time to repair, this was sufficient to make the company liable for an injury caused by the fall of the roof.

In Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Gilman (1891) 88 Va. 230, a railroad had for four years kept a chained log at the end of a wharf to arrest its cars, instead of providing a stronger structure fit for such a purpose. The court said: "Was not this negligence? The structure was temporary only, and not safe. This was known to the company, as better timbers were ordered, and yet, knowing the danger, and advised of the need, days were allowed to run into weeks, weeks into months, months into years, and still the temporary and unsafe structure had not been replaced by the permanent and substantial contrivance in use elsewhere, and which, if it had been in place on this wharf, would have arrested without danger these slowly moving cars. This was negligence beyond question, and this was the negligence in this case which caused the injury, and without which it would probably not have happened."

Under an employers' liability act worded like that of Alabama (Code, § 2590), a master cannot avail himself of the defense that the defect or obstruction by which an employee was injured was due to the act of a stranger, where it was not remedied or removed within a reasonable time after notice. Highland Ave. & B. R. Co. v. Walters (1890) 91 Ala. 435.

See also IV., supra.

Some authorities have undertaken to apply the converse of this principle in a form which would relieve the master from liability unless his knowledge, actual or constructive, was obtained sufficiently long before the injury was received to have enabled him to adopt remedial measures. Rulings to this effect under the common law are Erskine v. Chino Valley Beet-Sugar Co. (1896) 71 Fed. Rep. 270; Johnson v. Armour (1883) 18 Fed. Rep. 490.

All the other decisions in which the same view has been explicitly adopted seem to have been rendered in construing the employers' liability act of Alabama, but as the measure of the employer's duty has been declared to be essentially the same under that act as under the common law (Willson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1887) 85 Ala. 269) these rulings may be appropriately referred to here.

Mere notice of a defect in a machine or appliance, it has been said, "will not render an employer liable for negligence in failing to remedy it unless he had a reasonable time and opportunity for doing so after receiving the notice." Seaboard Mfg. Co. v. Woodson (1891) 94 Ala. 143, (1892) 98 Ala. 378, holding that a complaint is demurrable which merely alleges that a defect was known to some person intrusted by the master with the duty of seeing that the "ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition" (Code, § 2590), and fails to state how long before the accident the defect was so known.

In United States Rolling Stock Co. v. Weir (1892) 96 Ala. 396, it was held, following this case, that an instruction to the effect that the jury must find for the plaintiff if the defect which caused the injury was, or with proper diligence might have been, known to the defendant or his agents at the time the injury was suffered, is erroneous. The defendant must have had sufficient time to remedy the defect after its discovery before he can be chargeable with negligence in failing to effect the remedy.

The same view reappears in the ruling that defects in a track, when they arise, do not at once fasten a liability upon the railroad company. It is only after they have existed long enough for diligent supervision to discover and remedy them, that liability attaches. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Webb (1892) 97 Ala. 162.

These rulings last cited do not, it is submitted, take proper account of the fact that the servant is, for the purposes of the argument, to be considered as having no knowledge of the defective conditions, since it would otherwise be a controlling issue whether he would be precluded from recovering on the ground of an assumption of the risk or of contributory negligence.

That it is always a material question, whether the master exercised reasonable care and diligence in removing a danger after he had knowledge of its existence may be conceded. Alton Lime & Cement Co. v. Calvey (1893) 47 Ill. App. 343.

But it seems inequitable and unreasonable to declare that the servant should always be the one to suffer, simply because the employer has been reasonably prompt in taking the necessary steps for the repair of the defective instrumentality. The true rule, it is submitted, is that the duty of the master under these circumstances is not, as a matter of law, fully discharged, unless he at least sees that the servant is notified of the danger to which he will be exposed, while the abnormal conditions to which that danger is owing are being rectified. This would seem to be the rationale of a ruling by the supreme court of Pennsylvania that, where an employer is informed that certain machinery upon his premises, out of sight of his employees, is in a dangerous condition, and he takes steps to renew it, but, before such renewal is made, one of the employees, having no notice of the dangerous condition of the machinery, is injured by its breaking in the ordinary course of his employment, the question of the employer's negligence is for the jury. Murphy v. Crossan (1881) 98 Pa. 495.

The language of the court in Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Love (1858) 10 Ind. 554, is even stronger: "If a defect existed in the road which was known to the company, but which it was impossible for them to immediately remove or remedy, and in consequence thereof the road was unsafe, but not impassable, and yet they should place an employee upon the road, and suffer him, in ignorance of said defect, to attempt to operate it, and injury should thereby result to him, certainly there would be a liability."

See also the cases cited in section a of this subdivision as to the double duty incumbent on the employer after he has ascertained the existence of a given danger.

d. Duty to instruct the servant.

The cases on this subject will be fully reviewed in a note which will shortly be published in this series.

XV. Knowledge as an element of liability under statutes.

See also XIV. c, supra.

The statutes affecting servants fall into two categories: (1) those which specifically deal with the relations between employers and employed; (2) those which are applicable to all members of the community. The decisions under such statutes, so far as they are pertinent in the present connection, will be classified with reference to this consideration.

a. Decision under employers' liability acts.

As to the burden of proof under these statutes, see XVII. a, infra.

1. Statutes modifying the doctrine of common employment.

Several statutes have been passed both in England and the United States, the main object of which has been to qualify the rigor of the common-law principle which disabled the servant from recovering damages for an injury caused by the negligence of a fellow servant. In effect, therefore, the result of these enactments has been simply to extend the area within which personal negligence will be imputed to the master, and not to relieve the servant of the burden of establishing the existence of the various essential factors which go to make up the conception of negligence. Knowledge on the part of the master being one of those factors, it would follow, quite apart from any, explicit provisions in the statutes themselves that no intention to alter the common law in this direction would be imputed to the legislature. But the absence of such an intention is not a mere matter of implication so far as regards the three most elaborate of the statutes, namely, those of England, Massachusetts, and Alabama. All these declare that the servant shall not be entitled to recover, unless the defect which is relied upon as a cause of action "arose from, or had not been discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the employer, or of some person in 41 L. R. A.

the service of the employer, and intrusted by him with the duty of seeing that the ways, works, machinery, or plant were in proper condition." 43 & 44 Vict. chap. 42, § II, 1; Ala. Code, § 2590, subs. 5; Mass. Stat. 1887, chap. 270, § 1, subs. 1.

Such a provision, it is manifest, is simply declaratory of the common-law rule that, without proof of the master's knowledge, he cannot be held liable for an injury caused by the defective condition of his instrumentalities, and so it has been uniformly held. Walsh v. Whiteley (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 371, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 536, 36 Week. Rep. 876, 53 J. P. 38; Morgan v. Hutchins (1890) 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 197; Griffiths v. London & St. K. Docks Co. (1884) L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 259, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 504, 51 L. T. N. S. 533, 33 Week. Rep. 35, 49 J. P. 100, per Fry, L. J., Followed in Rudd v. Bell (1887) 13 Ont. Rep. 47; Ragotte v. Canadian P. R. Co. (1888) 5 Manitoba L. Rep. 365.

Under the Alabama statute negligence in causing, or failing to discover or remedy, a defect is essential to liability. Wilson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1887) 85 Ala. 269.

The common-law rule that a master is not liable for an injury caused by a latent defect,—that is to say, one which was not discoverable by the exercise of reasonable care on his part,—is equally applicable to actions brought under these statutes. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Campbell (1893) 97 Ala. 147; Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1891) 155 Mass. 21.

The mere fact of age and long use of a stick which broke while being used as a lever, causing the death of an employee, will not justify a finding that the employer ought to have known the stick to be defective so as to render him liable under the Massachusetts employers' liability act. Allen v. G. W. & F. Smith Iron Co. (1894) 160 Mass. 557.

Under the original Massachusetts act the common-law rule established by Mackin v. Boston & A. R. Co. (1883) 135 Mass. 201, 46 Am. Rep. 456 (see X., b, 6, supra), that a railway company was not liable for the negligence of its car inspectors, was declared not to have been changed in regard to foreign cars received merely for forwarding. Thyng v. Fitchburg R. Co. (1892) 156 Mass. 13. Compare also Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1891) 155 Mass. 21.

But this decision is possibly no longer a correct statement of the law since the passage of the amendatory act of 1893, chap. 359, declaring that the mere fact of a car being in possession of a railroad company makes it a part of its "ways, works, or machinery."

As regards foreign cars used for its own benefit, there seems to be no question that the company's duty in regard to them under the statutes is that of furnishing, and not merely of inspection, of appliances, and that, for this reason, the reasoning which led the court in Mackin's Case (1893) 135 Mass. 201, 46 Am. Rep. 456, to the conclusion that car inspectors were not vice principals, is no longer of any effect. See Bowers v. Connecticut River R. Co. (1894) 162 Mass. 312 (a case where a loaded car was received for transportation); Spaulding v. W. N. Flynt Granite Co. (1893) 159 Mass. 587 (where the car was borrowed).

In Walsh v. Whiteley (1888) L. R. 21 Q. B. Div. 371, 57 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 536, 36 Week. Rep. 876, 53 J. P. 38, the question was whether there was any evidence of any defect in the condition of the machinery within the meaning of § 1, subs. 1, of the English employers' liability act. The court said: "We think there was not. To determine the meaning of the words 'defect in the condition of the machinery' we must look not only at § 1, subs. 1, but also at § 2, subs. 1. Reading those sections and subsections together, we think there must be a defect implying negligence in the employer. The negligence of the employer appears to be a necessary element without which the workman is not to be entitled to any compensation or remedy. It must be a defect in the condition of the machine, having regard to the use to which it is to be applied or to the mode in which it is to be used. It may be a defect either in the original construction of the machine, or a defect arising from its not being kept up to the mark, but it is essential that there should be evidence of negligence of the employer or some person in his service intrusted with the duty of seeing that the machine is in proper condition. It must be a defect in the original construction or subsequent condition of the machine rendering it unfit for the purposes to which it is applied when used with reasonable care and caution, and a defect arising from the negligence of the employer."

The scope of this decision has been still further extended in a later case in which it was held that a "defect" exists within the meaning of the employers' liability act (43 & 44 Vict. chap. 42) § 1, subs. 1, and § 2, subs. 1, where a machine is defective with reference to danger and the defect is within the knowledge of the employer, and that the danger which may arise from the unguarded condition of a cog-wheel comes within this description. Morgan v. Hutchins (1890) 59 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 197, where Lord Esher said: "The argument in the present case is that there is no defect in machinery if the machine in question is in itself a proper one for the work it is to perform. It must be carried to this length, that if the machine contains a secret defect which causes danger to the workman, but which does not affect the purposes for which it is to be used, then this is not a defect within the meaning of the act. Now this leather pressing machine cannot be worked without workmen; without labor it is useless as a machine. Surely this fact of itself is something that has to do with the condition of the machine. If its condition be such that the workman cannot do his part with safety, is that or is it not, a defect in the condition of a machine the working of which is a necessary performance? It seems to me that unless we hold the defect complained of here to be one within the subsection in question, the act might as well have never been passed."

The construction put upon the clause of the Massachusetts act making the master liable for the negligence of "a person exercising superintendence" appears from such rulings as these (Stat. 1887 chap. 270, § 1, subs. 2).

A person employed to drill in a stone quarry does not assume the risk that the superintendent will negligently attempt to remove a charge of gunpowder by drilling into a hole that has been charged, before ascertaining that the charge has been exploded. Malcolm v. Fuller (1890) 152 Mass. 160, Distinguishing Kenney v. Shaw (1882) 133 Mass. 501, decided before the statute was passed.

That the superintendent of a quarry has assumed to inspect exploders used by the employees will not affect the owner's liability to an employee caused by a defective exploder, where it was no part of the owner's business to have an inspection made, unless he knew and consented to the superintendent's performing the work as a part of that which he was employed to do. Such an inspection is regarded as supererogatory and outside of the scope of his employment. Shea v. Wellington (1895) 163 Mass. 364.

Under the provision of Ala. Code 1886, § 2590, subs. 1, negligence in causing, or failing to discover or remedy, a defect is essential to liability, and the measure of the master's duty to the servant is essentially the same, whether the right of recovery is referred to the statute or to common-law principles. Wilson v. Louisville & N. R. Co. (1887) 85 Ala. 269.

Where one of the counts is framed under the same provision, and alleges that the defective condition of a brake "was not remedied or discovered owing to the negligence of the defendant, or of some person in his employ intrusted with and exercising superintendence, or whose sole or principal duty was superintendence," it is error to exclude testimony going to show that no inspection was made of a foreign car which came from a certain line. Such evidence, if it is offered merely for the purpose of showing a single omission of duty, is incompetent for the reason that the car inspectors are the fellow servants of the trainmen. But it has a tendency to show under what rules, instructions, and superintendence the inspectors were acting, and that these were insufficient to provide proper inspection. Coffee v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. (1891) 155 Mass. 21.

Under the corresponding clause of the Alabama act (Code, § 2590, subs. 5), the reference of negligence has been held to be "sure and certain," where a foreman in charge of a hand-car, with knowledge that the operators are at times in the habit of turning loose the lever on a down grade and standing without support, suddenly applies the brakes on such a grade without notice to the operators and without looking to see whether they are holding to the lever. Kansas City, M. & B. R. Co. v. Crocker (1891) 95 Ala. 412.

According to Lord Watson the English act of 1880 has greatly diminished the responsibility of the master, so far as it depends upon his knowledge of the danger to which the servant was exposed. In Smith v. Baker [1891] A. C. 325 (p. 356), he commented thus upon § 2, subs. 3, of that act, specifically requiring the servant to notify his employer or his superior officer of the existence of any "defect or negligence" which has come to his knowledge. "I think the object and effect of the enactment are to relieve the employer of liability for injuries occasioned by defects which were neither known to him nor to his delegates down to the time when the injury was done. At common law his ignorance would not have barred the workman's claim, as he was bound to see that his machinery and works were free from defect, and so far the provision operates in favor of the employer." (Followed in Webster v. Foley (1892) 21 Can. S. C. 580).

A law requiring mine owners to provide hoisting machinery which will keep the miners safe "as far as possible" is not complied with, where a valve of the hoisting engine of a mine cage is defective, to the knowledge of the officers of the defendant, so as to allow the steam to escape through it and start the engine automatically, and the mining company is liable for the death of a miner caused by such unexpected starting. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Mehl (1888) 31 Ill. App. 252.

2. Statutes embodying common-law rules.

In Gier v. Los Angeles Consol. Electric R. Co. (1895) 108 Cal. 129, it was contended that the provision of the Civil Code, § 1970, which exempts an employer from liability for the negligence of the fellow servant of the plaintiff unless he has failed to use ordinary care "in the selection" of such servant did not apply to cases in which negligence in retaining only was shown; but the court declined to accept this view, remarking that, if necessary, it would not hesitate to construe the employer's acts, under such circumstances, as constituting a new selection of the negligent employee, but that this was not requisite, because § 1971 declared generally that the employer must "in all cases indemnify his employee for losses caused by his want of ordinary care," and that such want might be shown as well by the retention of an unfit employee after knowledge of the fact, as by a failure to use due diligence at the time of his selection.

Under the similar provision of the Dakota Civ. Code, § 1131, it has been held to be culpable negligence on the part of a railroad company to allow machinery to remain out of repair, when its condition is brought to the notice of an officer [here a yard master] whose knowledge is imputed to the company, or might have been ascertained, upon proper inspection, by its agent charged with the duty of keeping them in repair. Northern P. R. Co. v. Herbert (1888) 116 U. S. 642, 29 L. ed. 755.

3. Acts imposing liability for wilful omissions of duty.

Under the Missouri act March 23, 1881, §§ 14, 16, giving a right of action for an injury caused by the "wilful failure" of the owner, etc., of a coal mine to keep a supply of timber for props when required, it is a condition of recovery that defendant had notice that the timber and props were required, and, with such notice, neglected and refused to supply them. Leslie v. Rich Hill Coal Min. Co. (1892) 110 Mo. 81.

Where there is no reason but the lapse of time for supposing that repairs are needed in a structure, the failure to repair does not constitute "wilful neglect" within the purview of a statute (Ky. Gen. Stat. chap. 57, § 8) giving the widow, etc., of one killed by such negligence a right to recover punitive damages. Reinder v. Black & P. Coal Co. (1890) 12 Ky. L. Rep. 30.

Under the same statute, the fact that a car by which a brakeman was killed while coupling it with another was improperly loaded by reason of the fact that lumber projected over the end so as to interfere with the space necessary for coupling, or even the fact that the conductor knew that the car was improperly loaded, does not of itself show wilful neglect; but to constitute such neglect it must appear that the conductor or other person in charge of the train knew, or by the use of ordinary care could have known, that the car was so improperly loaded as to imperil the life of the servant or employee. Louisville & N. E. Co. v. Brice (1898) 84 Ky. 298.

4. Statutes modifying the rules of evidence.

The 2d section of Ohio Stat. April 2, 1890, runs as follows: "If the employee of any such corporation shall receive any injury by reason of any defect in any car or locomotive, or the machinery or attachments thereto belonging, owned, and operated, or being run and operated by such corporation, such corporation shall be deemed to have had knowledge of such defect before and at the time such injury is so sustained, and when the fact of such defect shall be made to appear in the trial of any action in the courts of this state, brought by such employee, or his legal representatives, against any railroad corporation for damages, on account of such injuries so received, the same shall be prima facie evidence of negligence on the part of such corporation." Construing this provision in Columbus, H. V. & T. R. Co. v. Erick (1894) 51 Ohio St. 146, the court said: "The presumption of knowledge of the defect, before and at the time of the injury, is, by this statute, chargeable to the company; and this statutory presumption cannot be overcome by proof of facts which only raise a presumption that the company did not have such knowledge. Competent and careful inspectors are presumed to properly inspect the cars and their attachments, but such presumption would not overcome the statutory presumption of knowledge of defects before and at the time of the injury. It would take an actual and proper inspection, or its equivalent, to overcome the statutory presumption of knowledge of such defects."

Under the same provision a railroad company is liable for an injury to an employee from the sudden starting of a locomotive by reason of leaky valves, although it may not have had actual notice of the defect. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Raits (1894) 10 Ohio C. C. 70.

By virtue of the provisions of the 3d section of the same statute, a chief inspector of cars, having other inspectors under him, is not the fellow servant of a brakeman. Columbus, H. V. & T. R. Co. v. Erick (1894) 51 Ohio St. 146.

b. Damage acts.

The common-law rule that a servant cannot recover for injuries caused by defective machinery in the absence of knowledge, actual or constructive, on the employer's part, is applicable to actions brought under the various damage acts allowing the representatives of deceased persons to sue for the injury. Elliott v. St. Louis & I. M. R. Co. (1878) 67 Mo. 272 (a ruling upon 1 Wagner's Stat. (Mo.) p. 520, § 3).

XVI. Pleading.

The rules of pleading in the type of cases now under discussion have necessarily been touched upon to some extent in foregoing discussions of general principles; but it will be of service to the practitioner if we collect in one subdivision the authorities bearing directly upon the subject.

a. Necessity for an averment of knowledge on the master's part.

The principle underlying all the cases cited in the foregoing portion of this note, that the employer cannot be held liable to a servant on the ground of negligence unless he is proved to have had knowledge, actual or constructive, of the abnormal condition of his instrumentalities which caused the servant's injury, has been considered by most courts to involve the corollary that an averment to the effect that the employer had such knowledge is essential to the sufficiency of the servant's declaration.

This averment was contained in the following English cases decided under the old rule of pleading: Tarrant v. Webb (1856) 18 C. B. 797, 25 L. J. C. P. N. S. 261; Roberts v. Smith (1857) 2 Hurlst. & N. 218, 26 L. J. Exch. N. S. 819, 3 Jur. N. S. 469; Williams v. Clough (1858) 3 Hurlst. & N. 258, 27 L. J. Exch. N. S. 325; Brown v. Accrington Cotton Spinning & Mfg. Co. (1865) 3 Hurlst. & C. 511, 34 L. J. Exch. N. S. 208, 13 L. T. N. S. 94; Davies v. England (1864) 83 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 321, 10 Jur. N. S. 1235; Mellors v. Shaw (1861) 1 Best & S. 437, 30 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 333, 7 Jur. N. S. 845; Hall v. Johnson (1865) 3 Hurlst. & C. 569, 34 L. J. Exch. N. S. 222, 11 Jur. N. S. 190, 11 L. T. N. S. 779, 13 Week. Rep. 411; Griffiths v. Gidlow (1858) 3 Hurlst. & N. 648, 27 L. J. Exch. N. S.

404; Senior v. Ward (1859) 1 El. & El. 385; Ashworth v. Stanwix (1861) 30 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 183, 3 El. & El. 701, 7 Jur. N. S. 467, 4 L. T. N. S. 85.

The rule of pleading under the judicature act is the same. See Griffiths v. London & St. K. Docks Co. (1894) L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 259, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 504, 51 L. T. N. S. 533, 33 Week. Rep. 35, 19 J. P. 100, cited in b. infra.

A complaint is insufficient which neither alleges that the defendant had notice of the defect which caused the injury, nor states any facts from which such notice may be inferred. Pennsylvania Co. v. Congdon (1893) 134 Ind. 220.

In Jordan v. Wells (1878) 3 Woods, 527, permission was refused to bring suit against a receiver where petitioner merely alleged that "a person unskilled in running locomotives had been put in charge" by such receiver, and omitted to state that he employed the engineer with knowledge of his incompetency.

That a complaint which does not allege specifically the master's want of knowledge is defective and demurrable, is the established rule in Indiana where the old system of pleading is still in full vigor. Evansville & T. H. R. Co. v. Duell (1893) 134 Ind. 156, relying on the following cases: Indianapolis & C. R. Co. v. Love (1858) 10 Ind. 554; Columbus & I. C. R. Co. v. Arnold (1869) 31 Ind. 174; Pittsburgh, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Ruby (1871) 88 Ind. 294, 10 Am. Rep. 111; Brasil & C. Coal Co. v. Cain (1884) 98 Ind. 282; Slaterry v. Toledo & W. R. Co. (1864) 23 Ind. 81; Sullivan v. Toledo, W. & W. R. Co. (1877) 58 Ind. 26; Bogard v. Louisville, E. & St. L. R. Co. (1895) 100 Ind. 491; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Adams (1886) 105 Ind. 151; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Stupak (1886) 108 Ind. 1; Indiana, B. & W. R. Co. v. Dalley (1887) 110 Ind. 75; Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Stupak (1890) 123 Ind. 210.

To the same effect, see Chicago, St. L. & P. R. Co. v. Fry (1892) 131 Ind. 319; Arcade File Works v. Juteau (1896) 15 Ind. App. 461; Illinois C. R. Co. v. Jewell (1867) 46 Ill. 99, 92 Am. Dec. 240; Carruthers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1895) 55 Kan. 600.

An allegation that the defendant had knowledge of the defective condition of machinery includes actual and imputed knowledge, and sufficiently presents the issue whether there has been a negligent failure to inspect the machinery. Lake Erie & W. R. Co. v. McHenry (1894) 10 Ind. App. 525.

The same court, however, has recognized the doctrine that a complaint may be sufficient, even without a specific allegation of knowledge, where the facts stated raise the presumption that the defendant had such knowledge, as where the complaint is of the negligent maintenance of a low overhead bridge without any tell-tales to warn the trainmen. Pennsylvania Co. v. Sears (1894) 136 Ind. 460.

This ruling seems to be decidedly inconsistent with the position it has taken in other cases, and embodies what is virtually the same principle as that which is applied in the cases referred to below, which repudiate altogether the theory that a specific allegation of knowledge is necessary.

In jurisdictions where the new forms of pleading are observed there is no difficulty about the application of this liberal doctrine. Thus, it may be enforced with perfect propriety where the defendant is alleged to have been negligent in regard to inspection, for such an averment clearly charges him with a failure to know what he ought to have known.

to on the ground that it did not contain any allegation that the master had notice of the defect which caused the injury. But the court held the complaint sufficient, saying: "It is charged that the company carelessly and negligently omitted the usual and proper inspection of the car, or improperly inspected it, and also allowed the projecting bolt at the end of the car to remain without being cut off. The plaintiff was wholly unaware of the dangerous position of this bolt, and, while performing his duty, was thrown down by it and injured. These facts would seem to bring the case within the rule which imposes liability on the master for an injury to the servant occasioned by a defect in machinery furnished the servant to operate, where the master has been guilty of negligence in furnishing such machinery, or, knowing of a defect therein, fails to notify the servant of its existence. It is true, the defendant in the present case is a railroad corporation, and can only act through officers or agents. But this does not relieve it from responsibility for the negligence of its officers and agents whose duty it is to provide safe and suitable machinery for its road which its employees are to operate."

So, also, a declaration is not demurrable which, although it does not charge the defendant with knowledge of the defects which caused the injury, avers that such defects "would have been known to the defendants but for the want of all proper care and diligence on their part." Noyes v. Smith (1856) 28 Vt. 59, 65 Am. Dec. 222.

Under the old rules of pleading it was held that a declaration in an action for injuries received by a servant in executing certain work outside of the scope of his employment is insufficient where it merely alleges that the defendants required the plaintiff to do that work, well knowing at the time that the plaintiff was unfit for such duty, and contains no averment that the defendants knew there was danger in the work, or even that the work was dangerous. Smyly v. Glasgow & L. Steam Packet Co. (1868) 16 Week. Rep. 463.

In some cases it has been held that the employer's knowledge need not be affirmatively averred where there is a general allegation of negligence.

This is the accepted doctrine in West Virginia. Hoffman v. Dickinson (1888) 31 W. Va. 142.

In South Carolina also it has been held that in an action to recover damages for an injury done by a master to his servant, an allegation that the injury was sustained by reason of neglect of duty on the master's part in furnishing proper machinery for the work required of the servant is not insufficient in failing to allege further that the master knew of the defect in the machinery; as want of knowledge, through no absence of due diligence in acquiring it, is a matter of defense, and therefore need not be set forth as a part of plaintiff's cause of action. Branch v. Port Royal & W. C. R. Co. (1892) 35 S. C. 405. The court said: "We think, therefore, that knowledge on the part of the defendant company in this case of the defect in the machinery, by reason of which the injury complained of was sustained, constitutes no part of the plaintiff's cause of action, but is a matter of defense. Indeed, to hold otherwise would, as it seems to us, in violation of the well-settled rule as to the degree of negligence which would make the master liable to his servant, require a much higher degree of negligence; for where a master knowingly furnishes his servant with machinery so defective as to be unsafe, he displays such a reckless disregard of human life, that his conduct could not properly be characterized as exhibiting anything less than the grossest negligence. If, therefore, knowledge on the part of the master of the defect in the machinery constitutes an essential element in the cause of action, then it follows that the only degree of negligence for which a master could be held liable for an injury sustained by his servant, by reason of a defect in the machinery with which he is furnished to do the work for which he is employed, would be the grossest negligence; but if it is held, as we do hold, that want of knowledge on the part of the master is a matter of defense, which, if shown, may excuse the failure to perform an acknowledged duty, then no such consequence follows, and the well-settled rule of ordinary negligence may be applied."

In Illinois the inference that a specific allegation that the defendant knew of the defect which caused the servant's injury is not necessary where the duty to keep the instrumentality free from defects and the breach of that duty are averred, has been deduced from the general principle that the law charges every accountable person with a knowledge of his duty, and of what he has or has not done. A complaint, therefore, which sets out the master's duty and its nonfulfillment must, in this point of view, be regarded as embracing, by implication, an allegation that he knew what his obligation was in the premises, and his own failure to do what was incumbent upon him by reason of that obligation. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Hines (1890) 132 Ill. 161.

In Missouri a distinction seems to be taken between cases in which the breach of duty is one of failing to repair, and those in which the breach is a failure to provide instrumentalities.

If the former omission is the gravamen of the complaint, the petition must allege that the master had knowledge, actual or constructive, of the condition of the instrumentality. Current v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1885) 86 Mo. 62.

On the other hand, it is held that a petition, in an action by a servant against a master for furnishing defective machinery, setting forth the facts, need not specifically allege that the master knew, or might have known, of the defect, or aver absence of knowledge or means of knowledge of defect on the part of the plaintiff. Crane v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1885) 87 Mo. 588. The court said: "To sustain the allegation in the petition that defendant negligently furnished a car that was defective and unsafe, the plaintiff would be required to prove the fact that the car was unsafe; and, also, the fact that defendant either knew, or by ordinary care might have known, of the defect, because without such proof the charge of negligence would be unsustainable. The charge that defendant negligently furnished a defective and unsafe car, stating wherein it was defective, is as broad as if the charge had been that the defendant furnished such car, which it either knew, or might have known by due care, was defective and unsafe. In either case he would have to make the same proof." This case was followed in Johnson v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1888) 96 Mo. 340.

In Hall v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1881) 74 Mo. 208, we find the following ruling: "A petition which alleges that defendant, a railroad company, negligently and carelessly permitted a loose iron rail to remain upon the path alongside the track used by switchmen in the necessary discharge of their duties, is not defective by reason of the omission to allege that defendant had knowledge, or by ordinary attention to its duties would have known, that the rail lay upon the path. The omitted statement is substantially contained in the allegation made." This case may perhaps be explained on the theory that the petition implied alleged negligence in regard to inspection. Otherwise it is not very easy to reconcile it with the distinction apparently made by the court between a failure to repair, and a failure to provide, appliances.

At one time the same relaxation of the common rule was admitted in Indiana. Louisville, E. & St. L. Consol. R. Co. v. Utz (1892) 123 Ind. 265; Pittsburgh, C. & St. L. R. Co. v. Adams (1886) 105 Ind. 151; Cleveland, C. C. & I. R. Co. v. Wynant (1895) 100 Ind. 160; Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Percy (1891) 128 Ind. 197. See also New Albany Forge & Rolling Mill v. Cooper (1892) 131 Ind. 363, noted in XVII., a. infra.

But these cases were definitely overruled by Evanville & T. H. R. Co. v. Duel (1893) 134 Ind. 156. There the court made the following comments on two earlier cases: "In Jenney Electric Light & P. Co. v. Murphy (1888) 115 Ind. 566, it is said, on page 568: 'If an employee, reposing confidence, as he has a right to, in the prudence and caution of the employer, relies upon the adequacy of the implements put into his hands to work with, and upon the safety of the place assigned him to work, and sustains injury in consequence of the failure or neglect of the employer to disclose latent defects or perils which the latter knew, or which he should have known of by the exercise of reasonable diligence, the employee is entitled to remuneration for his loss,'—citing numerous authorities. While we do not regard this holding as at variance with any of the cases cited by us, we cite it as probably suggesting this conclusion: That where the defect or peril is latent, it should appear affirmatively that the master knew of it, or such facts should be pleaded as to show that by reasonable diligence he should have known it. . . . The case of Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Percy (1891) 128 Ind. 197, is suggested as in conflict with the earlier cases cited in this opinion. If such conflict existed we should not hesitate to hold with the great weight of authority against the pleading in question here; but in that case, as we understand it, the turning point is upon the allegations of the Jurators of the defect complained of, for such time as that the court held the defendant to have had imputed knowledge of the defect. The allegation was that the defect existed on the day of the injury, 'and for many days prior thereto.' Whether that case can be upheld is not now a question before us."

The converse of the above principle is exemplified in such rulings as these:

A count alleging that the defendants, well knowing that certain carcasses of animals were diseased and infectious, employed the plaintiff, who was ignorant that they were diseased, to cut them up, whereby the plaintiff became infected and was injured, discloses a good cause of action. Davies v. England (1864) 33 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 321, 10 Jur. N. S. 1235.

In an action against a railroad company for damages sustained by reason of a defective switch-lock, causing a derailment of an engine and cars, the complaint is sufficient, which alleges the duty of defendant in the premises, and also knowledge of, and negligence concerning, the defective machinery, and plaintiff's freedom from contributory negligence. Ohio & M. R. Co. v. Heaton (1894) 137 Ind. 1.

A complaint alleging the building of a railroad bridge of insufficient height over its track; that the company had knowledge of the fact, and that it was unsafe for its brakemen; that plaintiff was ignorant of the fact; that while in the course of his employment he was struck by the bridge and injured,—is good on demurrer. Baltimore & O. & C. R. Co. v. Rowan (1886) 104 Ind. 88. The court said: "It will not do, we think, to say that these facts were not sufficient to constitute a cause of action against appellant for the recovery of such damages as appellee sustained. It seems to us that a railroad company is, and ought to be, required to construct and maintain its roadway and appendages, and its overhead structures, in such manner and condition that its employee or servant can do and perform all the labors and duties required of him, with reasonable safety."

Where the plaintiff was hurt while he was undertaking to pass over a revolving shaft, the negligence of the defendant is sufficiently alleged, where there is an averment to the effect that it was negligence to construct the shaft without a covering so as to protect employees from it while the machinery was in operation, as it was dangerous in that condition; that the danger was known to the defendant, or might have been known by the exercise of reasonable care; and that such danger was not known to appellant. Miller v. Itasca Cotton Seed Oil Co. (1897, Tex. Civ. App.) 41 S. W. 866.

b. Necessity for an averment of ignorance on the plaintiff's part.

It is well settled that "an employee cannot recover for an injury suffered in the course of his business from defective machinery, unless the employer knew or ought to have known of it, and the employee did not know it, or had not equal means of knowing it." Hayden v. Smithville Mfg. Co. (1861) 29 Conn. 548.

To bar the servant's action, "the unfitness of the instrumentality must have been unknown to him, or such as a reasonable exercise of skill and diligence in his department of service would not, have discovered to him." 2 Thomp. Neg. 971. Quoted with approval in Stiles v. Ritchie (1896) 8 Colo. App. 393.

This was the English rule of pleading before the passage of the judicature act of 1873, and it remained unaltered by that act.

In Griffiths v. London & St. K. Docks Co. (1884) 41 L. R. 13 Q. B. Div. 259, 53 L. J. Q. B. N. S. 504, 51 L. T. N. S. 533, 33 Week. Rep. 35, 49 J. P. 100, Affirming L. R. 12 Q. B. Div. 493, and Approving Williams v. Clough (1858) 3 Hurlst. & N. 258, 27 L. J. Exch. N. S. 325, as a whole, but not expressing any opinion as to the suggestion of Bramwell, B., that the declaration ought to have gone further and shown that the servant had not the means of knowing the danger, it was said by Bowen, L. J.: "The old form of declaration used to show that the danger which caused the accident was known to the master and unknown to the servant. Both these allegations are material, because without them there is no cause of action, and unless it was proved at the trial directly, or that there were facts from which it might be inferred, that the servant was ignorant of the danger, he would be nonsuited."

In the same case also it was remarked by Brett, M. R.: "The question is whether a prima facie cause of action is shown in the statement of claim in this action. Now where it is an action by a servant against his master for the wrongful condition of machinery on the premises on which the servant is to act, or of the condition of the means by which the services of the servant are to be fulfilled, if the servant confines the allegations in his statement of claim to alleging the existence of danger in any of these things owing to the negligence of the master, he shows no cause of action. That was decided many years ago by Priestley v. Fowler (2) (1837) 3 Mees. & W. 1, Bluph. & H. 306, 1 Jur. 987. If the danger is one which was known to the master and not to the servant, the knowledge of the master and the want of knowledge of the servant make together a cause of action, and as it is necessary that these two things should exist in order to form a prima facie cause of action, it is necessary that they should be shown to exist in the statement of claim."

Watling v. Oastler (1871) L. R. 6 Exch. 73, 40 L. J. Exch. 43, 23 L. T. N. S. 815, 19 Week. Rep. 388, was distinguished on the ground that the ignorance of the plaintiff was to be inferred from the averment in the declaration "by reason of the premises" which involve such ignorance (per Bowen, L. J.).

A complaint is not demurrable on the ground that because it alleges a defect in a coupling apparatus to have been "patent and open to the inspection of the railway company if an examination of the same had been made," it shows the defect to have been one which was obvious to ordinary careful observation, and consequently one which the plaintiff might have avoided by the exercise of due care. The words will be construed as meaning that the defect was one which could have been easily discovered in a careful examination by the company's inspectors. Louisville, N. A. & C. R. Co. v. Howell (1896) 147 Ind. 266.

The same rule has been laid down in some American cases: Big Creek Stone Co. v. Wolf (1894) 133 Ind. 496; Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Jackson (1888) 85 Va. 489; Bogenachuts v. Smith (1860) 84 Ky. 330.

But although such an averment is most commonly inserted, it would scarcely be held indispensable by any court which has adopted the more liberal theories of modern pleading which are accepted in most of the states.

In West Virginia the petition need not allege ignorance on the plaintiff's part. Hoffman v. Dickinson (1888) 81 W. Va. 142.

Some cases require the servant to allege also his own freedom from contributory negligence. Whether such an averment is necessary depends upon the view which may be held as to the burden of proof in regard to that defense, and upon the strictness with which the formal rules of pleading may be adhered to. But the question does not involve any elements peculiar to actions by injured servants, and for the decisions on the subject reference must be had to general treatises on negligence.

If the plaintiff's want of skill is relied on for the purpose of showing that the injuries did not proceed from the plaintiff's own carelessness, it must be shown that the work required skill. This will not be inferred from averments that the defendants knew they had not employed a skillful person to do the work, and knew that the plaintiff was unskilled, and an unfit and improper person. Smyly v. Glasgow & L. Steam Packet Co. (1868) 16 Week. Rep. 483.

c. What particularity is required in the servant's petition.

In an action for injuries caused by the defective condition of an engine, a complaint is sufficiently specific which alleges that the throttle leaked, and that there were other defects known to the defendant and unknown to the plaintiff. Wabash & W. R. Co. v. Morgan (1892) 132 Ind. 430.

A count charging the employer with liability by reason of the known incompetency of a servant is not demurrable because it does not set out the particulars of the incompetency. Johnston v. Canadian P. R. Co. (1892) 50 Fed. Rep. 584.

The exact time that a railway company has known of the defective condition of an engine, and of the incompetency and carelessness of an engineer, is not so material that the court will grant a motion to make a complaint more specific, on the ground that it merely alleges that these facts have been long known to the defendant. Wabash & W. R. Co. v. Morgan (1892) 132 Ind. 430.

A plaintiff is not required to state in his complaint the names of the officers of the defendant through whom he expects to bring notice to the defendant of the negligent habits of the engineer in charge of a train upon which the plaintiff was injured. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Stupak (1890) 123 Ind. 210.

An averment of knowledge is sufficient. The evidentiary facts showing how the defendant knew need not be alleged. Consolidated Coal Co. v. Scheiber (1896) 65 Ill. App. 304.

As a matter of pleading, it is not material whether the alleged defect, provided it is pointed out with particularity, was in the construction or arose from the want of repair. Gutridge v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1887) 94 Mo. 408.

A general averment that the defendant violated his duty in being ignorant of the quality of a flagstone on which the plaintiff was required to stand in doing his work is not sufficient. The complaint must set forth the facts out of which the duty to furnish such an agency arises, and also allege knowledge on the master's part that it was of such a quality as to expose to danger anyone who stood upon it. Potts v. Plunkett (1859) 9 Ir. C. L. Rep. 290.

But certain formal defects are cured by the verdict:

In St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Harper (1894) 44 Ark. 524, the court, in discussing a complaint, said: "Critically considered his complaint charges an injury to a servant by a coservant, and nothing more. It is the well-established rule of this court that the master cannot be made to respond in damages for this. The defendant, however, made no objection to the sufficiency of the complaint, but denied all knowledge of defects in the exploded engine, as well as a want of care on its part, and permitted the plaintiff to introduce evidence tending to show that the boiler of the engine which caused the injury was defective, and that the agents of the company who were charged with the duty of repairing it, ought to have known of the defects. After verdict for the plaintiff the complaint may be considered as amended to conform to this proof, and the defendant can take nothing by the motion in arrest of judgment. The court was right in overruling it."

d. Necessity for an agreement between the allegations and the proof.

Where a workman in the employ of a telegraph company is injured through a defective telegraph pole, the allegation of negligence is sustained by proving the danger from the defect in the pole, and that it was known to the defendants. Byron v. New York State Printing Teleg. Co. (1857) 28 Barb. 39.

A declaration alleging that the defendant carelessly and negligently permitted a railroad track and a car to become and remain defective is sustained by evidence that they became and remained defective through his personal negligence in not discovering and remedying the defects, if he took upon himself that branch of the business. Fifield v. Northern R. Co. (1860) 42 N. H. 225.

In Michigan C. R. Co. v. Doan (1875) 82 Mich. 510, the special incompetence alleged in the proof was that, when the offending servant was awakened by the person whose duty it was to awaken and call the conductors who were to run trains, he told the caller he did not feel able to go, and the latter told him he would have to go because there was no one else to go. The court remarked that it was questionable whether the declaration averred anything which would authorize proof of general incompetence; but there was, in their opinion, no proof either that the servant was incompetent, or that there was any reason to suppose it; that question was regarded as immaterial.

In Current v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1885) 86 Mo. 62, the charge in the petition was that a handhold was "imperfectly, defectively, and dangerously constructed, in this, that it was not fastened to the brakestaff securely and safely," etc. The court said: "The plain meaning of this charge is that the handhold was so constructed originally that the defect was in the design itself. Such being the cause of action alleged, in order to make a good petition, it was necessary to state that the company negligently or carelessly adopted that hand-brake or continued to use it after ascertaining its unfitness. We are inclined to the opinion that the petition does not state any cause of action. But, however that may be, it certainly was error to admit evidence that the hand-brake was out of repair, and that the company neglected to repair it. No such cause of action was stated in the petition, and there was an entire failure of proof of the cause of action alleged. There was no evidence adduced by plaintiff tending to prove that the brakewheel or handhold was imperfectly, defectively, or dangerously constructed, but only that from use its fastening to the brakestaff had been weakened."

Where there is no allegation in the complaint that the defendant had been negligent in ascertaining the habits of its engineer, or that it has failed to avail itself of the means at its command to ascertain such habits, so much of the special verdict as finds that the defendant had ample means of knowing such habits will be regarded as a finding outside the issues, and will be disregarded by the supreme court. Lake Shore & M. S. R. Co. v. Stupak (1889) 123 Ind. 210.

In an action for injuries received by plaintiff while in defendant's employ in digging a shaft, where the complaint avers that, as a consequence of the careless manner in which the shaft was constructed, and the neglect of defendant in not planking or properly securing the sides thereof, without any fault on plaintiff's part, the sides of the shaft fell in upon him, and that defendant, "well knowing in the premises the danger of said shaft to those employed therein," negligently, etc., directed plaintiff to proceed to the bottom thereof and dig there, without advising him of the danger, etc., and the negligence shown by the proof (if any) is that defendant, being aware of the existence of a fissure in the side of the shaft (at a point where it caved in) neglected to inform plaintiff of it, the cause of action proved is substantially alleged in the complaint, or, at the least, the variance is not such as to mislead the defendant, and may be disregarded. Strahlendorf v. Rosenthal (1872) 30 Wis. 674.

XVII. Burden of proof; opinions as evidence.

As to statutes modifying the rules of evidence see, I, a, 4, supra.

a. Burden of proof.

The propositions of law upon which a verdict may be predicated for the plaintiff are (1) that there must have been a defect by reason of which the plaintiff was injured, and (2) if that is found, that the defendant must have been guilty of negligence in respect to it, which might be established by showing either that the defendant knew of such defect, or, as some of the authorities express it, ought to have known it, or, as more accurately expressed in others, that the defendant failed to exercise reasonable care and diligence to examine and ascertain whether the chain was defective, and that the exercise of such care would have discovered it. De Graff v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1879) 76 N. Y. 125.

To entitle a servant to recover for defects in the appliances of the business, he is ordinarily required to show, (1) that the appliance in question was defective; (2) that the employer knew, or ought to have known, of the defect; (3) that the employee did not know of it, and that the injury complained of resulted in spite of ordinary care on his part. Norfolk & W. R. Co. v. Jackson (1888) 85 Va. 489.

Where a railroad employee is injured while uncoupling cars, to create a liability, he must show, (1) the defective condition of the car; (2) an injury resulting therefrom; (3) notice, actual or presumptive, of such defect to the owner; (4) that the party injured was in the exercise of ordinary care. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Montgomery (1884) 15 Ill. App. 205.

In an action against a railroad company for the death of an engineer, an instruction that, if the jury find that such injuries and death were the result of defect or defects in the engine operated by the deceased; that the company operating the road knew of such defects, or might have known of them by the use of such care as a person of ordinary prudence would have used under similar circumstances; and that deceased did not know of such defects, and could not have known of them by the use of ordinary care and prudence, the plaintiff is entitled to recover,—is substantially correct. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Henry (1889) 75 Tex. 220, 220.

That the burden of proving the employer's knowledge of the danger to which the servant was exposed lies on the plaintiff, is necessarily implied in all the cases cited in the foregoing subdivisions of this note. The following additional cases may be referred to as laying down this principle in specific terms. Johnson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1892) 36 W. Va. 73; Arcade File Works v. Juteau (1896) 15 Ind. App. 461; Disher v. New York C. & H. R. R. Co. (1883) 94 N. Y. 622; Mentzer v. Armour (1883) 18 Fed. Rep. 375; Mason v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1892) 111 N. C. 482, 18 L. R. A. 845; Columbus, C. & I. Cent. R. Co. v. Troesch (1873) 68 Ill. 545, 18 Am. Rep. 578; Stafford v. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. (1885) 114 Ill. 244; St. Louis, A. & T. H. R. Co. v. Corgan (1891) 49 Ill. App. 229; Snodgrass v. Carnegie Steel Co. (1896) 173 Pa. 223; Condon v. Missouri P. R. Co. (1883) 78 Mo. 567; St. Louis, I. M. & S. R. Co. v. Gaines (1885) 46 Ark. 555; Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ledbetter (1885) 34 Kan. 326.

In Hudson v. Charleston, C. & C. R. Co. (1889) 104 N. C. 491, a judgment for the plaintiff was reversed on the ground that the trial judge erroneously charged the jury that if they found the appliance which caused the injury to be defective "it devolved on the defendant corporation to show that its condition was not, and could not by the exercise of reasonable care have been known to its officers."

In Atchison, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Ledbetter (1885) 34 Kan. 326, the appellate court set aside a verdict for the plaintiff, explaining its views as follows: "All the authorities hold that a railroad company in a case like the present is liable only for negligence, and that it devolves upon the plaintiff to show the negligence; or, in other words, that it devolves upon the plaintiff to prove all the facts which constitute or make apparent the alleged negligence. In the present case the plaintiff has failed to make any such showing. He has not shown, nor was it shown, that the railroad company had any knowledge of the defect existing in the draw-bar or in some of its accompanying appliances prior to or at the time of the injury, or that such defect had existed for any considerable length of time; nor what was the nature or character of the defect,—that it was obvious or manifest, or could have been discovered by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, or by any of the ordinary tests employed by car inspectors; nor that the car had not been properly inspected by the car inspectors at one or both of the yards at Emporia; and not showing any of these things we think the plaintiff has failed to show negligence on the part of the railroad company,—failed to show a cause of action against the railroad company,—and therefore he is not entitled to recover upon his present presentation of this case."

The same rule prevails in regard to actions brought under the various employers' liability acts which contain a provision making the master liable where the defect in the machinery or appliance which an employee was required to use "arose from, or was not discovered or remedied owing to, the negligence of the employer or some one in his employ charged in that behalf." The burden of proving that there was a defect answering this description is upon the employee alleging it. Louisville & N. R. Co. v. Davis (1890) 91 Ala. 487.

When the plaintiff has shown that the master ought to have known, the law does not put upon him the additional burden of knowing that the master knew what it was his duty to know. Ocean S. S. Co. v. Matthews (1890) 86 Ga. 418. The court said: "It being shown, therefore, by the plaintiff in this case, that he did not know of the defective condition of these implements, and that it was not his duty to inspect and apply them, but that his employment confined him to the lower hold of the ship where he did not and could not see them; and it being further shown that the defendant, whose duty it was to provide safe and suitable implements, on the contrary provided and employed implements which at and before the time of the injury were obviously unsafe and unfit, and on their face showed that they had been so long enough for their unsafe condition to have been discovered by the master in the exercise of ordinary diligence, it is not too much to assume that the defendant ought to have known of this condition; and it is asking little enough to require it to show that it did not know, or offer some excuse for not knowing. This defense, if it existed, could easily have been made; the proof must have lain within the defendant's reach; the hooks were in its possession—presumably so, at least; and if the plaintiff's evidence as to the condition of the hooks was untrue, the defendant could easily have disproved it. But it did not even attempt to do this; it neither denied nor explained; it introduced no evidence."

In the absence of an allegation that an employee was incompetent at the time he was employed, the court will presume that the master made all proper inquiries and investigations

Before hiring him. Davis v. Detroit & M. R. Co. (1870) 20 Mich. 105, 4 Am. Rep. 364.

Another way in which the rule as to the burden of proof may be stated is that the mere fact of there being a defect in the instrumentalities of the master, and of the servant's being injured thereby, does not justify the presumption that the master was negligent.

No presumption of negligence on the part of the master arises where "It does not appear that an appliance was originally defective, or that it had been so long in use as to render the duty of inspection necessary, or that the master had due notice of the defect." Kinney v. Corbin (1890) 132 Pa. 341.

The mere fact that an appliance furnished by an employer for the use of his employee was defective is insufficient to create a presumption of negligence so as to shift the burden of proof from the employee to the employer, but it must appear that the defect is an obvious one, or such as to be discoverable by the exercise of reasonable care. The France (1894) 20 U. S. App. 212, 59 Fed. Rep. 470, 8 C. C. A. 185, Reversing (1893) 53 Fed. Rep. 843.

The mere fact that a hammer bursts into pieces and injures a servant who is using it does not prove that a master was negligent in supplying it. Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Nelms (1880) 53 Ga. 70.

Where the handle of a ladle for the carriage of molten metal breaks while it is being used in the same way as it has been for fifteen years previously, the presumption is that it was of originally sufficient strength, and where the source of the weakness which caused it to give way is, upon the evidence, left a mere matter of conjecture, a verdict should be directed for defendant. Reilly v. Campbell (1894) 20 U. S. App. 334, 59 Fed. Rep. 990, 8 C. C. A. 438.

The mere fact that a railroad car was found to be defective after the accident is not evidence sufficient to sustain a verdict for a plaintiff who bases his right of action upon the failure of the company to inspect the car properly. Perry v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895) 108 Mich. 130.

In Johnson v. Chesapeake & O. R. Co. (1892) 36 W. Va. 73, a verdict for the plaintiff was set aside where there was uncontradicted testimony on the part of the defendant's car inspector to the effect that he had examined the car which caused the accident the morning before that accident occurred, and found all appliances in good condition; and all the evidence tending to prove knowledge bore reference only to the condition of the car after the accident.

The breaking of the crossbeams fastened to the flanges of an elevated railroad while an employee is at work thereon is insufficient to show negligence on the part of the railroad company unless the exercise of proper care in inspection would have shown the defective nature of the beam, and the want of such care was a failure in the performance of a duty owed by the company. Stourbridge v. Brooklyn City R. Co. (1896) 9 App. Div. 129. See also Joliet Steel Co. v. Shields (1893) 146 Ill. 607; and the cases cited in VIII., supra.

In Murphy v. Great Northern R. Co. (1897, Minn.) 71 N. W. 682, the facts were these: "The defendant railroad had in its general yards at St. Paul a large, heavy transfer table, built upon wheels, which rested upon rails, and was movable, the whole machinery being placed in a large pit, and used for transferring heavy material from its shops to its railroad cars. Iron braces connected different parts of this machinery a few inches from the ground. This table was operated either by compressed air, cranks, or by employees pushing it by hand; some of the employees, while doing so, standing inside the braces. Plaintiff, while in this position, and pushing the table with his shoulder, came in contact with a block 2 feet 10 inches long, 8½ inches wide, and 4½ inches thick, which was lying between the rails, and, being unable to stop the moving of the table, plaintiff was forced into the angle of the braces, and caught by the block, whereby his leg was broken. Plaintiff had on two or three previous occasions shortly before this accident, and only a few hours before, on the day of the accident, pushed this table in the same manner. The block was no part of the table, and no part of the instrumentalities by which it was moved, and it was not shown by what means it was placed between the rails, whether by accident, a wrongdoer, or an employee. No one had ever seen it there before, and the length of time it had been in that position was not proved. The transfer table, with its appurtenances, had no defects, and was suitable for the purpose for which it was constructed, and the defendant's other employees assisting in moving the table were competent for the work in which they were engaged." Upon this evidence the court held the defendant not to be liable, laying down the following propositions in its syllabus of the case: "In actions of this kind the negligence of either party is to be measured by the conditions of things existing at the place where the injury took place, and then known to exist by each party. . . . The defendant having furnished suitable instrumentalities for the work to be performed, competent workmen to assist in the work, and being without notice in fact of the dangerous obstruction, and as its existence for so short a time did not imply notice there is no presumption that the accident happened in consequence of a failure of duty on the part of defendant towards plaintiff. . . . The mere happening of an injury to the servant is not evidence of negligence on the part of the master, and under the circumstances the burden of proving negligence on the part of the defendant rested upon the plaintiff.

A less rigorous rule, however, is applied where it is merely a question whether the complaint is sufficient. Thus, where there is an allegation that the place at which the servant was directed to deposit hot slag was covered with water, it will be presumed, as against a demurrer, that this fact was known to the defendant. New Albany Forge & Rolling Mill v. Cooper (1892) 131 Ind. 363.

A corollary from the general rule is that a jury is not entitled to find a verdict upon a mere conjecture.

From the fact that a coupling pin in cars which a switchman is attempting to couple was fastened in the drawhead, a jury may possibly draw the inference that the coupling pin, link, drawhead, and other coupling apparatus were defective, but they cannot, upon that inference, have the further one that the officers of the company knew, or by the use of ordinary care might have known, of such defective condition. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. v. Thompson (1895) 11 Tex. Civ. App. 658.

It is not justifiable to infer that the pin which holds a brake-rod in its place had dropped out before the car left a station 30 or 40 miles distant, and upon that inference to base the further inference that the car had not been properly inspected at that station. Bailey v. Rome, W. & O. R. Co. (1888) 40 Hun. 377.

Where the plaintiff can only show that while he was in the exercise of due care an accident happened which caused him the injury complained of, the court will not infer that the car was in an unfit condition to be placed upon the road, and that the defect was of such a nature that it ought to have been discovered by appellant's servants. Chicago, B. & Q. R. Co. v. Montgomery (1894) 15 Ill. App. 205.

The mere fact that there is a custom to inspect all foreign cars will not justify the inference that any particular car was inspected. Eddy v. Prentice (1894) 8 Tex. Civ. App. 58.

The presumption that a drawhead was defective at the time an inspection was made, and that the defect might have been discovered by a proper examination, cannot be raised upon the fact that it gave way and injured a brakeman, where it appears that its dangerous condition might have been occasioned by the violence of the impact of the cars at the time the injury was received. Perry v. Michigan C. R. Co. (1895) 103 Mich. 180.

Where the master has shown that he adopted proper rules, which, if they had been observed, would have prevented an accident which occurred through the act of a fellow servant of the plaintiff, the presumption is that the act of the offending servant was in violation of the rules, and the master is not liable, unless such servant was incompetent and his incompetency was, or ought to have been, known to the master. Pittsburg, Ft. W. & C. R. Co. v. Powers (1874) 74 Ill. 341.

Where a hoisting appliance, in the handling of which the injury was received, was a comparatively new one, of the kind customarily used, and neither the servant who had the custody of it, nor any of the persons whose duty it was to supply, repair, or use appliances of a similar sort had observed any defect in it, and the evidence shows that, at the time the accident occurred, it was being used in such a manner as to bring an unusual strain upon the part which gave way, and that it gave way precisely at a moment when it was subjected to a sudden jerk by the slipping of another portion of the apparatus, the inference is rather that the accident should be attributed to the unnecessary strain than to any defect in its condition. The France (1894) 20 U. S. App. 212, 59 Fed. Rep. 479, 8 C. C. A. 185.

A railroad company cannot be held liable as for a negligent inspection of a foreign car, where the evidence is equally consistent with the theory that the failure to discover the defect was due to the delinquencies of the car inspectors at the regular inspecting stations, and with the theory that such defect was not brought to its notice owing to the omission of the trainmen to perform their duty to report the existence of any defects which they might discover in the cars under their charge while upon the road. Chicago & A. R. Co. v. Bragolier (1882) 11 Ill. App. 518. It was said to be "probable from the evidence that the defect in this car [which was in the ratchet] could be discovered only when it was in motion; that when stationary the ratchet would hold, but when the car was in motion, the action of the wheels upon the brakes would shake it loose." Therefore a presumption of the negligence of car inspectors "involved a presumption, equally strong, that the conductors and brakemen along the line of road were likewise negligent in not discovering and reporting the alleged defects to their superiors. Their opportunities for discovering the defect in question were fully equal to those of the car inspectors. For their negligence in this particular, appellant would not be responsible to appellee, as they were his fellow servants."

But where all the details of the construction of a bridge and its inspection are before the jury, the case of a servant who is injured by the fall of the bridge does not stand merely on the fact that the structure gave way, and it is not error to leave the jury to say whether the defendant's want of reasonable care in the erection and inspection of the bridge occasioned the injury complained of. Bowen v. Chicago, B. & K. C. R. Co. (1888) 95 Mo. 268.

A case which goes very far in breaking in upon the rule that the plaintiff has the burden of showing that the defendant had notice of the defect is Guthrie v. Maine C. R. Co. (1889) 81 Me. 572, where the court held that having in a train a car with defective appliances furnishes prima facie evidence of an omission of duty on the part of the company, and that, if there was any explanation, it was within the power of the company to give it. In Carruthers v. Chicago, R. I. & P. R. Co. (1895) 55 Ill. 600, an attempt was made to reconcile this ruling with the more commonly accepted doctrine upon the ground that the defect in question (broken drawbar and bumper) was a patent one of which the company was bound to take notice. Possibly the case may be brought in line with the other authorities to the extent of its being consistent with them upon the actual facts in evidence. But the Maine court, so far as can be discovered from its reported opinion, did not intend to rely upon the patent character of the defect, or the presumption that the company had notice of it. The broad rule is laid down that "in all cases where a wrong, a fault, or an omission of duty even, is proved, from which damages result, the wrong, fault, or omission implies a neglect, in the absence of other evidence, which requires explanation from the apparently guilty party."

The following passage from the opinion of Doster, Ch. J., who differed from the majority of the court on this particular point of the burden of proof in Atchinson, T. & S. F. R. Co. v. Swarts (1897) 58 Kan. 235, is worth quoting: "Proof of the necessary length of time is supplied by a presumption arising out of the case. That presumption is, that a defect existed under the very eye of the master; as it were, was observed by, and therefore known to him. Such presumption supplies the place of proof by the plaintiff, and throws upon the company the burden of proving that the defect did not exist for a sufficient length of time to charge it with knowledge. In this case, the jury found there was a hole in the switch track. That switch track was in the company's yards; a place, as has been repeatedly said, under the constant, daily, to a large extent nightly, observation of the company's managing agents. It is incredible that such a hole could exist at that place and not be known to someone whose duty it was to fill it up. No conceivable cause for its existence, other than the attrition of the elements or the designed digging of the same by the company's employees for some proper purpose, can be said to exist. In the latter case, the company, of course, had knowledge. If caused by the elements, it must have been of gradual deepening and widening.—It was not to be blown out or washed out in the course of a few hours' time. If produced by some unusual or extraneous circumstance, it rested upon the company to prove it."

In Goodman v. Richmond & D. R. Co. (1886) 81 Va. 576, the court held that, where a ladder broke under ordinary use, the employer was rightly found liable, as for negligence, for the reason that it offered no evidence to show when it had been inspected, or that it was in proper and safe condition.

These decisions are referable to the principle, res ipsa loquitur, for an adequate discussion of which reference must be had to general treatises on negligence.

There is also some judicial authority for a similar principle in a case which turned on whether the master had knowledge of the incompetency of the servant through whose negligence the plaintiff was injured. In Murphy v. Pollock (1863) 15 Ir. C. L. Rep. 224, it was held by Deasy, B., and Pigot, C. B., that, inasmuch as the mode and circumstances of the employment of a servant are matters peculiarly within the knowledge of the employer, and not ordinarily within the knowledge of a servant, the submission of evidence from which a jury may reasonably draw the conclusion that the fellow servant whose conduct was the proximate cause of the plaintiff's injury was incompetent, casts upon the employer the onus of showing that he exercised due and reasonable care in the employment of that servant.

b. Admissibility of opinions as evidence.

It is not error to permit a man who has been in the hardware business to testify that, in his opinion, a fracture in a brakestaff was an old one. Moon v. Northern P. R. Co. (1891) 46 Minn. 106.

Whether a defect would have been discovered if a proper examination had been made is not a question upon which expert evidence is admissible. Allen v. Union P. R. Co. (1891) 7 Utah, 239.

An expert witness may give his opinion as to the effect of the breaking of strands of wire upon the ultimate strength of the cable, or the process of crystallization, the result of time and friction, and as to the probable life of a cable under given circumstances; but it is not competent for him to say that, under the facts embraced in the hypothetical case, a prudent man would have discontinued its use, and it was error in the trial judge to permit him to make this statement. Bruce v. Beall (1897, Tenn.) 41 S. W. 445.

The question whether the appearance of machinery would suggest to a prudent man the necessity of an examination is not one for an expert witness, but is for the jury to determine. Goodsell v. Taylor (1889) 41 Minn. 207, 4 L. R. A. 673.

Opinions as to the existence of a defect, and the negligence of the master in failing to discover it, are of no weight, where it is apparent that they are based on an examination after the accident and the defect is of such a nature that none of the usual tests would have revealed it. Indianapolis, B. & W. R. Co. v. Toy (1879) 91 Ill. 474, 33 Am. Rep. 57.

XVIII. Instructions.

A few rulings as to the correctness of instructions considered merely from the standpoint of procedure are here collected. So far as that correctness may depend upon the soundness of the general principles enunciated in them, the subject is obviously coextensive with the topics discussed in the preceding subdivisions of this note, and does not call for any further elaboration.

Where the plaintiff's case is based partly on the theory that the defendant was negligent in retaining an engineer, and partly on the theory that a defective locomotive was used, an instruction to the effect that there was a failure of proof to show that the engineer was unskilful, incompetent, and negligent, and that the appellant had knowledge of his unfitness a sufficient length of time prior to the accident 41 L. R. A.

to have provided against it, and that therefore the jury should find for the appellant, is properly refused, for the plaintiff may still recover by reason of the defects in the engine. Wabash & W. R. Co. v. Morgan (1892) 132 Ind. 430.

A charge upon the effect of the master's knowledge of a defect is erroneous, where there is no evidence that he had any knowledge of the unsafe character of the appliance. H. S. Hopkins Bridge Co. v. Burnett (1892) 85 Tex. 16.

Instructions as to negligence should be confined to the negligence charged in the declaration. Hence, where the only negligence charged is a failure to fasten a brakewheel upon the staff, whereby a brakeman was killed, an instruction that, if the brakeman received the injury because of the negligence of the company's inspectors in not noticing and reporting the defects, the company would be liable, etc., is not proper. Chicago & E. I. R. Co. v. Kneirim (1894) 152 Ill. 458.

A charge as to the doctrine of assumption of risks cannot be objected to on the ground that it submits to the jury a theory not raised by the testimony, where the plaintiff himself has testified that he very much doubted whether a defect in an apparatus required to bear a tensional strain could have been discovered on inspection, that it was impossible to know how great the strain would actually be in any given case, and that the best of such machinery frequently gave way. Throckmorton v. Missouri, K. & T. R. Co. (1896, Tex. Civ. App.) 39 S. W. 174.

In an action for injuries received by a brakeman, while coupling cars owing to a sinking of the drawhead alleged to be the result of a defect in the carrier iron, it is error to refuse to impart greater explicitness to an instruction which merely tells the jury in general terms that the employer is bound to use ordinary care in furnishing reasonably safe appliances by the addition of a charge to the effect that in determining whether the defendant company is liable or not, they "may consider whether or not it was a usual thing for the defendant to have on its line cars with different heights of drawbars, and whether or not those engaged in the transportation and inspection of cars, in the exercise of reasonable care on their part, would consider such defects as may be shown by the evidence to be such as would be likely to occur in the business of railroading, which may be reasonably anticipated by those engaged in the business of handling the cars. Texas & P. R. Co. v. Rhodes (1895) 30 U. S. App. 561, 71 Fed. Rep. 145, 18 C. C. A. 9.

In Durgin v. Munson (1864) 9 Allen, 396, the following charge was objected to: "But beyond this, the plaintiff must prove that it was gross negligence in the defendant to employ such an engine. If not, no action lies. If the employer is careful and does his duty, if he employs skilful men to buy and run his machinery, if he is not negligent in learning whether that machinery is safe or not, if in all things he does his duty, then he is not liable for the consequences if unsafe machinery is employed without his fault." The court, however, said: "We do not think that there was any such error or insufficiency in the charge of the judge as would give a reason for setting aside the verdict; although one important consideration that, to entitle the plaintiff to recover, he was bound to show that the engine was defective, and that the defendant knew, or in the exercise of ordinary care would have known, that it was defective, might perhaps have been more distinctly presented to the jury."

ALABAMA SUPREME COURT.

Louisa V. KIDD et al., Appts.,

v.

Louis A. BATES,

(.....Ala.....)

A person is not disqualified as an executor, so that the probate court can refuse to grant him letters of administration, because of large indebtedness to the estate, which he denies, making his interest antagonistic and hostile to that of the estate and beneficiaries of the will, where the statutes (Code 1896, §§ 45-48) provide, not only that letters shall be issued to persons named as executors in the will, "if they are fit persons," but also specify as grounds of unfitness minority, conviction of an infamous crime, or incompetence by reason of intemperance, improvidence, or want of understanding, adding that in case of unfitness for the causes enumerated letters of administration may be granted.

(June 23, 1896.)

A PPEAL by contestants from a decree of the Probate Court for Elmore County granting letters testamentary to Louis A. Bates as executor of the last will of Horatio B. Tulane, deceased. 'Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Gunter & Gunter, for appellants:

The statute says, not that the court must issue letters, but that it may issue them "to the persons named as executors in such will, if they are fit persons to serve as such." Who is an unfit person to serve as trustee of a fund? Manifestly one who, from his character, or hostile personal interest, or any other sufficient cause, cannot, or is not likely to, discharge properly the duties of trustee.

No one would pretend that a person who claims adversely the whole or any substantial part of the estate, under questionable conduct demanding judicial investigation, would be fit to serve as the administrator of such estate and to prosecute the claim against himself, and in doing so to preserve and bring forward evidence to ruin his character and standing as a man, as well as to deprive him of his fortune.

Drake v. Green, 10 Allen, 124; Thayer v. Homer, 11 Met. 104; Hussey v. Coffin, 1 Allen, 354; Putney v. Fletcher, 148 Mass. 247; Re Gleason, 17 Misc. 510; Carrey v. Reed, 82 Md. 833; Re Mills, 22 Or. 210; Simpson v. Jones, 82 N. C. 323; Kellberg's Appeal, 86 Pa. 129; Rereiber, 11 Pa. 157; Noble v. Moses, 81 Ala. 530, 60 Am. Rep. 175.

Section 46 of the Code disqualifies any person "who, from intemperance, improvidence, or want of understanding, is incompetent to discharge the duties of the trust." Improvidence refers "to such habits of mind and conduct of a man as to render him generally unfit for the trust in question."

McMahon v. Harrison, 6 N. Y. 443; Freeman v. Kellogg, 4 Redf. 218; Emerson v. Bowers, 14 N. Y. 449; Coope v. Lloverre, 1 Barb. Ch. 45.

NOTE.—As to the requisite moral qualifications of executors, see Smith's Appeal (Conn.) 16 L. R. A. 538, and note

Messrs. Tompkins & Troy, for appellee:

There were very few persons disqualified at common law from acting as executors. No persons were disqualified except those who, by reason of their being idiots and lunatics, were deemed incapable of becoming such, because they were not capable of accepting the trust.

Schouler, Extra. §§ 83, 84.

Section 46 of the Code prescribes who shall be deemed fit persons to serve.

A statute in derogation of the common law must be strictly construed.

The grounds set up in the objections would not have rendered appellee an unfit person to act as executor at common law, and, construing this statute even liberally, the objections do not show that he is unfit on any of the grounds recognized by the statute.

Unless a person is deemed unfit for one of the reasons stated in § 46, then the judge of probate must issue to him or her letters testamentary.

Brickell, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Horatio B. Tulane died in October, 1897, leaving a last will and testament, in which Louis A. Bates and Louisa V. Kidd were named as executor and executrix. After the probate of the will Louis A. Bates made application for letters testamentary, which application was contested by appellants, Louisa V. Kidd and Louis S. Kidd, heirs at law of testator and legatees under the will, who filed objections to the issue of letters testamentary to said Bates, and asked that said application be refused. The substance of these objections is that while the testator was in a very weak condition of body and mind, caused by age and disease, and was in the care and under the control and dominion of said Bates, who occupied towards him the relation of confidential agent and companion, transacting much of his business, the latter, by the exercise of fraud and undue influence, induced testator to lend him at various times, without security, large sums of money, aggregating more than $100,000; and that subsequently the said Bates induced testator to accept, as security for $64,000 of said indebtedness, a like amount of the bonds of a Tennessee corporation called the Tulane Hotel Company; and thereafter, in September, 1897, while testator was at said hotel, still weak in mind and body, and in the care of and being nursed by the said Bates and others acting for him, who excluded from his presence his friends and acquaintances, he was induced by the exercise of fraud and undue influence to execute an instrument by which said $64,000 of bonds were donated to said Tulane Hotel Company, of which corporation Bates was president, and the entire capital stock of which he owned. It is further averred that, by reason of the facts above stated, the said Bates is indebted to the estate in a sum exceeding $100,000, but that he denies that he is indebted to it in any amount, and claims that all the money alleged to have been loaned to him was, in fact, donated to said Tulane Hotel Company, by reason of which adverse claim the interest of Bates is antagonistic and hostile to that of the estate and the legatees under the will, and litigation between Bates and the estate is necessary to determine the fact and amount of said indebtedness, which litigation would be embarrassed by the issue of letters testamentary to the applicant. To these objections appellee demurred, and the sustaining of the demurrer and issue of letters to him are the only errors assigned.

The first ground of demurrer is too general to be considered, and the others present the single question whether, upon an application for letters testamentary by the person named as executor in the will, the court has authority to refuse to issue the letters to such person for any other causes than those specified in the statute. The statutes affecting the question presented, as found in the Code of 1896, are as follows:

"Sec. 45. Whenever a will has been admitted to probate in this state, the judge of the court in which the will was probated may issue letters testamentary, according to the provisions of this chapter, to the persons named as executors in such will, if they are fit persons to serve as such.

"Sec. 46. No person must be deemed a fit person to serve as executor who is under the age of twenty-one years, or who has been convicted of an infamous crime, or who, from intemperance, improvidence, or want of understanding, is incompetent to discharge the duties of the trust."

"Sec. 48. If the person named in the will as the sole executor is, or if all the persons named therein as executors are, from any of the causes enumerated in the second preceding section, unfit to serve as executor or executors, letters of administration with the will annexed, may be granted on the testator's estate under the provisions of § 53."

Section 47 prescribes the form of letters testamentary, and other sections of the chapter provide for the grant of letters of administration with the will annexed in the event of the death of the sole or surviving executor, or the renunciation of the right to act by the person named in the will.

The theory of counsel for appellants is that the words "if they are fit persons to serve as such," contained in § 45, indicate a legislative intent to give a very broad discretion to the court in determining what are causes of disability, and who are fit persons to serve as executors, and that section 46 was intended not to define all the causes of disability which should authorize the rejection of persons who apply for letters, but only to limit this discretion to the extent of forbidding the issue of letters to one who was under twenty-one years of age, or who had been convicted of an infamous crime, or who, from intemperance, improvidence, or want of understanding, was incompetent to discharge the duties of the trust. If section 45 stood alone, we would be inclined to adopt the construction contended for, and to declare that any cause which rendered the applicant unfit or unsuitable to serve as executor without detriment to the estate and undue advantage to himself would justify the refusal to issue letters testamentary to him. And upon this construction we would have no difficulty in determining that the facts alleged, if true, render the applicant for letters an unsuitable person to discharge the duties of the trust which require him to collect all the debts and other assets of the estate, and preserve them for distribution according to the provisions of the will, since his interests are clearly adverse to the estate, and antagonistic to the legatees and devisees and others interested therein. The decisions of the courts of all those states the statutes of which vest the court with the power and discretion to determine who are suitable persons to serve as executors so hold, and the correctness of these decisions cannot be doubted. Winship v. Bass, 12 Mass. 199; Drake v. Green, 10 Allen, 126; Thayer v. Homer, 11 Met. 110; Kimball's Appeal, 45 Wis. 391; Re Glendon, 17 Misc. 510. But the several sections of the Code referred to were adopted at the same time, are in pari materia, and must be construed together; and the construction of one, if doubtful, may be aided by a consideration of the words of, and the legislative intent indicated by, the others, and of the evil of the common law intended to be remedied. And a consideration of all the sections and of the common law relating to the subject, which they were intended to modify, leads to a conclusion which is opposed to the construction placed by counsel on § 45. It is a rule of statutory construction that a statute in modification or derogation of the common law will not be presumed to alter it further than is expressly declared. The presumption is that the language and terms of the statute import the alteration or change it was designed to effect, and their operation will not be enlarged by construction or intentment. Cook v. Meyer, 73 Ala. 588; Webb v. Mullins, 78 Ala. 118. The rule of the common law was that all persons might be appointed executors who were capable of making a will. Neither infancy, nonresidence, coverture, intemperance, improvidence, ignorance, vice, dishonesty, nor any degree of moral guilt or delinquency disqualified one for the office. Idiots and lunatics were practically the only classes disqualified, and the rule now prevails generally that courts have no discretion in respect to the issue of letters to the persons nominated in the will, unless such persons are expressly disqualified, or such discretion is vested by law; and the person appointed by the will cannot be rejected by the court except where the law expressly so provides. 1 Woerner, American Law of Administration, pp. 503 et seq.; Schouler, Exrs. §§ 82, 88; 1 Wms. Exrs. 7th Am. ed. p. 269; Redf. Wills, pt. 3, chap. 2, § 8; Stewart's Appeal, 56 Me. 300; Smith's Appeal, 61 Conn. 420, 16 L. R. A. 598, and notes. Treating these several sections of the Code as one statute, and construing accordingly, they not only fail to indicate any legislative intent to abrogate this rule of the common law, and vest a broad discretion in the court to determine what are causes of disability, but they show that such effect was not within the contemplation of the legislature, and that the only discretion intended to be conferred was that to be exercised in the determination of the existence of those particular causes of disability enumerated in § 46. The evil of the common law intended to be remedied by the statute was that persons were permitted to serve as executors who were clearly unfit to serve as such without undue advantage to themselves and consequent detriment to the estate. The purpose of the statute was therefore not to declare, except indirectly, by the process of exclusion, who were fit and competent persons to discharge the duties of the trust, since the common law declared all persons competent except idiots and lunatics, but to enumerate the causes which should render persons incompetent. In so far as it enumerates causes of disability not recognized at the common law, it must be treated as exclusive, containing all the causes which will authorize the rejection of the persons named in the will, and excluding all others, and as leaving the common-law rule as to competency and fitness unchanged except in the particulars specified. That this was the intention of the legislature is, we think, made manifest by the provisions of § 48, quoted above, which authorizes the grant of letters of administration with the will annexed only when the persons named in the will as executors are, "from any of the causes enumerated in the second preceding section [§ 46], unfit to serve." The probate court has therefore no statutory authority to issue letters of administration with the will annexed unless the person named as executor in the will was under twenty-one years of age, or had been convicted of an infamous crime, or was incompetent to discharge the duties of the trust by reason of intemperance, improvidence, or want of understanding, except in the event of the death of the executor or his renunciation of the right to act, as provided in §§ 51 and 54. This failure on the part of the legislature to confer authority to grant letters of administration with the will annexed, except in the cases mentioned, clearly indicates that no causes of disability which could give rise to the necessity for the grant of such letters, other than those enumerated in § 46, were within the contemplation of the legislature when the act was adopted.

The question presented by the demurrer has been touched upon in two cases considered by this court, but cannot be said to have been adjudicated. In Williams v. McConico, 27 Ala. 572, appellant applied for letters of administration on the estate of her deceased husband, who had died intestate, and the application was contested on the ground of her unfitness. The evidence showed that she had been living apart from her husband for a long time previously to his death, and had manifested great animosity towards him, and that she "had funds in her hands belonging to her minor children by a former husband, of whom she was sole guardian when she married Williams, which she would not deliver up on settlement, and which she would hold against any other person offering to administer." In the opinion, which does not discuss the question at length, it was said: "It being established that she was the widow, she was the first person entitled to administer; and under the law every person is a fit person, unless disqualified by some one of the causes specified in § 1658, Code 1852 (Code 1896, § 46). Allowing every legitimate inference in favor of the contestants upon the evidence offered by them, it is clear that it did not establish any ground of unfitness covered by the section of the Code to which we have referred." In Bingham v. Crenshaw, 84 Ala. 683, it was held that previous intermeddling with the effects of the estate by the applicant did not per se disqualify him; but the court refused to decide "whether there are disqualifications for the office of administrator other than those enumerated in § 1658 of the Code of 1852 (§ 46, Code 1896), and referred to the case of Williams v. McConico, 27 Ala. 572. Our statute is a substantial copy of the New York statute, and it is very similar to that of California. In the latter state, § 1349 of the Code of Civil Procedure authorizes the issue of letters testamentary to the persons named in the will as executors "who are competent to discharge the trust;" and § 1350 is the same as our § 46, except that it adds, to the causes of disability therein enumerated, incompetency through want of integrity. In the case of Re Bauquier, 88 Cal. 302, the application for letters testamentary was contested on the ground that the applicant had, by the exercise of fraud and undue influence, induced the testator, in his lifetime, to turn over to him more than $12,000 in money and property, and that he claimed, adversely to the estate, to be the owner of the money and property thus fraudulently obtained. The court held that the statute contained the only causes of disability which could authorize the rejection of the applicant, and that the objections to the granting of the application must be such as to show that the applicant was incompetent upon some one of the grounds specified in the statute. In the case of Re Gleason, 17 Misc. 510, a petition was filed for the removal of an executor, on the ground that he claimed the benefit of a contract between himself and the testator, as to which there was strong evidence that testator was of unsound mind at the time of its execution, and by which the executor secured great pecuniary advantage, to the detriment of the estate. The court, held that such conduct on the part of the executor did not render him incompetent or disqualified, within the meaning of subdivision 1 of § 2085 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which specifies the causes of disability, but that his continuing to claim the benefit of the contract was ground of removal, under subdivision 2 of said section, which enumerates, among other causes of removal, unfitness for the due execution of the office by reason of his "having wasted or improperly applied the money or other assets in his hands, or invested money in securities unauthorized by law, . . . or by reason of other misconduct in the execution of his office, or dishonesty." Other decisions of the New York court indicate that the courts, in determining what are grounds for the refusal to grant letters testamentary or of administration, must be governed by the statute. Emerson v. Bowers, 14 N. Y. 449; Coope v. Louerrie, 1 Barb. Ch. 45; Cogshall v. Green, 9 Hun. 471; Re Manley, 12 Misc. 472. See also Barry v. Hamilton, 12 B. Mon. 191, 54 Am. Dec. 515;

Smith's Appeal, 61 Conn. 420, 16 L. R. A. 538. The statutes of these states being so similar to ours, the construction placed upon them is entitled to consideration and weight in construing our own; and, as it coincides with the result of our independent investigation of the question, we adopt it as the proper construction of §§ 45 and 46 of the Code of 1896. It results that the facts alleged do not show any legal cause of disability, nor any ground for the refusal to issue letters to appellee, and the demurrer was therefore properly sustained. Whether the question of appellee's liability to the estate by reason of the facts alleged can be adjudicated notwithstanding the issue of letters constituting him executor, and, if so, in what manner and by whom his liability can be enforced, we need not and do not now decide, but refer to the following authorities bearing on the question: McGregor v. McGregor, 35 N. Y. 220; Smith v. Lawrence, 11 Paige, 206; Re Gleason, 17 Misc. 510.

Let the decree of the probate court be affirmed.

PEOPLE of the State of California, Resp't.,
v.

Louis James SEARCEY, App't.

(.....Cal.....)

1. The fact that some names on the jury panel were not on the last assessment roll of the county, as the law provides they should be, does not, of itself, sustain a challenge to the panel.
2. The omission of a township in selecting the jury list from the wards and townships of the county, which by Code Civ. Proc. § 206, is to be in proportion to their inhabitants, is not shown by the fact that the list does not include the names of any persons in a town which is within the township, but constitutes only a part of it.
3. Excusing for cause some of those on the venire does not constitute available error to one who is tried by twelve qualified, competent jurors.
4. A box of sand containing impressions of shoe tracks which a witness testifies that he made with the shoes of the accused person, and that they are identical with those he found in the sand upon a desert, is admissible in evidence for the purpose of accurately describing the appearance of the tracks on the desert which are claimed to have been made by the accused.
5. An objection that footprints made in a box of sand were not made under conditions similar to those made in a desert is not raised by a general objection to the proof of the footprints in the box, without any specific objection to the dissimilarity of the conditions.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Superior Court for San Bernardino County convicting him of murder. Affirmed. The facts are stated in the opinion.

crime of murder, and by the judgment of the court the extreme penalty of the law has been ordered. Many assignments of error are relied upon by this appeal, and they are all of a somewhat technical character. We will specially notice the more important ones.

It is claimed that a challenge to the panel of jurors should have been allowed. The evidence taken upon the hearing of the challenge discloses a very lax performance of duty upon the part of the board of supervisors in selecting the list of trial jurors for the year. The sections of the Code declaring what that duty is evidently either have not been closely studied by the board, or no real effort has been made to follow the law there laid down. It appears that the names of persons were placed upon the list which do not appear upon the last assessment roll. That all names upon the list should appear upon the assessment roll of the preceding year is an important requirement in the eyes of the law. But the mere fact that some names of persons appeared upon the list that did not appear upon the last assessment roll of the county, of itself, is not a sufficient departure from the demands of the law to authorize the trial court in sustaining a challenge to the panel. It further appears that not a single name is found upon the list from Colton, a town possessing 1500 inhabitants. The law says (Code Civ. Proc. § 206) that this list should be composed of names of persons selected from the wards and townships of the county in proportion to the inhabitants thereof, as near as may be estimated by the board of supervisors. It would seem that by compliance with this provision of the law the names of some persons from Colton would be likely to appear upon this list. But, however this may be, the evidence discloses that the township in which the town of Colton is situated embraces additional territory; and it is not plain from the evidence but that some names upon the list were those of persons living outside of Colton, and yet within the township. If appellant's contention upon this point be good in law, it was his duty to have shown by some pertinent evidence that the township of Colton was not represented upon the jury list. When he established the fact that Colton was not so represented, such evidence was not sufficient to prove the material issue. The further fact that the judge excused certain of the venire for cause is not a matter for complaint upon the part of the defendant. As to such matters the court's discretion is of the broadest. Defendant in this regard must be satisfied if he is tried by twelve qualified, competent jurors.

In this case a man was murdered upon the railroad track upon the Mojave desert, while traveling westward. The district attorney in his opening statement to the jury, prior to the introduction of any evidence, stated that he proposed to prove that the defendant was likewise traveling westward upon this track at about the same time and place; and also at that time officers of Arizona, with his knowledge, were looking for him, with a view to arrest him upon a charge of burglary committed in that territory. The case is one of purely circumstantial evidence. As suggested, the defendant was near the scene of the murder, traveling westward. Twenty-four hours later he was arrested 80 miles east of that point, traveling eastward. The district attorney by his opening statement proposed to prove these facts for the purpose of showing the improbability of defendant's conduct in traveling towards the arresting officers, unless great reason existed for such action upon his part, and this reason, it was claimed, was found in the fact of the murder. Evidence to this effect was offered before the jury, and under objection was denied admission by the court. Notwithstanding this ruling, it is still insisted by appellant that the statement of the district attorney, as bearing upon the defendant's commission of another offense, constituted prejudicial error.

There is no question but that under certain conditions the prosecution are entitled in law to prove against a defendant an offense other than the one upon which he is being tried. Our state Reports contain many such cases. But whether or not this case is such a one is not a question necessary for decision, for, as already suggested, the court rejected all evidence looking in that direction. Again, we have been cited to no case where a new trial has been ordered by reason of the character of the opening statement of the prosecuting officer. But, though precedent is lacking to the point, we are prepared to say that such misconduct on the part of the prosecuting officer might be found in the character of his opening statement to the jury as to recommend, or even absolutely demand, in the interests of justice, a second trial of the defendant. The principle justifying such a course is well outlined in People v. Wells, 100 Cal. 459. There a new trial was ordered by reason of the action of the district attorney merely asking certain questions of various witnesses, the answers to such questions not being admitted by the court. The conclusion of the court was there declared because it was evident from the record that the attorney in asking those questions was acting in bad faith, and attempting by this course to improperly influence the jury to the defendant's damage. That case is an exceptional one in its facts, but not in its law, and the decision is eminently sound. If such misconduct existed here the same results would follow; but it is not at all apparent that the district attorney was acting in bad faith in making the statements to which objection is made. It is not even clearly apparent that his position as to the admissibility of such evidence was wrong in law. As a circumstance tending to show the guilt of the defendant upon the charge of murder, the facts evidencing his conduct in this regard bear with some force. There is certainly no such palpable wrong in his conduct as to justify the conclusion that he was actuated by bad faith in making the statements here under consideration.

Witness Arbois testified that a few days subsequent to the homicide he visited the scene of the crime, and found tracks of a person leading therefrom. He followed these tracks in the sand a distance of 15 miles. At that time he had a pair of shoes in his possession taken from the feet of defendant after his arrest. He compared the tracks in the sand, which were in some respects peculiar, with tracks made by these shoes, and found them the same. He also minutely detailed before the jury the appearance of these tracks in the sand. Thereafter he brought before the jury a box of sand which contained impressions of shoe tracks, and then testified he made these tracks with defendant's shoes, and that the tracks so made were identical with those he found in the sand upon the desert. The introduction in evidence of this box of sand, with the shoe impressions therein, is claimed to constitute error, and many reasons are now urged to support this claim. Counsel cite various cases which refer to the danger in allowing experiments to be made before the jury, and also insist that the conditions which surrounded these tracks when made in the box of sand were not shown to be similar to those upon the desert when the tracks were there made; but we see nothing of material moment in these positions. This evidence hardly partook of the character of an experiment made before the jury. Nothing was done before the eyes of the jury looking towards the making of an experiment. The shape and dimensions of certain tracks were placed before that body, made by the use of a box of sand. Any other impressionable substance as well might have been used. These tracks in the box were declared by the witness to be identical with those found upon the desert. Under such circumstances, this evidence served the purpose of accurately describing to the jury the appearance of the tracks upon the desert. It was an indirect, but entirely satisfactory, and legal way of proving that very material link in the chain of circumstances connecting the defendant with the murder.

It being clear that the evidence was admissible for the purpose of showing by comparison the character of the foot tracks upon the desert, no violation of law occurred upon the ruling of the court. Indeed, we find in the record no objection made by counsel to the admission of the evidence, other than the very general one that "we object to the witness testifying that he made footprints representing the form and shape of those." Was this evidence competent as directly tending to prove that defendant's shoes made the tracks in the desert sand? If defendant's shoes made the tracks in the sand in the box, and those tracks were identical with the tracks found in the sand in the desert, then the evidence would seem important upon that issue. There is but one possible objection that could be made to its admission for the purpose of establishing that fact. That objection would be a specific one, based upon a dissimilarity of conditions under which the tracks in the box and those upon the desert were made. To have any weight looking towards the establishment of this important fact, the tracks in both cases must have been made under substantially the same conditions, and, as already suggested, we find no objection in the record sufficiently specific to raise that question upon this appeal. Yet aside from that consideration, upon a careful examination of the testimony, we conclude the conditions were so substantially alike in the two cases as to justify the admission of the evidence. No testimony was offered bearing upon these conditions other than that of the witness Arbois, and he declares that the sand in the two cases was of the same quality and of the same character of hardness and compactness.

We have examined the remaining assignments of error, and find no substantial merit in them. While the evidence of defendant's guilt is found in a chain of circumstances alone, still, upon a perusal of that evidence as set out in full by the record, we are satisfied the jury was entirely justified in declaring the verdict rendered in the case.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment and order are affirmed.

CONNECTICUT SUPREME COURT OF ERRORS.

Leroy Z. CUTLER et al.

v.

ROYAL INSURANCE COMPANY.

(70 Conn. 506.)

A "standard guaranty to maintain 80 per cent insurance," stamped on the face of a policy of fire insurance, does not supersede a provision that the policy shall be void in case of other insurance,—at least when that policy itself is for more than 80 per cent of the value of the property.

(June 1, 1898.)

RESERVATION by the Superior Court for Hartford County for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Errors of an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance which defendants claim was void because of the taking of additional insurance contrary to the terms of the policy. Judgment for defendant advised.

Statement by Hamersley, J.:

The policy sued upon was the standard form prescribed by Pub. Acts 1893, chap. 226, and contained the following provisions: "This entire policy shall be void if the insured has concealed or misrepresented, in writing or otherwise, any material fact or circumstance concerning this insurance or the subject thereof." "This entire policy, unless otherwise provided by agreement indorsed hereon or added hereto, shall be void if the insured now has, or shall hereafter make or procure, any other contract of insurance, whether valid or not, on property covered in whole or in part by this policy." There was also stamped upon the face of the policy the following: "Standard guaranty to maintain 80 per cent insurance. It is a part of the consideration of this policy, and the basis upon which the rate of premium is fixed, that the assured shall maintain insurance on the property described by this policy to the extent of at least eighty

(80) per cent of the actual cash value thereof; and that, failing so to do, the assured shall be an insurer to the extent of such deficit, and to that extent shall bear his, her, or their proportion of any loss that may happen to said property; provided, however, that in the adjustment of any loss or damage by fire on stock or merchandise, no inventory for the purpose of ascertaining the application of the foregoing clause shall be required unless the amount of damage is at least five (5) per cent of the amount of insurance on such stock or merchandise. It is expressly understood and agreed that, in case there shall be more than one item or division in the form of this policy, this clause shall apply to each and every item or division separately." "Note. The coinsurance clause is not mandatory. The assured has the option of declining by paying a different rate. The coinsurance clause does not apply to dwellings and contents, unless specifically rated. Care should be exercised by the assured to see that at all times the amount of insurance on each item insured by this policy shall not be less than 80 per cent of its value; otherwise its operation in case of partial loss might work to the disadvantage of the insured by decreasing the amount of his indemnity." The policy was issued to Matthew Ferguson and Albert Beyer, and subsequent to the loss was by them assigned to the plaintiffs. The defendant claimed that the policy was void, because the insured had fraudulently concealed material facts concerning the insurance, and because the insured had, after the policy was issued, without the knowledge of the defendant, and without permission in any form, procured additional insurance on the property covered by the policy. By stipulation of the parties the facts were found by the court, and the case reserved for the advice of the supreme court of errors. The findings, after stating the proof of the formal allegations, of the fire, the damage, and proofs of loss, are as follows: "(6) The court further finds, that at the time the defendant issued said policy of insurance to said Ferguson and Beyer, the assured, said parties told the defendant that the value of the property insured under the first item was $1,200, and under the second item $500, which I find to be the value of said property at the time of the insurance; and the assured also informed the defendant company that they intended to increase their stock of goods. (7) Ten days previous to the time of the taking out by the assured of the defendant's policy of insurance, to wit, September 4, 1896, the assured had made an application to the local agent of the Aetna Insurance Company at said Manchester for a policy of insurance for the sum of $1,000 upon a portion of the same property insured in the defendant's policy, to wit, the stock of boots and shoes, the first item therein. Said policy in the Aetna Company was not delivered to the assured, nor was any communication received by said insured explaining its delay until after they had received the policy in the defendant company. Because said Aetna policy had not been delivered to them pursuant to said application, and no communication had been received, explaining its delay, the assured made application for a policy in defendant company, believing that the Aetna policy was not forthcoming. The assured did not communicate to the defendant the fact that said application for said Aetna policy had been made, nor had the defendant any knowledge or notice thereof at the time of issuing its policy. After receipt of the defendant's policy in suit, and before the fire, the Aetna policy was received by said assured, and was retained by them. Said policy in the Aetna Insurance Company was a valid policy of insurance, dated September 4, 1896, for the sum of $1,000. The delay in delivery of the Aetna policy was in fact caused by the serious illness of the child of said insurance agent, which for a time suspended his business, but the fact was not known to the assured. (8) The form of defendant's policy of insurance issued to said Ferguson and Beyer is the standard form prescribed by the statute law of this state. The defendant refuses to pay the amount of insurance provided for in said policy of insurance upon the ground of the concealment by the assured of said other insurance for $1,000 existing upon said property at the time this insurance sued for was taken out, and the subsequent acceptance of the Aetna Insurance Company's policy, without permission of the defendant, and claims that such pre-existing insurance and such subsequent acceptance of the Aetna's policy is in violation of the conditions of this policy, which prohibits other insurance without written permission of the defendant company. At the time of the fire the value of the stock of goods on hand and insured was $856.87, and no more, upon which the insured had $1,100 insurance in the defendant company and $1,000 insurance in the Aetna Insurance Company of Hartford, making in all $2,100 insurance upon $856.87 worth of stock. The value of the tools and machinery which the assured had on hand at the time of the fire was $86.95, upon which assured had $400 insurance in the defendant company alone under their policy of insurance aforesaid,—making in all $2,500 insurance upon property valued at $928.82. I find that at the time the defendant issued its policy to the plaintiff's assignors it had no knowledge of such prior insurance, or the subsequent acceptance of the Aetna Insurance Company's policy, and that it had not consented to or waived the provisions of the policy against other insurance, unless the consent or waiver appears upon the face of said policy, or upon the slips or riders attached thereto, by construction of law. Defendant claims a violation of the policy in the concealment of the $1,000 preexisting insurance and subsequent acceptance of the Aetna policy, and fraud claimed as apparent of record. Defendant also claims that if the language of the riders or slips upon said policy can be construed as a permit for 80 per cent insurance, or any other insurance, said permit was exhausted immediately upon the issuance of the defendant's policy to the plaintiff's assignors, which in fact, was for an amount greatly in excess of 80 per cent of the plaintiff's said property at the moment of its issuance and delivery. The question of what judgment should be rendered upon the foregoing facts is reserved for the advice of the supreme court of errors."

Messrs. Olin R. Wood and Hiram R. Mills, for plaintiff:

The defendant cannot escape liability because of the so-called concealment, unless the matter withheld in some way increased or affected the risk to be insured.

11 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 298; Davis v. Aetna Mut. F. Ins. Co. (N. H.) 89 Atl. 902.

The adoption of the provision to maintain 80 per cent coinsurance involved a tacit consent on the part of the insurer to insurance in such an amount as would suffice to free the insured from the risk of contribution in the event of loss.

Pool v. Milwaukee Mechanics' Ins. Co. 91 Wis. 580; Catoosa Springs Co. v. Lynch, 18 Misc. 209.

The Aetna policy was honestly retained. Its effect was beneficial to this defendant. It operated to reduce by one half the liability which this defendant would have been under if the Aetna policy had been returned instead of retained.

Mr. George A. Fay, for defendant:

All of the provisions of a contract shall receive full recognition, and be honored in the interpretation of such a contract when possible. One part of a contract will never be allowed to override and nullify another part of the same contract when such a construction can be placed upon the instrument that both may stand.

Contracts of insurance are to be construed as other contracts. All parts of the contract are to be taken together, and such meaning shall be given to them as will carry out and effectuate to the fullest extent the intention of the parties, and no portion of it will receive such a construction as will tend to defeat the obvious general purpose of the parties entering into the contract.

Paragraphs and clauses of a policy should not be construed so as to make them conflict with each other if such construction can be avoided. They should be construed so as to make them harmonize if such construction is possible.

Clement's Digest, p. 99 (14); Cobb v. Insurance Co. of N. A. 17 Kan. 492.

Where a contract contains two repugnant provisions, one printed and the other written, the latter must control. Unless the conflict is irreconcilable, however, this rule does not apply, but the principle prevails that contracts should be so construed as to give effect to every word and expression contained therein.

There is no distinction to be made between such agreements of insurance and other agreements. Every provision in the absence of fraud will be presumed to be material.

The procurement of other insurance in violation of conditions against it avoids the policy, and so is the statute law of our own state.

Every year vast amounts of property, not insured, go to destruction in consequence of over insurance of property in its neighborhood. The welfare of the state, which has an interest in all the property of the state, requires that this should not be done.

In interpreting a contract, the intention of the parties should be determined by the condition of things at the time of the making of the contract.

Hamersley, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If, as appears from the finding, the insured, at the time of their application to the defendant, believed that their prior application to the Aetna Insurance Company for a policy of insurance for $1,000 upon property they were asking the defendant to insure could not result in a contract of insurance, they were not bound, by the terms of their policy, to then inform the defendant of that application. But in subsequently accepting the Aetna policy issued in pursuance of their application they violated the provision against further insurance contained in the policy issued by the defendant, and for this reason the plaintiffs cannot recover. "Precisely that had occurred which both parties had stipulated should make void the contract of insurance." Bishop v. Clay F. & M. Ins. Co. 45 Conn. 430, 453. The "standard guaranty to maintain 80 per cent insurance," stamped on the face of the policy, did not supersede the provision against further insurance. The two provisions can stand together, and effect can be given to both. This "guaranty" clause in a fire insurance policy is of recent use, and is a very peculiar one. We consider it only so far as necessary to the decision of this case. If, as the plaintiffs claim, the adoption of the clause imposes on the insured an obligation to procure such additional insurance as may be necessary to keep the total amount of insurance equal to 80 per cent of the changing actual value of the property covered by the policy, and therefore impliedly gives permission to procure, or waives the provision against such insurance, it must follow that such permission or waiver is limited by the necessity from which it is implied. It may be that if, in fulfilling the obligation assumed, the 80 per cent limit is unintentionally exceeded, the policy would not for that reason become void. But a question of this kind does not arise in the present case. The insured obtained insurance for $1,500 on a stock of goods and fixtures valued at $1,700; the insurance being more than 80 per cent of the value of the property insured. Immediately afterwards they procured additional insurance on the principal item of this property for $1,000. Within twelve days the property is destroyed by fire, and its actual value at that time is less than $1,000. There is here no room for any claim that the additional insurance was intended merely to fulfil the obligation of the guaranty clause. The insured in fact and intent violated the provision against overinsurance. They certainly stand in no better position than if, having obtained permission for an additional insurance of $100, they then procured insurance for ten times that amount.

The Superior Court is advised to render judgment for the defendant.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, SEVENTH CIRCUIT.

PILLSBURY-WASHBURN FLOUR MILLS COMPANY, Limited, et al., Appts.,

v.

H. R. EAGLE.

(26 Fed. Rep. 608.)

- 1. Owners of flouring mills in Minneapolis, Minnesota, having established a high reputation for flour bearing the names Minneapolis and Minnesota by using a superior quality of hard spring wheat, and all of them using the same process and the same kind of machinery, and subjecting their product to the same kind of inspection, may have an injunction against the use of such names on flour of lower grades which is made in Milwaukee from wheat of different grade.
- 2. An exclusive or proprietary right in words or labels used is not necessary in order to obtain an injunction against unfair competition in trade by the deceptive use of such words or labels.
- 3. The fact that one of the mills of complainants who seek an injunction against the deceptive use of the name of a city on a product made elsewhere is situated outside the city limits will not preclude relief, when that mill is for all practical purposes a part of the complainants' plant within the city.
- 4. Corporations doing business in the same city, and having a common interest, may unite in a suit in equity to prevent the deceptive use of the name of the city on products made elsewhere to the damage of their business.

(April 5, 1898.)

A PPEAL by plaintiffs from an order of the Circuit Court of the United States for the Northern District of Illinois in favor of defendant in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from the alleged wrongful use of a tradename. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Before Woods and Jenkins, Circuit Judges, and Bunn, District Judge.

Mr. Frank F. Reed for appellants.

Mr. Edward O. Brown for appellee.

Bunn, District Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

This suit is brought by the complainants, who, for many years, have been engaged in the manufacture of flour on a large scale at the city of Minneapolis, Minnesota, against the defendants, who are engaged as wholesale and retail grocers in the sale of flour at Chicago, Illinois, to enjoin the defendants from using as a part of their brand placed upon their barrels and sacks containing flour the words "Minnesota Patent," or "Minneapolis, Minnesota," or "Minneapolis, Minn." The allegations of the complainants' bill, which are fully sustained by the evidence, are substantially these: The complainants are corporations, all, except one, organized under the laws of Minnesota. The Pillsbury-Washburn Flour Mills Company, Limited, is a corporation organized under the laws of Great Britain. These seven corporations separately own and operate, and have for many years, flouring mills situated in Minneapolis, numbering in all at the present time some twenty-two or twenty-three mills. The first mill was built in 1859, when the city had a population of less than 6,000 inhabitants. Since then the growth of the milling interest has kept pace with that of the city, so that, while the population of the city in 1896 was about 200,000, the product of the mills was 80,000 barrels per day, or some 13,000,000 barrels per year. The Pillsbury-Washburn Company alone own and operate five mills, with a daily capacity of 25,000 barrels ground, packed, and put up ready for shipment, and with an annual output of about 4,000,000 barrels of flour. These mills all use in their manufacture only the highest grade of hard spring wheat grown in Minnesota and the Dakotas, and for the purpose of storing and handling the wheat own and operate many hundreds of elevators in Minneapolis and other parts of Minnesota and the Dakotas. They early adopted and employed the process of high grinding, and subsequently the roller grinding or Hungarian patent process, which is especially adapted to hard wheat. By this roller-patent process, which is a development and extension of the high grinding process with improved machinery, the wheat is subjected to the operation of successive graduated rollers whereby the external portion, the wheat kernels are disintegrated, removed, and successively carried away, so as to leave the interior or core of the wheat containing the nutritive gluten for disintegration separately and last, the process being first to remove by the action of the rollers the outside hull of the wheat, and then the starchy portions, thus preserving as nearly as possible the gluten for separate grinding, in this way obtaining a wheat flour which is from 40 to 50 per cent of gluten and the balance starch, and which is known as "Patent" or "Patent Process" flour, and is highly nutritious, and makes a fine white quality of bread, the flour commanding the highest price in the market. That the different operators and owners have used upon the sacks and barrels containing the flour manufactured at their respective mills various trademarks and brands of two distinct kinds known as "mill brands" and "customers' brands," the latter being subdivided into foreign and domestic. Mill brands consist of names, marks, and symbols peculiarly arranged, indicating by assertion or association the mill, establishment, or combination of mills producing the flour contained in the receptacle exhibiting and employing such brands. Customers' brands consist of names, marks, and symbols peculiarly arranged, and put on the flour receptacles, indicating sometimes by statement and implication and sometimes by association the flour jobber, wholesale or retail merchant, selecting and standing sponsor for the flour in the exhibiting sack or barrel, and frequently simply the place of manufacture, as being Minneapolis, Minn." Nothing resulting from use, exploitation, association, or otherwise was, as a rule, used to identify the flour sold under these customers' brands as the product of any particular mill or mills; but the place of manufacture of the flour was usually indicated. The flour jobber or wholesale or retail merchant who exploits, introduces, and owns the brand, may, with perfect propriety, and frequently does, secure the flour for his particular brand from different mills operated by different persons. As a matter of fact, however, almost all the brands of flour, both mill and customers', used and employed at any time upon flour made at any of complainants' mills, have contained and distinctly and prominently exhibited thereon the words "Minneapolis," "Minneapolis, Minn.," or "Minneapolis, Minnesota." Many of said brands have also contained the words "Minnesota" or "Minnesota Patent" in addition to the word "Minneapolis," and a few brands have omitted the word "Minneapolis," and employed the words "Minnesota" or "Minnesota Patent" instead. The use of these last named words, "Minnesota" or "Minnesota Patent," means, and is understood by the trade, buyers, and consumers to mean, that the flour in the receptacle exhibiting them is made under the patent process as above described somewhere in the state of Minnesota. The words "Minneapolis," "Minneapolis, Minn.," or "Minneapolis, Minnesota," in flour brands signify universally to jobbers, wholesale, and retail merchants, flour traders and dealers, buyers and consumers that the flour in the receptacle imprinted therewith was made at a Minneapolis flouring mill, and, because of the location, methods, and reputation of Minneapolis, that the flour is "Minnesota Patent" flour made at "Minneapolis, Minnesota." That the location of the said city of Minneapolis upon the Mississippi river is highly advantageous and desirable for flour milling. The states of Minnesota and North and South Dakota produce the highest grades and best qualities of hard spring wheat in enormous quantities, and the immense acreage therein devoted to this product is strong assurance that there will at all times be an ample wheat crop for supplying the Minneapolis mills, while the capital invested and population interested and employed in this hard spring wheat growing industry, and the adaptation of soil and climate to the production of such wheat, insure competition, and the progressive development of the industry increase in production and improvement in quality. Minneapolis is situated at the extreme southeast of this hard-wheat region, and is a natural outlet of the wheat grown therein for shipment, either as grain or flour, throughout the United States, and especially to the manufacturing populations in the Central and Eastern states, where the consumption of hard spring wheat flour is extensive, and to the seaport cities for export. Principally because of the grain and flour trade, Minneapolis has become both a terminal point for many important railroads which concentrate there from points throughout the hard-wheat growing district, and the initial point of many trunk lines terminating at points along the Great Lakes and in the Central, Southern, and Eastern states and seaports. The locality and the fine water power induced the establishment of mills at Minneapolis early in the development of the country northwest thereof, and from 1859 until the present the growth of the flour industry there has been constant and rapid. This industry has always been the leading one of Minneapolis, and through it the place has in thirty-seven years increased in population from less than 6,000 to about 200,000 inhabitants. Over 5,000 men find work in and about the flour mills and business, and as many more in connection with buying, selling, storing, and handling grain. Minneapolis has long been styled throughout the United States and also abroad the "Flour City." From the inception of the flour-milling business there in 1859, there has been among and between all the mills located there the keenest competition as to quality and quantity of flour made and sold, and early in the history of the milling industry at Minneapolis there was adopted the custom between millers of frequently examining and comparing the methods and machinery employed in the various mills, and of frequently examining and comparing the flour produced. All wheat used at the Minneapolis mills has for years been systematically inspected and graded by competent and disinterested persons appointed for that purpose by the state of Minnesota. The machinery in the mills is made almost entirely by two establishments. This comparison of mill products by the mill owners and operators has been made daily for over twelve years. Each day each mill submits to an expert 2 pounds of its high-grade flour, who examines, tests, and bakes it, and reports the result. These methods, and the close proximity of the mills, produce the greatest uniformity and identity in the flour made at the mills. Practically these mills have always been run on the same systems and methods, and with exactly similar machinery and appliances, employing the same grades of hard spring wheat grown in the same territory, and subjecting it to the same kind of inspection, and, as the necessary consequence, the flour ground at all the mills has been practically of the same classes, kinds, qualities, and reputations. As a result of this method and the continued and extended use of the words "Minneapolis," "Minneapolis, Minn.," and "Minneapolis, Minnesota," in and upon the brands, both mill and customers', and in advertisements, circulars, and announcements relating to the flour and brands, there has grown up, and for a long time has existed, and now exists, throughout the United States and in many foreign countries, a great reputation and demand for flour made in Minneapolis, Minn., and the flour made at the mills of complainants is known generally as "Minnesota Patent" flour, and also especially as "Minneapolis Flour," and is classified and listed upon markets, and is in both the trade among flour dealers, wholesale and retail, and wholesale and retail grocers, and by purchasers and consumers, asked for, identified, bought, and sold by the style of "Minneapolis Flour" as a particular and superior kind or grade of "Minnesota" or "Minnesota Patent" flour, and thus the words "Minneapolis," "Minneapolis, Minn.," or "Minneapolis, Minnesota," upon or in connection with flour, signify to and are understood by traders, purchasers, consumers, and the public generally to mean that the said flour was made and put up at some one of complainants' mills, and have acquired and do possess this secondary meaning and significance in the trade.

The complainants and their predecessors in business in the operation of said mills have sold and do sell in Chicago large quantities of flour bearing said trademarks and names, and there known and dealt in both at wholesale and retail as "Minnesota Patent" flour and "Minneapolis" flour, and by the latter term identified as coming from some one of complainants' mills. The use of the words "Minnesota," "Minnesota Patent," "Minneapolis," "Minneapolis, Minn.," and "Minneapolis, Minnesota," upon, in, and in connection with such flour brands, both mill and customers', employed in connection with flour made at complainants' mills, has caused such brands of flour to become known upon the market, and to be listed, tabulated, and classified as that variety of Minnesota patent flour manufactured at Minneapolis; that is, flour coming from the complainants' mills is styled in common with all other flour made in the state of Minnesota under the roller process, "Minnesota" and "Minnesota Patent" flour, and also more exclusively "Minneapolis" flour. The term "Minneapolis" alone upon flour thus means and is understood by the public to mean "Minnesota Patent" flour manufactured and put up at some one of complainants' mills at Minneapolis, in that state. That the defendants are doing a retail and wholesale grocery business at Nos. 68 and 70 Wabash avenue, Chicago, and as a part of such business deal in and sell flour at wholesale and retail. That prior to 1893 defendants adopted as a trademark for flour put up and packed for and sold by them the brand "H. R. Eagle & Co.'s Best Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn." That the words "Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn.," were added because of the reputation of that city and state for superior flour, and that the method employed by defendants at the outset was to procure flour at the mills of complainants to be packed in sacks or barrels, and stenciled or marked with such brand, and then shipped and delivered to defendants at Chicago. That such flour was genuine Minneapolis flour, and properly and truthfully labeled "Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn." That a high and uniform grade of flour was furnished and put up under said brand and sold by the defendants, and thereby and by reason of the reputation of Minnesota patent flour made at Minneapolis, Minnesota, soon acquired a reputation and demand upon the market. Thereupon, about 1893, defendants, in order to take and continue the advantage of the representation that the flour was Minnesota flour made at Minneapolis, Minnesota, and at the same time to procure inferior flour at a less price, and palm and foist off the same upon the public and purchasers and consumers as genuine "Minnesota patent" flour made at Minneapolis, Minnesota, ceased to obtain the flour sold under said name and brand at mills in Minneapolis, Minnesota, and have since procured all, or the greater portion, of the flour put up and sold under said brand and name from various flour mills at Milwaukee, Wisconsin, first from the mills known as the "Phoenix Mill," and then since, and at the present time, from the mills in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, operated by J. B. A. Kern & Sons, and known as the "Eagle Mills." This flour is made from wheat of a different grade, and in an entirely different locality, by flour mills conducted and operated in methods variant from the mills in Minneapolis, and often contains a large percentage of winter wheat, and is in quality, reputation, and value inferior to the genuine "Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn.," flour, and is worth and commands a less price upon the market when truthfully and honestly sold as Milwaukee flour. Nevertheless, the said defendants have made no alteration in the style of their brand used upon Milwaukee flour, but have the same packed at the Eagle Mills in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, and there branded "H. R. Eagle & Co.'s Best Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn.," and so shipped and delivered to defendants at Chicago, Illinois. Such spurious and falsely branded flour is then, with full knowledge on their part of the fraud, advertised and sold by said defendants as and for genuine "Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn.," flour in sacks and barrels containing and conspicuously exhibiting the words "Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn.," and with the positive assurance, both in advertisements, circulars, and oral representations, that the flour is made in Minnesota, and at Minneapolis. The consequence of this false branding, advertisement, and assertion by the defendants is that inferior flour, manufactured at a locality concealed from, and not desired by, the purchaser, is fraudulently and deliberately palmed off upon the deceived public and purchasers for another and higher priced and more reputable flour, and the public is thereby cheated and defrauded, and complainants are injured by being deprived of a regular, established, and valuable trade, and also by having an inferior flour represented and sold as and for flour made by complainants, and originating at the city to which complainants, by their joint efforts and methods, have given a valuable reputation for flour, which inflicts direct and irreparable injury upon the reputation of complainants' flour, and injuriously affects the trade therein and the demand therefor. The defendants' dealings in such inferior, spurious flour so branded as genuine "Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn.," flour are extensive, and the sales thereof amount to about 4 car loads, or 500 barrels, of flour a week. It is principally by means of a false statement upon the barrels and sacks, "Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn.," and the reproduction of this statement and fac simile of the brand in advertisements, that the belief is induced on the part of buyers that the flour is "Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn.," flour. The milling establishment of J. B. A. Kern & Sons carefully conceals the fact that this flour so branded is ground, packed, and shipped by it under such brand and names, and H. R. Eagle & Co. also carefully hide the truth, and persistently assert to buyers that the flour is made in Minneapolis, Minnesota, and the result is benefit to J. B. A. Kern & Sons and H. R. Eagle & Co., and injury to the public and to complainants.

The defendant H. R. Eagle alone appears, and denies that he has any knowledge of any such person as Wallace R. Eagle, and the principal issue tendered by defendant's answer relates to the signification of the terms "Minnesota Patent," "Minneapolis, Minnesota," or "Minneapolis, Minn.," as used by the complainants and by him upon their flour sacks and barrels, the defendant denying that these words so used have the meaning ascribed to them by the complainants, or that they are understood by traders, purchasers, consumers, and the public generally to mean that the flour is made and put up at the mills of the complainants, or that the words "Minnesota" or "Minnesota Patent," used in connection with flour, are understood by dealers in flour, or purchasers and consumers, or by the public generally, to denote that the flour was ground in the state of Minnesota; and denies that the complainants have any exclusive right to the use of the words "Minneapolis," "Minneapolis, Minn.," or "Minneapolis, Minnesota;" but, on the contrary, alleges that the word "Minneapolis" is and has been generally used and understood to designate flour manufactured by the patent, or roller, or Hungarian process, from the fact that the use of that process in the manufacture of flour first became generally known in the United States in connection with the city of Minneapolis, having been there first introduced. The defendant asks the court to take notice that by the admission of the bill of complaint, one of the complainants, the Pillsbury-Washburn Flour Mills Company, Limited, is now using the word "Minneapolis" in connection with the flour manufactured by it elsewhere than at Minneapolis, the flour being sold under such name with the knowledge of all the other complainants, and without objection on the part of any of them; and is justifying such use by the assertion that the flour is made by the same methods, and with the same precautions, and under the same tests as are used in the mills situated in the said city of Minneapolis.

Upon the one principal issue made by the answer respecting the proper signification and meaning of the words "Minnesota Patent," "Minneapolis, Minnesota," and "Minneapolis, Minn.," as used upon sacks and barrels of flour, either alone or in connection with other flour brands and marks, the testimony is conclusive and overwhelming in favor of the complainants. Numerous affidavits, taken in the principal flour markets of this and other countries, prove beyond any doubt or cavil that these words so used signify to the dealer, the purchaser, and the consumer that the flour is made by the roller or patent process at Minneapolis, in the state of Minnesota, and that it is this fact which has given to the flour so branded its uniform great credit for excellence in the markets of the world, not alone in this country, but in South America, Europe,

China, Japan, South Africa, and wherever flour is imported from this country.

The defendant admits all the allegations of the bill in regard to first purchasing his flour of complainants and putting it up at Minneapolis, and marking it as "Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minnesota," flour, and afterwards purchasing in Milwaukee, and putting up and selling under the same brands, but denies that the complainants have a right to invoke the interposition of this court to prevent him from the continued use of such brands; and it only remains to be seen whether the complainants have any such right, and whether this court has any power to grant the relief sought. The principal allegations of the bill being either conceded or proved, the injunction ought to go if the complainants make a case, and the bill is not demurrable. The application for an injunction was denied by the court below, but it is difficult to see wherein the facts lack anything of making a good case in equity. Upon the evidence the fraud is open and palpable, as is also the damage to the complainants' business and to the public resulting from it. This being the case, are the hands of a court of equity tied by any controlling circumstance or iron rule which forbids it to grant relief? We think not. Just when it first came into the defendant's mind that the terms "Minnesota Patent" and "Minneapolis, Minnesota," related only to the roller-patent process which might be carried on in any part of the world, and had no reference to the place of manufacture, is not clear from the record; most probably, however, it was after, as he admits, partly by his own business enterprise, and partly by the use of these brands, he had succeeded in building up a prosperous business, and when he had conceived the idea of getting his flour elsewhere, but at the same time continuing the use of the old brands, which had been so successful. But, however this may be, when the defendant failed utterly to make good his defense in regard to the alleged proper meaning of the words used as a part of his brand, there was left small ground for him to stand upon. He was fairly beaten in his defense by the testimony. After that to still say that the court has no jurisdiction or power to grant relief is to fly in the face of the well-grounded principle running through all the cases that fraud accompanied by damages is actionable at law, and that, where one person has so dressed out his goods as to deceive the public into the belief that they are really the goods of another person, and so put them upon the market, to the manifest injury of that person and of the public, an action at law will lie for the deceit, and, to save a multiplicity of suits, and prevent irreparable injury, equity will restrain such unfair and fraudulent competition. This rule is so well established, is so general and elastic in its application, and so consonant to the general principles of equity jurisprudence, that it would be difficult to frame a case coming fairly within its spirit and meaning in which a court of chancery will not find a way to afford the proper relief. This principle is affirmed in many of the leading cases.

In the recent English case, quite analogous to this, of Saxlehner v. Apollinaris Co. 13 Times Law Rep. 258 [[1897] 1 Ch. 893], plaintiff was the owner of a spring in Hungary named "Hunyadi Janos." Defendant, once the exclusive agent in England for the sale of the spring water, on expiration of the contract, began selling water from a spring near Budapest, which was styled "Uj Hunyadi." The injunction went, and Mr. Justice Kekewich said: "The plaintiff's case, as opened, was brought distinctly within the authority of Reddaway v. Banham [1896] A. C. 199, which, be it observed, was decided by the house of lords some time before the issue of the writ in this action. It is important to note what that authority really is. There is no novelty in the principle stated, and even the language finds a counterpart in many older cases, as for instance Seizo v. Provezende, L. R. 1 Ch. 192. But yet the law is so clearly put on a simple and intelligible basis, that one necessarily makes it the starting point in consideration of questions of this class. I have studied the case with this view, and it seems to me that the entire doctrine is summed up in one sentence in the first paragraph of the lord chancellor's speech moving the judgment of the house: 'Nobody has any right to represent his goods as the goods of somebody else.' Observe that the proposition is perfectly general. There is no limit as regards name, origin, honesty of manufacture or sale, or otherwise; and, although there are elsewhere to be found learned and useful disquisitions on the facts of the particular case, the application of the law to them and criticism of earlier authorities, there is no departure from what the lord chancellor states to be 'the principle of law.' It matters not, therefore, how a plaintiff's goods come to acquire a particular value, or how the defendant's goods have come to adopt that value. If, in fact, the defendant is selling his goods as those of the plaintiff, he is doing what the law will not allow, and the plaintiff is entitled to relief against him."

In Newman v. Alvord, 51 N. Y. 189, 10 Am. Rep. 538, also much like to this in principle, the trademark used by the plaintiffs was the word "Akron" in designating a cement made by them near the village of Akron, in Erie county, state of New York. This word had been used by the plaintiffs and their predecessors in business about thirteen years, to designate the origin and quality of their cement. The defendants, who manufactured cement in Onondaga county, near Syracuse, knowing that the plaintiffs had for years used the word "Akron" as a trademark to designate the origin and place of manufacturing their cement, applied the word to designate their cement by calling it "Akron Cement." The plaintiffs' barrels were labeled as follows: "Newman's Akron Cement, manufactured at Akron, N. Y. The hydraulic cement known as the 'Akron Water Lime.'" The defendants labeled their barrels: "Alvord's Onondaga Akron Cement or Water Lime, manufactured at Syracuse, N. Y." They placed the word "Akron" upon their label for precisely the same reason that the defendant in this case placed the words "Minnesota Patent, Minneapolis, Minn.," upon his flour sacks and barrels, to increase their sales, and avail themselves of the reputation acquired by plaintiff's cement. The label, as said by Earl, J., who delivered the opinion of the court of appeals, was calculated to induce ordinary buyers to believe that they were purchasing either plaintiff's cement, or cement of the same kind and value. The sole question to be determined, as stated by the learned justice, was whether the plaintiffs, who were the only persons engaged in manufacturing and selling the Akron cement which was known and had a reputation in the market as such, could be protected in the use of the word "Akron" against the defendants, who used it to defraud the plaintiffs and deceive the public. And the court thought the plaintiffs were entitled to the injunction. The principle upon which the relief was granted, as stated in the opinion, is that the defendants shall not be permitted, by the adoption of a trademark, which is untrue and deceptive, to sell their own goods as the goods of the plaintiffs, thus injuring the plaintiffs and defrauding the public. The plaintiffs, as the court held, had given a reputation to the Akron cement in market. They had always been its principal manufacturers and sellers, and at the time of the commencement of the suit the sole parties who could be injured by the fraudulent use of the trademark by the defendants; and hence they were clearly entitled to the protection which they sought. This case, which is quite analogous in principle to the case at bar, has been cited and approved by the Supreme Court of the United States in Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Clark, 12 Wall. 311, 20 L. ed. 581, and McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, 24 L. ed. 828. In the former of these cases the distinction between a trademark proper as indicating an exclusive right, and the use of a geographical name, as in the case at bar, where no exclusive property can be had, is clearly indicated. In speaking of the case of Newman v. Alvord, after stating the facts of the case the court says: "[I]t [the defendants' cement] was not in fact Akron cement (for Akron and Syracuse were a long distance from each other), and the purpose of calling it such was evidently to induce the public to believe that it was the article made by the plaintiffs. The act of the defendants was, therefore, an attempted fraud, and they were restrained from applying the word 'Akron' to their manufacture. But the case does not rule that any other manufacturer at Akron might not have called his product 'Akron Cement' or 'Akron water-lime.' On the contrary, it substantially concedes that the plaintiffs, by their prior appropriation of the name of the town in connection with the words cement and lime acquired no exclusive right to its use, as against anyone who could use it with truth."

. So in the case at bar, the complainants can have no exclusive right to the use of the geographical names of "Minneapolis" or "Minnesota." They are not the subject of a trademark proper. Any one or more of the 200,000 inhabitants of Minneapolis may use that word upon their flour. The defendant or any other person from any state may go there, and establish a mill, and brand his flour "Minnesota Patent" and "Minneapolis, Minnesota." The defendant might have continued to buy Minneapolis flour, and branded it "Minneapolis, Minn.," and had all the benefit which these marks would give him in the market, because he would be adhering to truth and fair dealing. But when he placed these same brands upon another flour, manufactured in Wisconsin, he departed from the truth, and placed a lying brand upon his goods, which was intended to deceive, and could not but deceive, the public, and result in injury to the complainants' business. If the defendant could do this, all other persons could do the same thing, and so the public would be defrauded, and the goodwill and business of complainants, which has taken thirty-nine years to build up, would be greatly impaired, if not destroyed. If this could be permitted, there would not be much incitement to provide the public with a high grade of flour, such as the complainants have been manufacturing for many years, and which the evidence shows has led the markets of the world, if, by all manufacturers using the same brand, the complainants' flour may be confounded with all lesser grades and kinds made from all sorts and grades of wheat. It must be conceded that, if the private interests involved are great, the public interests are no less so. In the examination of scores of cases referred to in the briefs of counsel, we find very little difference in opinion on this subject. The distinction, both in the English and American cases, is between those where a geographical name has been adopted and claimed as a trademark proper, and those where, as in the case at bar, it has been adopted first as merely indicating the place of manufacture, and afterwards, in course of time, has become a well-known sign and synonym for superior excellence. In the latter class of cases, persons residing at other places will not be permitted to use the geographical name so adopted as a brand or label for similar goods for the mere purpose by fraud and false representation of appropriating the goodwill and business which long continued industry and skill and a generous use of capital has rightfully built up. It will be of no avail in such cases, where the facts are admitted or proved, to allege a want of power in a court of equity to find a remedy. The court has always exercised this jurisdiction, and must continue to do so.

In Lee v. Haley, L. R. 5 Ch. 155, the plaintiffs had for a series of years carried on business as coal dealers in Pall Mall, London, under the name of "The Guinea Coal Company," and they were frequently called the "Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company." The defendant, who had been their manager, finally set up a business in the same street under the same style of the "Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company;" and, while it appeared that there were other Guinea coal companies in London, so that the plaintiffs did not have the exclusive right to use the trademark "Guinea Coal Company," yet the court held that they were entitled, as against the defendant, to be protected in the use of the name. Lord Justice Gifford, delivering the opinion of the court, says: "I quite agree that they [the plaintiffs] have no property in the name, but the principle upon which the cases on this subject proceed is, not that there is property in the word, but that it is a fraud on a person who has established a trade, and carries it on under a given name, that some other person should assume the same name, or the same name with a slight alteration, in such a way as to induce persons to deal with him in the belief that they are dealing with the person who has given a reputation to the name."

Of course, this case goes further than it is necessary to carry the rule in the case at bar, because the words "Pall Mall Guinea Coal Company" could be truthfully used by both parties. They both sold coal in Pall Mall at a guinea a ton. But here the defendant could not truthfully call his flour "Minneapolis, Minn.," flour, and his using these words was a fraud upon the complainants and upon the public.

In Southern v. Reynolds, 12 L. T. N. S. 75, William Southern established a clay-pipe factory at Brosely, Shropshire, and the product obtained a great repute as "Southern's Brosely Pipes." He died, and two brothers—William and Edward—carried on the business at separate establishments, both using the name "Southern Brosely," distinguishing their different factories by prefixing their initials. The pipes were made from a peculiar vein of clay used by both brothers, and the products of both of their factories were known indifferently as "Southern Brosely Pipes." Defendant, who had no establishment at Brosely, began to make "Reynolds' Purified Clay Pipes, made by Southern from Brosely." It appeared that he had employed a former workman in one of the factories at Brosely whose name was Southern. One of the brothers only brought suit for an injunction to restrain the use of the names "Southern Brosely." The court held that a clear case of fraud and misrepresentation was made, and granted an injunction.

In El Modelo Cigar Mfg. Co. v. Gato, 25 Fla. 886, 6 L. R. A. 823, the court, in stating the case, said: "The complainant engaged in and commenced the manufacture and selling cigars at Key West, Florida, in 1875; used exclusively Havana tobacco at his factory, and that he established among purchasers, dealers, etc., a high reputation for his cigars, and that his cigars still maintain said high reputation; that the climate of Key West is more favorable to the manufacture of Havana cigars than points north of that place; . . . caused to be stamped or branded on his cigar boxes the words 'Key West,' and the words 'Key West,' . . . 'E. H. Gato,' or 'Eduardo H. Gato,' . . . made use of the distinctive words 'Bouquet,' 'La Estrella,' and the words 'Key West' and 'E. H. Gato' and 'Eduardo H. Gato,' upon the boxes of his cigars and labels, etc., as trademarks, and to distinguish his cigars in the market, etc., from cigars made and put upon the market by other manufacturers, long before the defendants made use of the said distinctive words upon boxes of cigars, labeled and printed thereon as hereinafter stated and complained of. That the defendants, or one or more of them, about the year 1882, commenced to manufacture cigars at Jacksonville, Florida, under the name and style of firm of 'El Modelo Cigar Manufacturing Co.' or 'Company,' . . . That defendants use seed tobacco, . . . a much inferior quality of tobacco to the 'Havana tobacco,' in the estimation of dealers, etc., and is in point of fact a greatly inferior tobacco to the 'Havana tobacco,' and well known to all manufacturers, etc. The defendants, well knowing the superior qualities of complainant's cigars, . . . brand and stamp upon the boxes containing their cigars manufactured at Jacksonville, and print upon the labels, pictures, and paper upon said boxes, the words 'Key West' and 'G. H. Gato,' in conspicuous places upon said boxes, and in form and size of letters identical with or similar to the form and size of letters employed and used by complainant upon his boxes of cigars and labels and pictures thereon."

It was held that, "when a man manufactures his goods at a particular place, and uses the name of that place in combination with other words as a trademark to distinguish the origin or ownership of his goods, no other person will be permitted to use the name of the same place, upon goods manufactured by him at another and different place,"—citing Delaware & H. Canal Co. v. Clark, 18 Wall. 325, 20 L. ed. 584; Congress & E. Spring Co. v. High Rock Congress Spring Co. 45 N. Y. 291, 6 Am. Rep. 82; Newman v. Alcord, 51 N. Y. 189, 10 Am. Rep. 588; Glen & H. Mfg. Co. v. Hall, 61 N. Y. 226, 19 Am. Rep. 278; Sawyer v. Horn, 1 Fed. Rep. 24; Gilman v. Hunnewell, 122 Mass. 189; Robertson v. Berry, 50 Md. 591, 38 Am. Rep. 387, note 1. And that, after the complainant, whose factory was located at Key West, had adopted his own name in combination with the words "Key West," "La Estrella," and "Bouquet," and certain brands, labels, and pictures, as his trademarks, the defendants did not afterwards have the right to adopt the name G. H. Gato in combination with the words "Estrella," "Bouquet," and "Key West," and certain brands, labels, and pictures, in combination with the name G. H. Gato, as their trademarks, where the words so adopted by them so clearly resembled the trademarks so adopted by the complainant as to enable them to palm off upon and induce an ordinary purchaser to buy their cigars for those of the complainant, whereby the defendants might be profited, and the complainant might be injured.

In Carlsbad v. Kutnow, 68 Fed. Rep. 794, the city of Carlsbad, as proprietor of the Carlsbad springs, had for years evaporated the waters into salts, which were sold as "Carlsbad Sprudel Salz." Defendants, who were New York druggists, made a similar salt, without the use of the genuine Carlsbad water, and sold it under the name "Improved Effervescent Carlsbad Powder." Judge Wheeler, in granting the injunction, said:

"If any artificial salts have come to be known by the name of 'Carlsbad Salts,' from similarity or otherwise, of course the defendants have the same right to sell such salts by that name that they have to sell anything by the name by which it is known. But there is no real evidence to that effect. And if the defendants procured genuine Carlsbad waters or salts, and put them up in different forms, or with other ingredients, to improve their taste or vary their effects, these words would be truthful, and they would seem to have a clear right to use them in such preparations; but the plaintiff's proof tends to show that the defendants' salts are not, in substance, genuine Carlsbad salts, in any form, and the leading defendant has been a witness, and has not assumed to state—and, although the proof must be within their reach, none has been produced to show—that their salts come direct in any form, from the Carlsbad springs. The impression left by the evidence is that they do not, but are artificial. No proof has been brought showing that the plaintiffs have used the name of 'Carlsbad' upon any but genuine Carlsbad sprudel salts. As the case stands here, the defendants appear to be using the name 'Carlsbad' upon artificial salts having no connection with that name, and to be using it only because of its connection with the genuine Carlsbad sprudel salts. Carlsbad with its springs is far away. This use of the name in connection with a preparation so similar to this well-known product of them is some representation that it is a genuine product of them. Calling the powder 'Improved Carlsbad' is a direct representation that genuine 'Carlsbad' powder has been taken to be improved upon; and calling it also 'effervescent' is a representation that the improvement is in the effervescence. This is putting the plaintiff's mark, to some extent, upon the defendant's salts, and is calculated to lead customers to think they are the salts of the plaintiffs. Such deception would be actionable at law, and is preventable in equity. McLean v. Fleming, 96 U. S. 245, 24 L. ed. 828; Menendez v. Holt, 129 U. S. 514, 32 L. ed. 526; Improved Fig Syrup Co. v. California Fig Syrup Co. 7 U. S. App. 588, 54 Fed. Rep. 175, 4 C. C. A. 264; Von Mumm v. Frisch, 56 Fed. Rep. 880. Allusion has been made to this word being the name of the city, to which ordinarily an exclusive right cannot be acquired; but it is also the name of these peculiar springs and gives the name to their products."

And on appeal (35 U. S. App. 750, and 71 Fed. Rep. 167, and 18 C. C. A. 24), the court, in affirming the order by Judge Lacombe, said: "The Carlsbad sprudel salts in either form, therefore, is a natural product, and well known as such, and there is no proof in the case that the complainants have used the name 'Carlsbad' upon anything but genuine Carlsbad Sprudel Salts. And we concur with the circuit judge in the finding that there is no evidence in the record that any artificial salts have, from similarity or otherwise, come to be known by the name of 'Carlsbad,' as is the case with the Epsom salts, a term now generally applied to sulphate of magnesia whether such sulphate of magnesia comes from Epsom or not. Under these circumstances the complainant, the city of Carlsbad, has the right to indicate the origin of these natural salts by its own name, and would be entitled to the aid of a court of equity to prevent anyone from using that name to induce the public to accept as genuine artificial salts not the product of the Carlsbad spring."

In Kinney v. Basch (N. Y.) 16 Am. L. Reg. N. S. 586, plaintiffs manufactured cigarettes, and used a label with a field of divergent rays, and the words "St. James" and the symbol "1/2." The cigarettes were distinguished on the market as "St. James." Defendants employed a label of the same size, differing slightly in color, containing the words "St.

James Perique Cigarettes," with the symbol "1/2." It was shown there was a St. James parish in Louisiana, and St. James perique tobacco was a common article. The symbol "1/2" meant mixed goods, and was so used by the trade. In regard to the right of the plaintiff to the use of the word "St. James" and the figures "1/2," the court said: "It has been urged upon the part of the defendants that geographical names cannot be the subject of a trademark; neither can numerals, which only serve to indicate the nature, kind, or quality of an article. It is true that the cases cited by the defendants sustain these propositions; but the later cases have proceeded upon different and more equitable principles in defining the grounds upon which courts of equity interfere in cases of this description. This interference, instead of being founded upon the theory of protection to the owners of trademarks, is now supported mainly to prevent frauds upon the public. If the use of any words, numerals, or symbols is adopted for the purpose of defrauding the public, the courts will interfere to protect the public from such fraudulent intent even though the person asking the intervention of the court may not have the exclusive right to the use of these words, numerals, or symbols. This doctrine is fully supported by the latest English cases of Lee v. Haley, L. R. 5 Ch. 155; Wotherspoon v. Currie, L. R. 5 H. L. 508; and also in the case of Newman v. Alford, 51 N. Y. 189, 10 Am. Rep. 588."

In Anheuser-Busch Brewing Assn. v. Fiza, 24 Fed. Rep. 149, complainant, doing business at St. Louis, Missouri, had been accustomed to export beer in bottles with a label bearing the words "St. Louis Lager Beer." It had an established market for this product in South America and Panama. Defendant nor any other person in the export trade had been accustomed to use the words "St. Louis Lager Beer." Defendant shipped beer from New York in competition with complainant. It was shown that at Panama and in South America "St. Louis Lager Beer" was in demand. Defendant's beer was made in New York, and his bottles were so labeled as to represent that the beer was made at St. Louis, and that his firm were the sole agents for the St. Louis lager beer. Defendants insisted that buyers did not discriminate between complainant's article and other beer in the United States, but bought it simply because they supposed St. Louis beer was produced in the United States, as distinguished from German and English beer; but the court said: "This may be true; but, if it is, it does not seem to be conclusive against the right of the complainant to the injunction which he seeks. As the goods of the parties go to the same markets, it can hardly fail to happen that the complainant will lose sales, and the defendant will get customers, in consequence of defendant's acts. Although the complainant cannot have an exclusive property in the words 'St. Louis' as a trademark, or an exclusive right to designate its beer by the name 'St. Louis Lager Beer,' yet, as its beer has always been made at that city, its use of the designation upon its labels is entirely legitimate; and if the defendant is diverting complainant's trade by any practices designed to mislead its customers, whether these acts consist in simulating its labels, or representing in any other way his products as those of complainant, the latter is entitled to protection. It is no answer for the defendant, when the complainant asks for protection, to say that it has no exclusive right to designate its product in the manner it has, although this might very properly be asserted by a competitor selling beer made at St. Louis, or who, by reason of any circumstances, might be entitled to represent his product as originating there. Dela-ware & H. Canal Co. v. Clark, 13 Wall. 322, 20 L. ed. 583. . . . It is unnecessary, for present purposes, to consider whether the complainant has a valid trademark, or can have a technical trademark, in the name 'St. Louis.' It is sufficient that it was lawful for the complainant to use that name to designate its property, that by doing so it has acquired a trade which is valuable to it; and that the defendant's acts are fraudulent, and create a dishonest competition, detrimental to the complainant."

In Southern White Lead Co. v. Cary, 25 Fed. Rep. 125, complainant, a manufacturer of White Lead in St. Louis, stamped upon the upper end or head of its kegs the words "Southern Company, St. Louis." These words encircle the head of the keg, "St. Louis" forming the lower half of the circle, and "Southern Company" the upper half, inclosing the words "Warranted Strictly Pure White Lead in Pure Linseed Oil." St. Louis had an established reputation for the manufacture and sale of pure white lead, and complainant had maintained for years a large trade at that place as a manufacturer. Defendants manufactured their lead at Chicago, branding it "Southwestern St. Louis," surrounding the words "Strictly Pure White Lead;" the words "Southwestern St. Louis" appearing in the same form as the words "Southern Company, St. Louis." Defendants also pasted a label on their kegs, stating it was strictly pure. Analysis showed complainant's lead to be pure, and defendants' to be adulterated. Gresham, Ch. J., said: "I shall not stop to inquire whether the complainant's claim to trademark is or is not well founded, as I think it is entitled to an injunction upon another ground. The defendants so brand the heads of their kegs as to naturally mislead and induce persons purchasing for consumption to suppose they are purchasing the complainant's lead, when they are getting an inferior article. The brand used by the defendants is so like the complainant's as to induce the public to mistake the one for the other. The defendants sell their goods to retail dealers, and it may be that such dealers are not deceived, but they sell to consumers who are or may be deceived. The complainant is entitled to relief if the brand used by the defendants sufficiently resembles the complainant's brand to be mistaken for it, and the defendants adopted their brand for the purpose of selling their kegs as the kegs of complainant or for the purpose of enabling retail dealers to do so, and the complainant has been injured by this fraud, or is likely to be injured by it. The complainant manufactures its genuine white lead at St. Louis, and its reputation is already established as a manufacturer and dealer of this character. The defendants manufacture their adulterated and greatly inferior lead at Chicago, and stamp upon their kegs a false brand in imitation of the complainant's brand. Why is this done unless it be in the hope of deceiving the public and injuring the complainant? Realizing that they could not engage in open, manly competition with the complainant, the defendants resort to a palpable trick. If this resulted in no injury to the complainant, or was likely to result in no injury to it, the bill would have to be dismissed. But the affidavits show that the defendants' kegs can and have been sold as the complainant's."

Judge Blodgett in Southern White Lead Co. v. Coit, 39 Fed. Rep. 492, made the same ruling upon the same facts.

In A. F. Pike Mfg. Co. v. Cleveland Stone Co. 35 Fed. Rep. 896, it was sought to protect the names "Green Mountain," "Willoughby Lake," "Lamoille," and others as designating scythe stone, which had been used by complainant and its predecessors for a number of years. Defendants acquired a quarry adjacent to complainant's, and branded theirs in the same way. It was urged, first, that the brands employed by defendants did not infringe. Defendants used the exact words "Lamoille," "Green Mountain" and others, but in place of "Willoughby Lake" employed the title "Willoughby Ridge." It was ruled that the titles employed were infringements. It was next urged that the brands as applied to scythe stones indicated the quality or grit of the stones. The court said that they did not designate alone quality, but also indicated selection and care in the manufacture, and finally: "It is urged that 'Lamoille' and 'Willoughby Lake' are geographical terms. The defendants' quarry stones 200 miles from Lamoille county and Willoughby lake, and apply the names 'Lamoille' and 'Willoughby Ridge.' Assuming that complainant cannot have a valid trademark in these names, which I do not decide, it seems to be well settled that a manufacturer will be protected in the use of a geographical name as against one who does not carry on business in the district so designated. Bluckwell v. Dibrell, 8 Hughes, 160; Newman v. Alvord, 49 Barb. 588, 51 N. Y. 189, 10 Am. Rep. 588."

The same doctrine was upheld in Northcutt v. Turney, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 483. The complainants were the owners of what are called and known as the Upper and Lower Blue Lick springs in Nicholas county, Kentucky, and brought suit to enjoin Northcutt from using the words "Blue Lick" in connection with his advertisement and sale of water from an artesian well in Campbell county. The court, in affirming the right to an injunction, said: "It is substantially alleged and admitted that water from the two springs of appellees have been for a century known, sold, and used throughout the United States and many foreign countries as medicinal water, and also that they and those under whom they claim have, by long use and legal adoption, acquired exclusive right to the use of the words 'Blue Lick' as their trademark. Though Upper and Lower Blue Lick springs are some distance apart, and belong to two distinct firms, the water from them seems to be composed of the same ingredients, and to possess the same kind and combination of medicinal qualities. And, as the trademark 'Blue Lick Water' has been heretofore appropriately and legally adopted and used by each respective owner without objection of either, they have a common interest in preventing a third party illegally appropriating and using it, and, consequently, have a right to jointly maintain this action. Appellant states in his answer that he and those who preceded him have been selling and shipping water from said artesian well for a period of at least sixteen years; that for about one year of that time the trademark or brand used in the sale of said water was 'The Campbell County Blue Lick Water,' and for about fifteen years last past the trademark or brand used by him and the former owners and proprietors in sale of said waters has been 'Kentucky Blue Lick Water.' And the two defenses based upon this alleged statement of fact are: First, that appellees, having knowledge thereof, and acquiescing in such use of the words 'Blue Lick Water' by appellant and his predecessors, is now estopped to deny their right or interfere with the exercise of it by them; second, that the action is barred by the statute of limitation. That appellees acquired exclusive right to use as their trademark the words 'Blue Lick Water' is not only apparent from the facts stated in their petition, and conceded in the answer of appellant to be true, but has been definitely decided by this court in the case of Parkland Hills Blue Lick Water Co. v. Hawkins, 95 Ky. 503. Such being the case, the use and attempted appropriation of the same words by the predecessor of appellant, in advertising and selling water from the artesian well, was manifestly illegal and fraudulent."

Since the case of Columbia Mill Co. v. Alcorn, 150 U. S. 460, 37 L. ed. 1144, was decided, holding that the word "Columbia" placed upon flour sacks could not constitute a proper trademark word so as to give the person using it an exclusive right, no one would be so hardy as to claim that an exclusive right to the use of a geographical name could be acquired as a trademark proper. Indeed, the doctrine of that case was not new in 1893, but has been the leading doctrine on the subject both in this country and England for many years, as is clearly shown by the cases already cited. There is no inconsistency between that case and the previous decisions of the state and Federal courts in this country, including the decisions of the United States Supreme Court before cited, to the effect that "wrongs of this description, whereby, through an artifice of any sort, the goods of one manufacturer become confused in the public mind with goods of some other manufacturer, may be redressed by a court of equity." Merriam v. Famous Shoes & C. Co. 47 Fed. Rep. 411.

In the case of Pillsbury v. Pillsbury Washburn Flour Mills Co. 24 U. S. App. 395, 64 Fed. Rep. 841, 12 C. C. A. 432, which, like this, was a case of unfair and fraudulent competition, Jenkins, Circuit Judge, speaking for the court, says: "In the consideration of this question we have not overlooked the case of Columbia Mill Co. v. Alcorn. That was the case of a trademark pure and simple, in which it was held that one cannot acquire the right to the exclusive use of the word 'Columbia.' . .

There the proof failed to establish that the brand was calculated to mislead or deceive; here the proof is overwhelming to the effect that the brand used was designed to mislead, and actually did deceive and mislead."

Since the case of Columbia Mill Co. v. Alcorn was decided, a question arose in the United States circuit court for the district of New Jersey in Morgan Envelope Co. v. Walton, decided in 1897, and reported in 82 Fed. Rep. 469, in reference to the use of the same word "Columbia" in connection with certain symbolical representations of Columbia by different dealers who had placed it upon their packages of tissue paper. The complainants brought their bill to restrain the use of the word "Columbia" and the allegorical representation, alleging that they had used it for more than ten years continuously to distinguish their manufacture of a superior quality of tissue paper, and charging the defendants with the use of the same words and representations upon a tissue paper manufactured by them, and in such a manner as to constitute unfair and fraudulent competition. The defendants were allowed, besides answering, to file a cross bill, by which they set up that they had employed the word "Columbia" and a symbolical or allegorical representation of "Columbia" upon their packages for a period of seventeen years and longer before the complainants had employed them. The court, in deciding the case in favor of the defendants, granting the injunction asked for in the cross bill, says: "There cannot be any question that under these circumstances there is grave danger that the goods may be mistaken the one for the other. If the question presented were the only one raised by the complainants' bill, I should not hesitate to grant them the relief asked for; but the prior application by the defendants of the word 'Columbia' to the same product changes the situation of the parties. It cannot be said that Walton & Co. acquired a technical trademark in the word 'Columbia,' in view of the decision of Columbia Mill Co. v. Alcorn, 150 U. S. 460, 37 L. ed. 1144; but that they were the first persons, so far as the records show, to apply the word to this article of production, cannot be disputed. By such application and continued use their paper became known to the trade and the public generally. It acquired a reputation for quality, and the name was a distinctive mark of excellence. The figure of 'Columbia' afterwards added by the defendants cannot be regarded as more than a mere amplification of the word 'Columbia' previously appropriated. It conveys no further or other idea than the word, and can be regarded only as a different way of expressing it. It is apparent that, inasmuch as none of the wrappers in controversy bear the names of the makers, the packages must be known and designated and called for by the users as 'Columbia paper,' whether the word 'Columbia' be expressed in letters alone, or in a figure typifying 'Columbia.' So it would happen that, whether a purchaser wanted the package of the complainants or the defendants, he must ask for 'Columbia paper.' It would be impossible for the seller to know which of the manufactured articles was desired, and the public would be rendered liable to have imposed upon it goods which they did not want. Such a condition must inevitably lead to confusion in the trade, disappointment to the general public, deception of ultimate purchasers, and be productive of unfair competition in trade. Orr Ewing v. Johnson, L. R. 18 Ch. Div. 484; Sawyer v. Horn, 4 Hughes, 289, 1 Fed. Rep. 24. One cannot be permitted to practice deception in the sale of his goods as those of another, 'nor to use the means which contribute to that end.' Perry v. Truefitt, 6 Beav. 68. Irrespective of the question of trademark, inasmuch as Walton & Co. appear to have been the first to put up their paper with the distinguishing mark 'Columbia,' and as their goods were the first to become known to purchasers as 'Columbia paper,' no other person should be permitted to use that name as the sole distinguishing mark of a like article, whether expressed in letters or by figure, and in that manner mislead the general public into buying his goods as those of his competitor. If the word could not be used as a trademark, it is to be treated as a descriptive term, to the benefit of which they are entitled. Wilson v. T. H. Garrett & Co. 47 U. S. App. 250, 78 Fed. Rep. 472, and 24 C. C. A. 173."

The following are some other of the leading cases which we have examined, and which affirm the same general principle: Reddaway v. Bentham Hemp-Spinning Co. [1892] 2 Q. B. 639, 9 Rep. Pat. Cas. 503; Powell v. Birmingham Vinegar Brewery Co. 11 Rep. Pat. Cas. 563, 13 Rep. Pat. Cas. 235 [[1896] 2 Ch. 54]; Paine v. Daniell, 10 Rep. Pat. Cas. 217 [[1893] 2 Ch. 567]; Hine v. Last, 7 L. T. 41; Braham v. Beachin, L. R. 7 Ch. Div. 848; Knott v. Morgan, 2 Keen, 214; Magnolia Metal Co. v. Atlas Metal Co. 14 Rep. Pat. Cas. 389; Society of Accountants v. Corporation of Accountants, 20 Scot. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 750; Dunnachie v. Young, 10 Scot. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 874. In this last case the following remarks of Lord Craighill seem peculiarly applicable to the case at bar: "'Glenboig,' as used by the respondents, and without any explanation of the sense in which the word was used, could not but be a description almost certainly leading to a deception. The lord ordinary appears to me to have been insensible to this consideration. He thinks that because Dunnachie made 'Glenboig' a part of his trademark, the word must be held to be publici juris,—misreading the Case of Seizo, as I think. But Dunnachie was on Glenboig; the clay he used was raised and manufactured there; and in putting the name of the place into his trademark he was only following the course ordinarily pursued. The respondents, however, are not on Glenboig. In taking that word they took it only because it denoted goods known in the market to be of high quality; and, if they are to find virtue in it, this will only be because those who at first or second hand are the purchasers of their goods read the word as indicating that the goods are the product of a manufactory other than Heathfield. The respondents try to justify their assumption of Glenboig, first, on the ground that their clay is of the same seam; and, second, that the word 'Glenboig,' as used by them, is qualified by the word 'Young's' and so misapprehension, not to say deception, is prevented. The fact assumed in the former of these grounds has, I think, been established, but it is insufficient as a justification. The least that can be said on the subject is that the word, as used, is ambiguous. That, in my opinion, would be enough. Why should the respondents use a word that may mislead,—that may lead people to buy their goods as the goods of the complainants? If all the respondents desired to suggest is that their bricks are made of the clay of the Glenboig seam raised on Heathfield, a word or words could be introduced by which this could be communicated."

Every case, as has often been adjudged, must rest upon its own circumstances; but this case and many others already quoted seem quite undistinguishable on principle from the case in hand. The result of all the cases is that the question must come down to one of fair or fraudulent competition. Clark Thread Co. v. Armitage, 67 Fed. Rep. 897, Affirmed 45 U. S. App. 62, 74 Fed. Rep. 936, 21 C. C. A. 178; Merriam v. Texas Siftings Pub. Co. 49 Fed. Rep. 944; Seizo v. Proceende, L. R. 1 Ch. 192; Brooklyn White Lead Co. v. Masury, 25 Barb. 417; Wotherspoon v. Currie, L. R. 5 H. L. 508; Myers v. Kalamazoo Buggy Co. 54 Mich. 215; Keller v. B. F. Goodrich Co. 117 Ind. 556; Companie General v. Rehder, 5 Rep. Pat. Cas. 61; Free Fishers & Dredgers v. Elliott, 4 Law T. 273; Thompson v. Montgomery, L. R. 41 Ch. Div. 35. This last case is very analogous to the case at bar. The plaintiff had established a brewery at a place called "Stone," where he had long carried on business, and whence his ale, under the denomination "Stone Ale," had acquired a reputation. Lord Lindley, in reversing the order denying an injunction, said: "The plaintiff's rights are to prevent anybody from passing off his goods as the goods of the plaintiff which is indeed the very substance and kernel of the cases on this subject." California Fig Syrup Co. v. Taylor Drug Co. 14 Rep. Pat. Cas. 841.

In McAndrew v. Bassett, 4 De G. J. & S. 880, the plaintiffs were large manufacturers of licorice. They styled this licorice "Anatolia." Anatolia was the name applied to a whole tract of country wherein licorice root is largely grown. At the time plaintiffs began to use the word there was no other manufacturer of licorice stamping it with this word. Subsequently, in response to an order for Anatolia licorice, defendants caused a stamp to be prepared containing the word "Anatolia," and put it on the goods, and afterwards continued to use it. The court below granted a perpetual injunction restraining the use of the word "Anatolia" by the defendants on licorice. In response to the argument that the word "Anatolia" was common to all, the court said: "That argument is merely a repetition of the fallacy which I have frequently had occasion to expose. The property in the word for all purposes cannot exist, but property in that word, as applied by way of stamp upon a particular vendible article as a stick of licorice, does exist the moment the article goes into the market so stamped, and there obtained acceptance and reputation, whereby the stamp gets currency as an indication of superior quality, or of some other circumstance, which renders the article so stamped acceptable to the public."

Eq. 380, plaintiff and its predecessors had, at Newark, N. J., for a great many years, manufactured and sold stoves and ranges under the style of "Portland Stoves and Ranges." Defendants carried on business very close to plaintiff, and began to make, advertise, and sell "Famous Portland Ranges." It was insisted there could be no trademark in the word "Portland" because it was a geographical name, and on this point the court said: "But it is contended that a geographical name, like Portland, cannot be a trademark, nor be so used as to give the dealer, who first adopts it an exclusive property in it. This, I think, may be conceded, without impairing in the slightest degree the complainant's right to the protection it asks. For, as was said, in substance, by Lord Langdale, in the case just cited, the question, in cases like this, is not whether the complainant has a property in the name by which his goods are distinguished in the market, but, on the contrary, the pertinent inquiry is, Has the defendant a right to use the name by which the complainant's goods are known, for the purposes of deception, and in order to attract to himself that custom which, without the improper use of such name, would have flowed to the complainant? And the answer to the inquiry is that the defendant has no such right. The Supreme Court of the United States in Coats v. Merriok Thread Co. 149 U. S. 562, 566, 37 L. ed. 847, 850, recently said, speaking by Mr. Justice Brown, that there can be no question as to the soundness of the proposition that, irrespective of the technical question of trademark, one trader has no right to dress up his goods in such manner as to deceive an intending purchaser, and induce him to believe he is buying the goods of a rival trader. 'Rival manufacturers may lawfully compete for the patronage of the public in the price and quality of their goods, in the beauty and tastefulness of their inclosing packages, in the extent of their advertising, and in the employment of agents; but they have no right, by imitative devices, to beguile the public into buying their wares under the impression they are buying those of their rivals.'"

The same rule prevails in the French and German law, and is comprehensively thus laid down in Kohler, Trademarks: "Much more important is a second kind of fraudulent competition,—so important that many legislatures especially single it out, and have passed particularly severe rules regulating it. It is one of the most common practices to designate the products of a place, if these products be of a particularly celebrated character, by the name of their place of origin. For commerce in cultivated plants this form of designation is a vital question, and in the same way for mineral products, for mineral waters, and so forth; and also for industrial and manufactured goods this designation has an eminent meaning, since the products of certain countries have their peculiar advantages and peculiarities, which come either from the peculiar quality of the raw material of a country, from the customary skill of the workmen, or perhaps from a special method of production long in vogue. The great popularity of such goods in demand, the ready sale which they find, and the profits which their production brings, are temptation enough for many traders to mark their goods also with the name of this locality, entirely foreign to them, in order to realize the advantages which this demand produces. Such practices often inflict the most deplorable damage upon the genuine and reputable products of those places, not only in that they rob them of a good part of the revenue directly, but the greatest damage consists in the depreciation which the indifferent wares, entirely foreign to the nature of the place from which they are said to come, inflict upon the entire locality, which they bring into bad repute. Before the public notices the deception, it has become disgusted with the inferior goods, and a flourishing branch of industry is ruined at a blow. In glowing colors, and without exaggeration, the terrible effect which such practices have upon industry has been depicted in the report of Lemoine des Mares in the French law of 1824. It states there particularly that several branches of industry 'owe to them the loss of their relations with foreign countries which closed their markets to them from the moment that they saw the most common product arrive under a name which heretofore they had been in the habit of respecting and honoring.' Pouillet, p. 707. It is just the trade with foreign countries that is most injured by these practices, because there the deception is far more difficult to detect, and the foreigner is easiest deceived in his perception of the true nature of the goods."

The cases in which a person has been enjoined from using his own name in connection with other labels or brands upon his goods proceed upon the same general ground of deceit and unfair competition in trade. If a person may be restrained from the use of his own name upon his own goods because such use, in the circumstances, will deceive the public into purchasing his goods believing them to be the goods of another, to the injury of the public and the goodwill and business of such other person, so, also, on the like principle, may he be restrained from using any other proper or geographical name when such use will produce like results. Wilson v. T. H. Garrett & Co. 47 U. S. App. 250, 78 Fed. Rep. 478, 24 C. C. A. 178; William Rogers Mfg. Co. v. Rogers & S. Mfg. Co. 11 Fed. Rep. 495; R. W. Rogers Co. v. William Rogers Mfg. Co. 35 U. S. App. 848, 70 Fed. Rep. 1017, 17 C. C. A. 576; Landreth v. Landreth, 22 Fed. Rep. 41; Pillsbury v. Pillsbury-Washburn Flour Mills Co. 24 U. S. App. 395, 64 Fed. Rep. 841, and 12 C. C. A. 482; Tarrant v. Johann Hoff, 45 U. S. App. 143, 76 Fed. Rep. 959, 22 C. C. A. 644; Meyer v. Dr. B. L. Bull Vegetable Medicine Co. 18 U. S. App. 372, 53 Fed. Rep. 884, and 7 C. C. A. 558; Walter Baker & Co. v. Baker, 77 Fed. Rep. 181; Brinsmead v. Brinsmead, 101 Law Times, 606; Melachrinio v. Melachrinio Egyptian Cigarette Co. 4 Rep. Pat. Cas. 215; Barlow v. Johnson, 7 Rep. Pat. Cas. 395; Huntley v. Biscuit Co. 10 Rep. Pat. Cas. 277.

It is hardly necessary to cite authority for the doctrine that in cases where the question is simply one of unfair competition in trade it is not essential there should be any exclusive or proprietary right in the words or labels used, in order to maintain the action. This has been decided by the United States Supreme Court both before and since the decision of Columbia Mill Co. v. Alcorn. See Coats v. Merrick Thread Co. 149 U. S. 562, 37 L. ed. 847; Singer Mfg. Co. v. June Mfg. Co. 163 U. S. 169, 41 L. ed. 118. In the former of these cases the doctrine is distinctly and broadly announced that, "irrespective of any question of trademarks, rival manufacturers have no right, by imitative devices, to beguile the public into buying their wares under the impression that they are buying those of their rivals."

In the defendant's brief and argument much reliance is placed upon the fact that one of the mills belonging to the Pillsbury-Washburn Co. is situate outside the city limits of Minneapolis. But, upon examination, this defense, much like the other defenses in the case, vanishes into "unsubstantial air" when viewed in the light of the evidence. The objection, if good at all, would go to show a misjoinder of parties; that is to say, that the Pillsbury Flour Mills Company should not have been joined with the six other corporations, all of whose mills are situate at the Falls of St. Anthony, within the city limits of Minneapolis. It would furnish no good reason for not granting the relief asked for as to the other complainants. The objection, if of any value, should, no doubt, have been taken by plea in abatement for the misjoinder of parties. A plea to the merits is held to be an admission not only of the competency of the plaintiffs to sue, but to sue in the particular action which they bring. Society for Prop. of Gospel v. Pawlet, 4 Pet. 480, 7 L. ed. 927. But upon the merits there is but little substance to this objection. The evidence shows that this Anoka mill has always been an integral part of the great Minneapolis milling plant belonging to the Pillsbury Flour Mills Company; that it has the same machinery, is run by the same proprietors, in the same manner, grinds the same grade of wheat, is subject to the like interchange of flour and tests; that the business of the mill has always been conducted in Minneapolis by the same parties in connection with that of their other mills, and has always been considered and treated as one of the Minneapolis mills. It is situated on a tributary of the Mississippi river, about 10 miles outside the city limits, in a small suburb of the city, only because there happened to be a water power at that place. For these reasons, the public has not been deceived, because this, which is one of the smallest mills, has been practically for all purposes a Minneapolis mill, and part and parcel of the Pillsbury flouring plant in that city. There is nothing unusual, and it does not seem to be a material circumstance, that large manufacturing concerns carrying on business in a city should have some portion of their works outside the corporate limits; and it hardly requires the citation of authorities to the point that, where this is done, such business will be considered entitled to the same measure of protection as if carried on wholly within the corporate limits. See Kohler, Trademarks, 291; New York & R. Cement Co. v. Coplay Cement Co. 45 Fed. Rep. 212, where it is said that all cement manufacturers in Rosendale and vicinity may rightfully call their manufactured article "Rosendale Cement;" Cleveland Stone Co. v. Wallace, 52 Fed. Rep. 431.

As we read the opinion of the court below (see 82 Fed. Rep. 816), the injunction was refused, not only because the several complainants could have no exclusive interest in the words, the use of which by defendant is complained of, as a trademark, but on the further ground that the misuse of these words by the defendant cannot injuriously affect any one particular complainant, because they do not imply that any one in particular of the complainants manufactured the flour sold by the defendant. We think this ground not tenable. If the complainants were consolidated into one great business concern, this objection would be obviated, because then one corporation would manufacture all the flour made at Minneapolis, as now the several corporations complainant do. But, if such a corporation would be entitled to relief, we take it that any one or more of the complainant corporations having a common interest in preventing the fraud will also be entitled to maintain the action. In the judgment of the court it is the common every-day case of several persons having a common interest in the prevention of an irreparable injury joining together to obtain the desired relief. Though their interests are different in degree, they are of the same quality and kind. Any number of landowners may join together to enjoin the assessment and collection of an illegal tax upon real estate, or one or more may sue on their own behalf, and for the benefit of all others similarly situated. One landowner may own 1,000 acres, and another but 1. That makes no difference, so long as their grievance is of the same character, though differing in degree, as affecting different persons. So, if a person attempts to erect a nuisance of any kind upon a block of land in a city where the lots to be affected are owned by different owners, anyone may sue, or one or more may join together in asking for relief by injunction. The same principle is illustrated in the cases of common of pasturage or common of fishery, and the same rule prevails. The test is whether the parties have an interest in common in the subject-matter of the suit as well as in the question involved; whether, to use the language of Mr. Justice Nelson in Cutting v. Gilbert, 5 Blatchf. 259, 261, approved by the Supreme Court in Scott v. Donald, 165 U. S. 107, 116, 41 L. ed. 648, 654, "there is a community of interest growing out of the nature and condition of the right in dispute; for, although there may not be any privacy between the numerous parties, there is a common title out of which the question arises, and which lies at the foundation of the proceeding." In all of these cases, and many more of like kind, anyone may separately, but not jointly with another, maintain an action at law, or anyone or any number together, to save multiplicity of suits, and prevent irreparable injury, may maintain a bill in equity to enjoin. The doctrine is too common to require the citation of authorities.

In the examination of the cases upon the subject of fraudulent competition in trade we have found many like this, where both individuals and corporations having a common interest have united together to maintain the action in equity, only one or two of which we will refer to. In the case of Society of Accountants v. Corporation of Accountants, 20 Scot. Sess. Cas. 4th Series, 750, the Society of Accountants in Edinburgh, the Institute of Accountants and Actuaries in Glasgow, and Society of Accountants in Aberdeen, three several and distinct societies, all incorporated by royal charter, as well as the individual members of each, joined in a suit to prevent the Corporation of Accountants, Limited, and certain of its members, from using the letters "C. A." (chartered accountants). From the date of the incorporation of complainants these letters had been used to designate their members, and were so understood by the public. Each of the complainant societies consisted of a body of professional men who had associated themselves for the purpose, inter alia, of keeping up a high standard of professional education and efficiency. The court, in granting the interdict, said: "Here each of the corporations is not only incorporated, but each has a distinct patrimonial interest in enforcing its conditions of membership,—an interest attaching both to the corporations as such, but also to its individual members. But, if this be so,—if a wrong is done,—and a title to sue exists where there is only one corporation, does it make any difference that there are here three corporations, and that the injury consists in conduct which involves a false representation of membership of one or other of the three? I do not, I confess, see that this makes a difference in principle—at least assuming that, as here, the three corporations jointly complain. There may be a difference in degree,—that is to say, there may be a difference in the degree of the injury to each body individually,—but I think that that is all, and I am not able to hold that that is enough. Each corporation suffers a legal wrong, greater or less, and, that being conceded, the question becomes one merely of title to sue."

The case upon appeal was unanimously affirmed. The same rule was recognized and adopted in Northcutt v. Turney, 19 Ky. L. Rep. 483.

The order of the court below is reversed, and the case remanded, with instructions to grant the injunction as prayed.

KANSAS SUPREME COURT.

COMMERCIAL BANK et al., Plffs in Err.,
v.
CHESHIRE PROVIDENT INSTITUTION.

(.....Kan.....)

* An unrestricted guaranty of payment indorsed on a negotiable instrument is negotiable, and passes with the title to the instrument.

(May 7, 1896.)

ERROR to the District Court for Montgomery County to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action to enforce liability on a guaranty of a promissory note. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. James McKinstry, with Mr. J. D. McCue, for plaintiff in error:

The guaranty on which judgment was rendered was not a negotiable guaranty, under the law merchant, because payable generally and not "to order or bearer."

2 Dan. Neg. Inst. § 1774; 2 Parsons, Notes & Bills, pp. 133, 134; True v. Fuller, 21 Pick. 140; Briggs v. Latham, 36 Kan. 205, 59 Am. Rep. 546; 2 Randolph, Com. Paper, § 861; Tiedeman, Com. Paper, § 419.

It was not negotiable under the statute. The statute expressly declares that the words "to order or bearer," are essential words in a negotiable instrument. It also prohibits the courts from, by construction, making an instrument negotiable which does not contain these words.

Gen. Stat. 1889, chap. 14, § 1; Briggs v. Latham, 36 Kan. 205, 59 Am. Rep. 546.

The note was indorsed to plaintiff below. This is not an assignment of the guaranty. Indorsement and assignment are not equivalent terms.

Bank of Marietta v. Pindall, 2 Rand. (Va.) 475.

The guaranty is absolutely void. The bank, as a bank, had no power to sell or lend its credit. The guaranty was a loan of its credit, in violation of its corporate powers, and outside the usual and ordinary course of banking.

Morse, Banks & Banking, § 65; Farmers' & M. Bank v. Butcher's & D. Bank, 16 N. Y. 125, 69 Am. Dec. 678; Bank of Genesee v. Patchin Bank, 13 N. Y. 313; National Bank of Commerce v. Atkinson, 55 Fed. Rep. 471; Hall v. Auburn Turnp. Co. 27 Cal. 255, 87 Am. Dec. 75; Ang. & A. Corp. 257, 258; Knickerbocker v. Wilcox, 83 Mich. 200.

All parties dealing with this contract are presumed to have knowledge of the bank's power, and that it had no power to guarantee the paper of another, which it did not own.

Davis v. Old Colony R. Co. 131 Mass. 258, 41 Am. Rep. 221; Hendrie v. Berkowitz, 37 Cal. 113, 99 Am. Dec. 251.

NOTE.—As to the effect of payments indorsed on a note upon its negotiability, see note to Farmers' Bank v. Shippey (Pa.) 38 L. R. A. 823.

The fact that the guaranty recites a consideration does not change the rule as to persons having notice of the bank's want of power.

Messrs. Gleed, Ware, & Gleed for defendant in error.

Allen, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant in error obtained judgment against the Commercial Bank for $2,685 on a guaranty indorsed on a negotiable promissory note executed by Daniel Dart, in the following form:

For value received, the Commercial Bank hereby guarantees prompt payment of the interest on the within obligation, and the payment of the principal at maturity.

Witness our hands this 12th day of May, 1886.

Geo. T. Gunersey, Cashier.

L. U. Humphrey, President.

The note was made payable to the order of the Topeka Investment & Loan Company, and by it indorsed before maturity to the Cheshire Provident Institution. The petition alleges that, at the time the note and mortgage securing the same were executed, the Commercial Bank, in writing and for a valuable consideration, executed the guaranty above copied. The answer of the Commercial Bank alleges that it, as a corporation, never had any interest in the note, and never received any value for the execution of the guaranty, that the officers of the bank had no authority to execute the guaranty, and that these facts were known to the payee of the note at the time of its delivery. To this answer the plaintiff replied with a general denial. The case was tried to the court, and a general finding was made in favor of the plaintiff on which judgment was entered for the amount of the note and interest. Counsel for plaintiff in error claim: First, that the guaranty on which judgment was rendered was not a negotiable guaranty, because payable generally, and not to order or bearer; second, that the indorsement of the note did not assign the guaranty; third, that, if it be conceded that the indorsement of the note operated as an assignment of it, all defenses against the first holder are available against the assignee; fourth, that the guaranty is void, because the bank had no power to lend its credit in that manner.

The first point presents the most important question in the case, and one on which the authorities are conflicting. It will be noticed that the guaranty under consideration in this case contains no words of negotiability, but is indorsed on a negotiable instrument. In Daniel on Negotiable Instruments the conflicting views of the courts and text writers are summarized, and in § 1777 [Vol. 2] the author says: "On the other hand, there are cases which maintain that, although the guaranty on the paper, written at the time of delivery, specifies no person to whom the guarantor undertakes to be liable, and has no negotiable words, it runs with the instrument to which it refers, partakes of its quality of negotiability, and any person having the legal interest in the instrument takes in like manner the guaranty, as an incident, and may sue thereon. And it has been said, in such a case, 'this view is consistent with the nature of the transaction, the evident intention of the parties, and the objects and uses of commercial paper.' This seems to us the better doctrine. By writing the guaranty on the paper the guarantor evidences his intention to guarantee the contract of the maker. That contract, being negotiable, is made with any and every person who may be the holder, and the guarantor is thus brought in privity with any and every person who becomes the holder." This view of the law seems to us supported by reason and the weight of authority. A guaranty indorsed on a negotiable instrument is to be construed with the language of the instrument. The one under consideration in terms, names no guaranty. The evident intent was to guarantee the payment to the legal holder of the note. We are unable to perceive any good ground for the position taken by some of the authorities, that the guaranty inures to the benefit of the first holder of the paper only. The transfer of the note by indorsement must certainly operate at least as an assignment of the guaranty. We think it does more, and that the guaranty passes by the indorsement as fully as the note itself. The Commercial Bank by its guaranty became a party to a negotiable instrument. It employed no words limiting its liability, and it must make good the terms of its promise to the legal holder of the paper. This view of the law is sustained by the following authorities: Story, Bills, § 453; Webster v. Cobb, 17 Ill. 459; Phelps v. Sargent (Minn.) 71 N. W. 927; McLaren v. Watson, 28 Wend. 425, 37 Am. Dec. 260; Partridge v. Davis, 20 Vt. 499; Jones v. Berryhill, 25 Iowa, 289; Brandt, Suretyship and Guaranty, § 47.

The view, opposed to the negotiability of a guaranty, unless made so by express terms, is taken by Mr. Randolph in his work on Commercial Paper (§ 261), and the authorities sustaining that view are cited in the notes. Much stress and reliance are placed on the case of Briggs v. Latham, 86 Kan. 205, 59 Am. Rep. 546. In that case a recovery was sought on a guaranty written on a mortgage securing the note. It was a guaranty of the payment of the mortgage. The mortgage itself was not a negotiable instrument, and there were no words of negotiability in the guaranty. We are entirely satisfied with the decision of that case. The dictum contained in the opinion, seemingly opposed to the conclusion reached in this case, being entirely outside of the question before the court is not of binding authority. That the guaranty is assignable, and passes with the assignment of the debt guaranteed, does not admit of doubt. Reed v. Garvin, 13 Serg. & R. 100; Claflin v. Ostrom, 54 N. Y. 581; Harbord v. Cooper, 48 Minn. 466; Stillman v. Northrup, 109 N. Y. 473. The record before us does not contain any of the evidence offered at the trial. The general finding resolves all doubts as to the facts against the plaintiffs in error. We must therefore presume that the guaranty was executed for a valuable consideration by the duly authorized officers of the bank, and in due course of business. The claim that a banking institution dealing in commercial paper is without authority to bind itself by a guaranty thereof has nothing to commend it to especial favor. It is true that in this case the paper itself does not indicate that the Commercial Bank ever owned it. Nevertheless it may have received the proceeds, and the guaranty may have been made strictly in the interest of the bank. Attempts of corporations, organized solely for profit, to avoid their obligations on the ground that they are ultra vires, have never been received with marked favor by this court. Kansas Nat. Bank v. Quinton, 57 Kan. 750; Arkansas Valley Town & L. Co. v. Lincoln, 56 Kan. 145; Alexandria, A. & Ft. S. R. Co. v. Johnson, 58 Kan. 175. The general finding in favor of the plaintiff is a complete answer to all questions urged on our consideration, except that as to the negotiability of the guaranty, and the effect of the indorsement of the paper as an assignment of it.

The judgment is affirmed.

NEW HAMPSHIRE SUPREME COURT.

STATE of New Hampshire

v.

Willard H. GRIFFIN.

(.....N. H.....)

1. Injury to the interests of a person, resulting from an exercise of the police power, do not entitle him to compensation under the law of eminent domain, if no part of his lands or property is taken therefor.
2. A police regulation prohibiting acts which are in some circumstances harmless is not unconstitutional as an exercise of judicial power.
3. A statute prohibiting the depositing of sawdust in the waters of a lake or any tributary thereto is a proper exercise of the police power.
4. A general law making a police regulation applicable to part of the state only is not void for lack of equality and uniformity.

(March 12, 1897.)

CASE RESERVED by the Supreme Court for Rockingham County for the opinion of the full bench upon an appeal from a judg-

NOTE.—Statutory protection of water used for supplying municipalities.

The cases in which the power of the legislature to prohibit the fouling of water from which a municipal supply is obtained, is considered, are not numerous. The power seems to have been upheld whenever it has been called in question, and in several cases statutes enacted for that purpose have been enforced without any question being raised as to their constitutionality.

In State v. Wheeler, 44 N. J. L. 88, it was held that a statute prohibiting the casting into any stream from which a water supply is taken, of any matter calculated to render the water impure, does not violate the constitutional provision against appropriation of private property without compensation, nor is it an act of eminent domain for which compensation must be made.

The California Penal Code makes it a misdemeanor to keep any sheep or other live stock penned, corralled, or housed on, over, or on the banks of a stream, the waters of which are thereby polluted and are drawn for the supply of the inhabitants of any city or town in the state. And it was held a violation of this statute to herd sheep upon the banks of the stream for a large part of each day. People v. Borda, 106 Cal. 638.

In People, Ricks Water Co., v. Elk River Mill & L. Co. 107 Cal. 221, the judge says: "I do not doubt the power of the legislature to make criminal the acts therein specified [in the statute], when the direct effect of such acts is to pollute . . . waters" used for supplying a municipal corporation.

The New York statute of 1898, chap. 189, gives the commissioner of public works of the city of New York the right to take such measures as he may deem necessary to preserve from pollution and defilement all the sources of the water supply of the city. Tilford v. New York, 1 App. Div. 199.

ment of a justice of the peace convicting defendant of depositing sawdust in a stream contrary to the terms of a statute. Appeal dismissed.

For the purpose of increasing the facilities for its water supply, the city of Manchester, in 1881, acquired the farm of defendant's father situated on Sucker brook, a tributary of Lake Massabesic, which lake is the source of the water supply of the city. It leased the property back to the grantor for a period of twenty years with right of renewal. There was a sawmill on the property, and other sawmills along the stream. In 1881, a state statute was passed prohibiting the deposit of sawdust in the tributaries of said lake. It appeared in evidence that the effect of sawdust in the water is to discolor it and impart to it a woody taste. Near the mills the effect of decay is to render the water unwholesome. But at the point where the city's water supply was taken from the lake the effect of the sawdust on the water could not be detected except by chemical analysis. The lease having become vested in the defendant, proceedings were taken against him for violation of the statute, which resulted in his conviction.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

And that act gives the right to condemn lands contiguous to the source of supply for the purpose of removing possible sources of contamination from them. Daly v. Smith, 18 App. Div. 194.

In Kelley v. New York, 6 Misc. 518, that act was held constitutional, but it provided for the acquisition by the city of lands containing the source of pollution, and did not, as some other of the statutes have, contain a direct prohibition against throwing polluting matter into the stream.

Chapter 661 of the Laws of 1893 requires a municipal corporation benefited to pay the expense of changes ordered by the state board of health to protect a water supply from contamination. Merritt v. New York, 21 App. Div. 165.

The Massachusetts statute forbids the discharge into any stream used as a water supply within 20 miles above the point where the supply is taken, of any sewage, drainage, refuse, or polluting matter of such quality or amount as to be deleterious to health. Brookline v. Mackintosh, 133 Mass. 215.

The Utah statute of 1892 prohibits the establishment of any corral, camp, or bedding place for the purpose of herding, holding, or keeping any cattle, horses, or sheep within 7 miles of any city, town, or village, where the refuse or filth from such place will naturally find its way into any stream or water used by the inhabitants of the city, town, or village for domestic purposes. People v. McCune, 14 Utah, 152, 85 L. R. A. 396.

The Pennsylvania legislature passed an act to prevent pollution of the water supplying cities of the commonwealth, and making it unlawful to locate any cemetery within 1 mile of any city of first class, the drainage from which passed into a stream from which a water supply was obtained; but the court held that it was a local law and violated the provisions of the Constitution. Philadelphia v. Westminster Cemetery Co. 162 Pa. 106, Affirming 3 Pa. Dist. R. 151.

H. P. F.

Mr. Oliver E. Branch, for appellant:

Griffin's mill privilege on the brook was a species of property. He used the stream for manufacturing purposes. That use constituted a property or right, for, in its final analysis, it is the use only of what one possesses that constitutes his property in it.

Eaton v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 51 N. H. 511, 12 Am. Rep. 147.

If the use of the stream for transporting sawdust ever was unlawful, or was a private trespass, it became lawful, and the trespass ripened into a substantial right after an uninterrupted and open use and enjoyment of it by him and his predecessors for more than one hundred years.

Griffin's contract with the city gave him the right to use the brook in the same way that it had theretofore been used, which included the right to throw sawdust into it.

This act, although it is printed among the laws of the state passed in January session, 1891, is nevertheless a private act. The legislature cannot transmute the real into the unreal, nor transform fictions into facts. If it attempts to do so, its action may be investigated by the courts. Thus, if it should declare that to be a public use which in its nature was private, its declaration on that point may be set aside by the court.

Concord R. Co. v. Greely, 17 N. H. 57.

If the legislature should declare that a stream shall be considered a public highway, yet, if in fact it is not one, the legislative declaration that it is so cannot make it so, since, if it is private property, the legislature cannot appropriate it to a public use without providing for compensation.

Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 591; Coe v. Schulte, 47 Barb. 64; Re Cheesebrough, 78 N. Y. 232.

This statute cannot be sustained unless it was passed by the legislature in the exercise of its police power. But the police powers of the legislature are not without limitations, and in the exercise of them the legislature must move within constitutional limitations.

This law is unconstitutional in that it is not an equal and uniform law of the state. It does not apply to all its citizens similarly situated.

The effect of this statute is to take from Griffin the consideration for which his farm was sold to the city. This amounts to depriving him of his farm without consideration. To deprive one of the ordinary beneficial use and enjoyment of his property is, in law, equivalent to the taking of it, and is as much a taking as though the property itself were actually taken.

If the taking of property becomes necessary, compensation must be awarded, and if the use of it constitutes in fact a nuisance, that fact must be found as any other fact is found, which affects a man's liberty or property. It cannot be established by a mere legislative fiat.

Gray v. Burlington & M. R. Co. 37 Iowa, 119.

An abutter's private right of use and occupation, being a part of his estate, cannot be taken from him for private use without his consent, or for public use without compensation.

Concord Mfg. Co. v. Robertson, 66 N. H. 20, 18 L. R. A. 679.

The use of the brook and of the lake itself for the purpose of sawing lumber and disposing of the sawdust were property rights which Griffin had, subject only to the restriction of reasonable use. What is reasonable is a question of fact, whether the water is private or public, and is one of fact for the jury.

The chief end sought by the Constitution was to secure to all as perfect equality of privilege and of burden as human wisdom permits, and to this all other purposes were incidental and subordinate.

The police power has been defined to be "the right of a state, or of a state functionary, to prescribe regulations for the good order, peace, protection, comfort, and convenience of the community, which do not encroach on the like power vested in Congress by the Federal Constitution."

While it is said that its exercise is within the discretion of the legislature, this statement must be taken with the qualification that the discretion of the legislature must be exercised within constitutional limitations.

A law is local if it touches a part of the state, or a part of its people. If it touches either it is local.

Watertown v. Mayo, 109 Mass. 319, 12 Am. Rep. 694; State v. Noyes, 30 N. H. 279.

Carpenter, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

If any person shall throw, place, leave, or cause to be thrown, placed, or left, any sawdust in Lake Massabesic, situated in Auburn and Manchester, or in any stream tributary thereto, he shall be punished for the first offense by a fine not exceeding $20, or by imprisonment not exceeding thirty days, or both; and for any subsequent offense by a fine of not exceeding $100, or by imprisonment not exceeding six months, or both." Laws 1891, chap. 26, § 1. The complaint is founded upon this statute. The circumstance that the defendant holds the mill under a lease from the city of Manchester and the stipulations of the lease are immaterial. The city cannot exempt the defendant from the operation of the statute. The only defense is that the act is unconstitutional. The defendant claims that it is in conflict with the Constitution for three distinct reasons, namely: Because (1) it deprives him of his property without compensation; (2) it is an exercise, not of legislative, but of judicial power; and (3) it is not an equal and uniform law, applicable equally to all persons similarly situated, but operates only against those engaged in a particular business in a particular part of the state.

"It is a settled principle, growing out of the nature of well-ordered civil society, that every holder of property, however absolute and unqualified may be his title, holds it under the implied liability that his use of it may be so regulated that it shall not be injurious to the equal enjoyment of others having an equal right to the enjoyment of their property, nor injurious to the rights of the community. All property in this commonwealth . . . is derived directly or indirectly, from the government, and held subject to those general regulations which are necessary to the common good and general welfare. Rights of property, like all other social and conventional rights, are subject to such reasonable limitations in their enjoyment as shall prevent them from being injurious, and to such reasonable restraints and regulations established by law as the legislature, under the governing and controlling power vested in them by the Constitution, may think necessary and expedient. This is very different from the right of eminent domain,—the right of a government to take and appropriate private property to public use, whenever the public exigency requires it, which can be done only on condition of providing a reasonable compensation therefor. The power we allude to is rather the police power,—the power vested in the legislature by the Constitution to make, ordain, and establish all manner of wholesome and reasonable laws, statutes, and ordinances, either with penalties or without, not repugnant to the Constitution, as they shall judge to be for the good and welfare of the commonwealth, and of the subjects of the same. It is much easier to perceive and realize the existence and sources of this power than to mark its boundaries, or prescribe limits to its exercise. There are many cases in which such a power is exercised by all well ordered governments, and where its fitness is so obvious that all well-regulated minds will regard it as reasonable. Such are the laws to prohibit the use of warehouses for the storage of gunpowder near habitations or highways; to restrain the height to which wooden buildings may be erected in populous neighborhoods, and require them to be covered with slate and other incombustible material; to prohibit buildings from being used for hospitals for contagious diseases, or for carrying on of noxious or offensive trades; to prohibit the raising of a dam, and causing stagnant water to spread over meadows near inhabited villages, thereby raising noxious exhalations, injurious to health and dangerous to life. Nor does the prohibition of the noxious use of property,—a prohibition imposed because such use would be injurious to the public,—although it may diminish the profits of the owner, make it an appropriation to a public use, so as to entitle the owner to compensation. If the owner of a vacant lot in the midst of a city could erect thereon a great wooden building, and cover it with shingles, he might obtain a larger profit of his land than if obliged to build of stone or brick with a slated roof. If the owner of a warehouse, in a cluster of other buildings, could store quantities of gunpowder in it for himself and others, he might be saved the great expense of transportation. If a landlord could let his building for a smallpox hospital or a slaughterhouse, he might obtain an increased rent. But he is restrained; not because the public may have occasion to make the like use, or to make any use of the property, or to take any benefit or profit to themselves from it; but because it would be a noxious use, contrary to the maxim, sic utere tuo ut alienum non ladas. It is not an appropriation of the property to a public use, but the restraint of an injurious private use by the owner, and is, therefore, not within the principle of property taken under the right of eminent domain." Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, 84-86. The universal doctrine on the subject is nowhere more clearly stated than in the foregoing language of Chief Justice Shaw. It has been often applied and never questioned in this state.

In State v. Clark, 28 N. H. 176, 61 Am. Dec. 611 (decided in 1854, when the keeping for sale of intoxicating liquors was not unlawful), it was held that a city ordinance adopted under legislative authority, prohibiting the keeping of liquors in "any refreshment room or restaurant for any purpose whatever," was constitutional. In State v. Noyes, 80 N. H. 279, it was held that the statute declaring a "bowling alley situate within 25 rods of any dwelling house, store, shop, schoolhouse, or place of public worship" to be a public nuisance (Laws 1845, chap. 245), was constitutional, although it deprived the defendant of the use of a bowling alley lawfully built, if not put in operation, before the statute took effect. It was not suggested by the defendant's counsel that the act was invalid for the reason that the defendant was deprived of that use of his property without compensation. In State v. Freeman, 88 N. H. 426 a city ordinance prohibiting restaurants to be kept open after 10 o'clock at night was held valid. Bell, J. says (p. 438): "It is an unavoidable consequence of city ordinances that they, in some degree, interfere with the unlimited exercise of private rights which were previously enjoyed. It is one thing to deprive a party of his rights, and quite another to regulate and restrain their exercise in such a manner as the common convenience and safety may require. If it is permissible to interfere in any way with the private right to carry on and manage his lawful business at such time and place and in such manner as suits himself, we are unable to see anything unreasonable in requiring places of public entertainment to be closed at seasonable hours. The guaranty of the Constitution is just as effective to secure the citizen against the interference of the legislature as of the city council, and it has never been questioned that the legislature may constitutionally pass laws materially interfering with the business of individuals." In Morey v. Brown, 42 N. H. 873, an act providing that no one should be liable for killing a dog found without a collar, etc., was held constitutional. Bartlett, J., says (p. 875): "The plaintiff claims that the act is in conflict with our Constitution, but we do not think so. It is not, as he argues, an act to take private property for public uses, or to deprive parties of their property in dogs, but merely to regulate the use and keeping of such property in a manner that seemed to the legislature reasonable and expedient. It is a mere police regulation, such as we think the legislature might constitutionally establish." A statute prohibiting the sale of goods by any person outside his usual place of business within 2 miles of a public assembly convened for religious worship (Gen. Stat. chap. 255, § 9) is constitutional. State v. Cate, 58 N. H. 240. "Vice, pauperism, and crime may be suppressed and prevented by a variety of measures. In behalf of property, health, life, and morals the social contract may be performed by destroying buildings, burglars' tools, gambling, and counterfeiting implements, and intoxicating liquors. The spread of fire and physical, mental, and moral disease may be stopped by vigorous action. Destruction may be protection. . . . For the common security, by the judgment of his peers and the law of the land, an offender may be deprived of his estate, liberty, and life. Wrong may be obstructed and repressed by methods less severe than capital punishment. The protective power may seek by mild courses to lessen an evil, or check its increase. Instead of destroying the life, liberty, or property of wrongdoers, it may discourage their noxious business, and restrain it within certain bounds." State v. United States & C. Exp. Co. 60 N. H. 219, 257. "The police power of the state extends to the protection of the lives, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons and the protection of all property, within the state; and persons and property are subjected to such restraints and burdens as are reasonably necessary to secure the general comfort, health, and prosperity. . . . The state has authority to make regulations as to the time, mode, and circumstances under which parties shall assert, enjoy, or exercise their rights without coming in conflict with any of those constitutional principles which are established for the protection of private rights and private property." State v. White, 64 N. H. 48, 50. In State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 402, a statute prohibiting the sale of milk containing less than a specified per cent of milk solids, though perfectly pure and wholesome, was held valid. The court says (p. 403, 64 N. H.): "Under what is generally called the police power of the state, . . . the sale of bread, the inspection of flour, beef, pork, and other provisions, the practice of medicine, surgery, and dentistry, the licensing of druggists, and the sales of drugs and medicines, are regulated, and the sale of spirituous or intoxicating liquor prohibited by statute. . . . Such legislation is not open to the objection that it transcends the limits of legislative authority, the purpose and object of such legislation being the protection of the lives, health, comfort, and safety to all persons; and for securing this purpose persons and property are subjected to many restraints and burdens. They are presumed to be rewarded by the common benefits secured." Bancroft v. Cambridge, 126 Mass. 438, 441. In Mugler v. Kansas, 123 U. S. 628, 664, 670, 31 L. ed. 205, 211, 218, it was held that the owners of breweries that were made worthless by a statute forbidding the manufacture of malt liquors were entitled to no compensation for the practical destruction of their property. Any conceivable statute enacted under the police power, and regulating the use of property, must necessarily affect injuriously individual rights, but in no instance, so far as known, has it been declared by a court of last resort that persons whose interests are so affected are entitled to compensation. Under the law of eminent domain no one is entitled to compensation for injuries, however serious they may be, caused by public improvements, if no part of his lands or property is taken therefor. Kennett's Petition, 24 N. H. 139, 143; Mount Washington Road Co.'s Petition, 35 N. H. 184, 146, 147.

The objection that the act is judicial in its character—that in enacting it the legislature exercised its judicial power—has no better foundation. Merrill v. Sherburne, 1 N. H. 199, 203, 204, 8 Am. Dec. 52. The precise question was considered and decided in State v. Noyes, 30 N. H. 279, where it was held that the statute declaring bowling alleys situated within 25 rods of a dwelling are public nuisances, was not, for this reason, unconstitutional. Bell, J., says (pp. 294, 295): "It is objected to this law that, if otherwise constitutional, it is forbidden by the Constitution, because it undertakes to determine questions of fact and law, and is judicial in its character. What is or is not a nuisance, is a judicial question, it is said, to be determined by courts; and this is clearly so. Nothing is a nuisance unless it is made such by the law, and to determine what is by the law a nuisance is an exercise of judicial power. But the legislature do not exceed their legitimate authority when they make a change of the law, and constitute that an offense which was not such before, nor when they make certain acts an offense of a particular kind within which they were not previously included. There may be an apparent unfitness sometimes in such legislation, but its validity has never been questioned. . . . It may be said that a bowling alley is not of itself a nuisance, since it may either remain unused, or it may be used only as a place of innocent amusement; that its injurious character depends upon the improper use alone. But the legislature may well determine that an instrument which tends to facilitate vicious practices is of itself an evil which ought to be prohibited. There seems to us, then to be no sound foundation for this exception." Farnum's Petition, 51 N. H. 376, 380, 381.

The instances are numerous in which acts and things not nuisances at common law, and in themselves harmless and inoffensive, or even beneficial, and only liable to become offensive to the public health or comfort by improper use, have been by statute declared nuisances. Such legislation, whenever brought in question, has been sustained by the courts. Pub. Stat. chap. 108, §§ 8, 10, 12, 15; State v. Wilton, 43 N. H. 415, 420, 89 Am. Dec. 163. The following are a few out of the many early examples of such legislation, viz.: The act of April 6, 1781, against permitting swine to go at large in Portsmouth (Laws, ed. 1789, p. 174); of February 28, 1786, forbidding gunpowder in excess of 10 pounds to be kept in private houses in Portsmouth (Laws, p. 184); of January 3, 1792, forbidding the erection or occupation of slaughter houses or a house for currying leather or trying tallow in the compact part of any town (Laws, ed. 1797, p. 194); of January 14, 1795, against permitting horses, etc., to go at large without fetters (Laws, p. 340); of February 18, 1794, forbidding gunpowder in excess of 10 pounds to be kept in private houses or in vessels at the wharves in Portsmouth (Laws, pp. 359, 860); of June 16, 1791, against permitting swine to go at large in any town without being yoked and ringed, or at all in Portsmouth (Laws, p. 870); of June 16, 1792, prohibiting the casting of gravel, stones, ashes, etc., into Portsmouth Harbor (Laws, p. 891); of June 22, 1788, prohibiting the setting of gill nets in Ammonoosuc river (Laws, p. 402); of January 9, 1795, prohibiting seines, nets, and pots in Connecticut river (Laws, p. 404). The act of October 19, 1887, declaring any building used for the illegal sale of spirituous or malt liquors, wine, or cider to be a common nuisance, has been sustained by many decisions. Whether a statute restricting individual rights, that is enacted for the purpose of protecting the public health, may be declared unconstitutional and void, because, in the opinion of the court, it has no such effect, is a question not raised. It is found that the tendency of sawdust in the water is to render it unwholesome. It is needless to pursue the subject. It is enough to say that this objection cannot be sustained without overruling State v. Noyes.

The principal ground relied upon is that the act is local in its operation. It is not, it is said, equal and uniform, and does not apply to all persons similarly situated. It operates, it is urged, against a class only and those engaged in a particular occupation in a part only of the state. It is said that, "if the water supply of Manchester needs a sawdust law, the water supplies of other towns in the same situation need the same law. If an infusion of sawdust is unwholesome for the people of Manchester it is unwholesome for other people."

If Massabesic can be selected by a state law for protection unknown elsewhere, the well of a Massabesic farmer can be protected by a penal enactment applicable to no other well.

All wells, springs, and brooks from which the owners and their families take their supply of water for domestic purposes are equally entitled to protection. A statute making it a felony or misdemeanor to put sawdust or other substance in the well of A. B. in Haverhill, and leaving all other wells in the state protected by the common law alone, would be valid if the act of 1891 is valid in giving Manchester a protection against sawdust that is not given to anybody else in the same situation. Under a state law equality is a right, or the construction repeatedly put upon the Constitution from 1827 to the present time is a false pretense." In other words, it is claimed that a general law applicable to a particular place, or not applicable throughout the entire state, is unconstitutional. The legislature cannot make an act a penal offense in one locality,—as a city, town, or other place,—where, for the public welfare, the legislation is necessary, without also making it penal in all other parts of the state, though in none of them is the protection necessary or desirable. It cannot forbid the killing of the few deer found in the small and scattered forests of Cheshire county, without also forbidding it in the vast wilderness of Coos, though there they become so numerous as to be a pest. It cannot protect the wells of Haverhill, where the state of society makes protection necessary, without extending it to all other wells, though they need no protection. It cannot confer an authority upon one town which it does not give to all. Legislation required for the public good in Strafford county must be made applicable to Grafton, though there it is injurious. The acts for the protection of the Duston monument (Laws 1874, chap. 44) and of Corbin Park (Laws 1895, chap. 258) are unconstitutional and void. If, however, the words, "or any other like monument in the state," "or any other like park in the state," were added, though no other such monument or park exists, the statutes would be valid: that is to say, the constitutionality of a statute may depend upon the presence or absence of words that in practical effect are immaterial. If this is sound constitutional law, more than a thousand invalid statutes have been enacted since the adoption of the Constitution. In numerous instances rights under them have been enforced, and punishment for their violation has been inflicted by judicial action. Not one in a hundred of such cases appears in the reports, and in two only of the reported cases (Scott v. Willson, 3 N. H. 821, and Charter of Manchester, 47 N. H. 277), was this objection taken, in both of which it was overruled. In all this class of cases for more than a hundred years our courts have administered to the people gross injustice, instead of constitutional justice. No clause in the Constitution condemning such legislation is pointed out. No judgment of the court declaring it invalid is cited. No such decision can be found. The sole argument of the defendant in support of his position is that the act is inconsistent with "the equality of right which the Constitution secures to all; that it discriminates in favor of some citizens to the detriment of others." The argument is without foundation in fact. The statute makes no discrimination. It does not permit some persons and forbid others to put sawdust in the lake. Everybody is prohibited. "Any person," says the statute, who puts sawdust in the lake, shall be punished. True it is that the prohibition affects the owners of sawmills on the lake shore more seriously than the farmers, and it affects the farmers there dwelling more seriously than the farmers of Coos. Such is necessarily the effect of all restrictive laws. They affect some persons more than others. A similar objection might be made against the larceny law. It has no effect upon the great body of the people, but upon a small class only, namely, the thieves. In the sense of the defendant's argument, it is as unequal as the sawdust law.

The act confers upon Manchester or its citizens no individual or exclusive right or benefit, within the meaning of the Constitution. Every inhabitant of the state is entitled to enjoy the benefits conferred by the statute on complying with the necessary conditions, as he may, if he choose, enjoy the benefit of the aqueduct itself or of any other property taken for the public use. If this act violates the law of equality prescribed by the Constitution because only the 50,000 inhabitants of Manchester are directly benefited by it, because to reap its benefit a person must go to Manchester, all acts authorizing the condemnation of private property for aqueducts, cemeteries, or other public uses, which, from their nature, can be enjoyed only in the towns and cities where they are located, are equally invalid. It is impossible to hold that the legislation in the latter case is for the public good, and that it is not in the former. The equality of the Constitution is the equality of persons, and not of places; the equality of right, and not of enjoyment. A law that confers equal rights on all citizens of the state, or subjects them to equal burdens, and inflicts equal penalties on every person who violates it, is an equal law, though no one can enjoy the right, be subjected to the burden, or infringe its provisions, without going to or being in a particular part of the state. It does not discriminate in favor of some at the expense of others. There are places regarding which any protective legislation must necessarily be special; as, for example, Corbin Park and the state-house yard. Laws 1883, chap. 12; Pub. Stat. chap. 7, § 5. If general in form, it would be special in substance. There are few, if any, towns, cities, or other subdivisions of the state, whose situation and circumstances are so nearly alike that legislation may not be required for one that is not necessary or desirable for any other. Many may be so differently situated that legislation essential for one would be injurious to the others. No two cities in the state are governed by exactly the same ordinances. Acts made penal offenses in some cities are innocent in others. No two charters are alike. Some cities have over them a police commission, while others select and control their police officers. Their authority and their ordinances differ in many particulars. So it is, in perhaps a less degree, with towns. Many have been given authority which others do not possess. Their by-laws (Pub. Stat. chap. 40, §§ 7, 8) are not uniform. Acts forbidden in some towns are permitted in others. It is said that this lack of uniformity results "from the exercise of limited powers of local government granted to towns and cities," and therefore has no bearing on the present question. In the first place, it is not, as a matter of fact, altogether a result of local ordinances or by-laws. Much of it is created by the direct action of the legislature; as, for example, in the creation of police commissioners, and in conferring special powers upon particular towns. In the next place, acts under a delegated power are the acts of the principal. The principal cannot confer upon his agent a power which he does not himself possess. Whatever by laws and ordinances the legislature can lawfully authorize towns and cities to adopt, it has the constitutional power to enact directly. Wooster v. Plymouth, 62 N. H. 193, 208-210; State v. Noyes, 30 N. H. 279, 298. The legislature may at any time resume the delegated powers. Rumney & W. Union School Dist. v. Smart, 18 N. H. 268, 273; Liabon v. Clark, 18 N. H. 234; Stevens v. Dimond, 6 N. H. 330, 331; State v. Hayes, 61 N. H. 335; Berlin v. Gorham, 34 N. H. 266, 275. If the legislature is by the Constitution forbidden to enact such laws, it cannot authorize towns and cities to enact them. It cannot confer a power it does not itself possess. It is not for the court to inquire into the wisdom or unwisdom of such legislation.

Whether the act "be wise, reasonable, or expedient is a legislative, and not a judicial, question. The legislature is as capable of determining the question of the wisdom, reasonableness, and expediency of a statute, and of the necessity for its enactment, as the courts. The only inquiry is whether the statute conflicts with the Constitution." State v. Marshall, 64 N. H. 549, 550, 1 L. R. A. 51; Par-num's Petition, 51 N. H. 376, 378. The question is one of constitutional power.

It is not easy to see how a requirement that all general statutes shall be made applicable equally to all similarly situated portions of the state could be given practical effect unless the legislature were made the final and exclusive judge of what places, towns, or cities are so situated. Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. 156, note. It is a question of fact. Is it to be determined by a jury, and the validity or invalidity of the statute made to depend upon their verdict? State v. Campbell, 64 N. H. 403, 404. The question is concluded by our decisions. In Scott v. Willson, 3 N. H. 321, decided in 1825, it was held that an act regulating the mode of putting pine timber into Connecticut river was not repugnant to the Constitution, for the reason that it "does not embrace all rivers, but is confined to Connecticut river." Richardson, Ch. J., says (p. 328): "It has been decided in Massachusetts that an act attempting to suspend the operation of a general law in relation to a particular person was unconstitutional. Holden v. James, 11 Mass. 396, 6 Am. Dec. 174. But that decision has no bearing upon the question to be decided in this case. Here the objection is not that the law does not extend to all persons, but that it does not extend to all places. The objection in truth is that the statute is a general law in relation to a particular place. But we have been referred to no clause in our Constitution which restrains the legislature from passing such a law; nor have our researches enabled us to find any such clause." Richardson, Ch. J., and his associates thought the proposition so obviously sound as to require no elaboration. It is needless to say that nothing is to be found in Opinion of the Justices (the same judges) 4 N. H. 572, inconsistent with this doctrine. In Charter of Manchester, 47 N. H. 277, decided in 1867, it was held that an act requiring the check list in the city of Manchester to be regulated in a different manner from that prescribed by the general law in all other places, towns, or cities was not, for that reason, unconstitutional. Sargent, J., says (p. 279): "But it may be said that the rule should be uniform, and administered alike in all places. There might be more weight in this objection if all the other attendant circumstances were the same. We by no means intimate an opinion that the legislature might not constitutionally impose these duties relative to the check list, upon one set of officers in some towns and counties, and upon a different board in other towns and counties. The legislature may constitutionally pass a general law in relation to a particular place. Scott v. Willson, 3 N. H. 321, 328; State v. Noyes, 30 N. H. 279. So, general statutes have been passed in regard to schools in Portsmouth and in Somersworth, differing widely from the general law relating to schools in other parts of the state. Comp. Laws, chaps. 80, 81. But when we consider the difference between the wards of a city and towns not connected with any city, we see at once that there is such a difference in circumstances as may well justify a difference in the board selected to perform these duties if such a justification were necessary." The question was directly involved in State v. Franklin Falls Co. (1870) 49 N. H. 240, 6 Am. Rep. 518. It was there held that the statute (Gen. Stat. chap. 251, § 20), prohibiting the maintenance of dams on the Winnipisogee river (and five others) was constitutional. The objection that the statute was local in its application was not alluded to either by counsel or the court, and for the reason, undoubtedly, that they understood that it was not tenable; that the question was not an open one. The same is true of State v. Roberts (1879) 59 N. H. 256, 484, 47 Am. Rep. 199, where the defendant was indicted, convicted, and presumably punished for taking trout from his own pond, under a statute prohibiting the taking of trout in certain months from any waters of the state except certain lakes and a certain pond. So, also, of Purinton v. Ladd, 58 N. H. 596, which was debt for the penalty under the same statute. Laws 1872, chap. 55.

The latest judicial declaration bearing upon the question is found in Opinion of the Justices, 66 N. H. 629, 665, where it is said that "a special act is not to be declared void because it is opposed to a spirit supposed to pervade the Constitution, but not made an operative part of it by express words, or necessary implication, that is, by fair construction." Until 1864, deposits in savings banks were taxed to the depositors like other property. Rev. Stat. chap. 89, § 3; Comp. Stat. chap. 41, § 4; Laws 1864, chap. 4028. By the act of 1864 the banks were required to pay a tax of $\frac{1}{2}$ of 1 per cent on the deposits, to be in full of all taxes on the depositors on account of the deposits. In 1869 the tax was increased to 1 per cent (Laws 1869, chap. 4, § 3), and so it remained until 1895, when it was reduced to $\frac{1}{4}$ of 1 per cent. (Laws 1895, chap. 108.) This was a heavy discrimination in favor of the depositors. First Nat. Bank v. Concord, 59 N. H. 75, 78. They were required to pay in many towns less than one half the tax assessed on other property. Yet, notwithstanding the express provisions of the Constitution that the general court may "impose and levy proportional and reasonable assessments, rates, and taxes upon all the inhabitants of and residents within the said state, and upon all estates within the same" (article 5), and "in order that such assessments may be made with equality" require that a valuation of the estates be taken anew once in every five years (article 6), and declare that "every member of the community . . . is bound to contribute his share" of the public expense (Bill of Rights, art. 12, and the numerous judicial decisions thereon, — State v. Pennoyer, 65 N. H. 113, 114, 5 L. R. A. 709), this court in 1888 (less than twenty years after the enactment creating the discrimination), declared that "the savings bank tax . . . is an anomaly resting on peculiar grounds of public policy, and is universally understood to have acquired the position of an exception to the constitutional rule of equality." Boston, C. & M. R. Co. v. State, 62 N. H. 648, 649. How did it become an exception? Solely by virtue of the statute creating it and less than twenty years' of public acquiescence. In Morrison v. Manchester, 58 N. H. 588, 551, 552 (decided in 1879), the court said: "In this state the taxability of money at interest is not an open judicial question. Whether the assessment of money at interest is a process of ascertaining the lender's or the borrower's just share of the public expense, or an exceptional, double, or otherwise wrongful taxation of the borrower, . . . permitted, not required, by an erroneous constitutional construction established by legislative usage and judicial recognition, we need not inquire. If the assessment of a creditor for his interest bearing loan of money is in effect, either a double taxation of his debtor, or a taxation of the debtor for property which, by conveyance or destruction, has ceased to be his, . . . such taxation is sustained by the authority of precedent. . . . The precedent is too firmly established to be overthrown by any other authority than that of making laws." In other words, a legislative usage for something less than 100 years, accompanied by judicial recognition, is sufficient to establish a rule of taxation forbidden by the Constitution. "Local self-government, . . . in uninterrupted operation for more than 240 years, has been constitutionally established by recognition and usage." Doe, Ch. J., State v. Pearson v. Hayes, 61 N. H. 264, 322. "When a question arises as to the contemporaneous meaning of the terms used in an ancient instrument, early and long continued usage has a controlling weight." The Dublin Case, 38 N. H. 459, 512; Pierce v. State, 13 N. H. 586, 573; Great Falls Mfg. Co. v. Fernald, 47 N. H. 444, 459; Copp v. Henniker, 55 N. H. 179, 209, 20 Am. Rep. 194; King v. Hopkins, 57 N. H. 334, 356; Keniston v. State, 63 N. H. 37, 38, 56 Am. Rep. 496.

Immediately upon the adoption of the Constitution in 1784, the legislature (many members of which, and of succeeding legislatures, were members of the convention, and participated in framing the Constitution) began to enact general laws applicable to particular places. They have continued to do so from that time to this,—more than 100 years. There have been few, if any, legislative sessions during which one or more statutes of this character have not been enacted. Their number is very great. They have been sanctioned by judicial decisions. Not a dictum or intimation against their validity is to be found in our reports, nor, it is believed, in those of any other state, in the absence of express constitutional prohibition. They have been acquiesced in by the public. Under them rights have accrued and have been enforced. Many persons have been punished for violating them. It is not claimed that such legislation is expressly forbidden. Conceding (for sake of the argument) that it is unwise, and opposed to the general spirit of the Constitution, this long continued usage, recognition, and acquiescence must, (even if there were no judicial decision on the subject), under our established doctrine of constitutional construction, be held decisive upon the question of legislative power. "Laws, public in their objects may, unless express constitutional provision forbids, be either general or local in their application; they may embrace many subjects or one; and they may extend to all citizens or be confined to particular classes, as minors, or married women, bankers, or traders, and the like. The authority that legislates for the state at large must determine whether particular rules shall extend to the whole state and all its citizens, or, on the other hand, to a subdivision of the state, or a single class of its citizens only. The circumstances of a particular locality or the prevailing public sentiment in that section of the state, may require or make acceptable different police regulations from those demanded in another, or call for different taxation, and a different application of the public moneys. The legislature may therefore prescribe or authorize different laws of police, allow the right of eminent domain to be exercised in different cases, and through different agencies, and prescribe peculiar restrictions upon taxation in each distinct municipality, provided the state Constitution does not forbid. These discriminations are made constantly; and the fact that the laws are of local or special operation only is not supposed to render them obnoxious in principle. . . . The business of common carriers for instance, or of bankers, may require special statutory regulations for the general benefit and it may be matter of public policy to give laborers in one business a specific lien for their wages, when it would be impracticable or impolitic to do the same for persons engaged in some other employments. If the laws be otherwise unobjectionable, all that can be required in these cases is, that they be general in their application to the class or locality to which they apply; and they are then public in character, and of their propriety and policy the legislature must judge." Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. pp. 488, 489.

Appeal dismissed.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

LUFKIN RULE COMPANY, Ptff. in Err.,

v.
Xavier FRINGELI et al.

(57 Ohio St. 596.)

*1. All agreements in general restraint of trade are against public policy and void; but agreements having such partial effect only, made in connection with the purchase of a business and its goodwill, shown to be reasonably necessary to the enjoyment of the goodwill of the business purchased, and not oppressive, may be enforced.

2. Where one engaged in the same business as another purchases that of the latter, with its goodwill, and takes from the latter a stipulation that he will not directly nor indirectly engage in the same business in the state, nor in the United States, for the period of twenty-five years, such agreement necessarily tends to create a monopoly; and, whether necessary or not to the reasonable enjoyment of the goodwill so purchased, the interest of the public in the nonenforcement of such an agreement outweighs the interest of the purchaser in its enforcement, and it is void.

3. Such an agreement is not divisible, for the reason that, if restrained to the limits of the state, still such restraint would be general in its nature, and obnoxious to all the objections that exist against a general restraint of trade.

enforce a contract to refrain from engaging in business in competition with plaintiff. Affirmed.

Statement by Minshall, J.:

The suit below was brought to enforce an agreement claimed by the defendant on demurrer to be in general restraint of trade, and therefore void. The petition is as follows: "The plaintiff says it is a corporation under the laws of Ohio; that the defendants Xavier and Lucas Fringeli are partners under the firm name of the Fringeli Rule Company. The plaintiff further says that on January 28, 1893, and prior thereto, the said Xavier Fringeli and Lucas Fringeli, partners as the Fringeli Rule Company, and the said Frank and Charles Fringeli, were all engaged in the city of Cleveland, Ohio, in the business of manufacturing and dealing in wood, iron, steel, and copper rules, pencil holders, calipers, and gauges for measuring timber, logs, lumber, and other things, and said defendants then had a factory, located at No. 7 Bergen street, equipped with machinery, tools, implements, furniture, patterns, dies, molds, engine, boiler, shafting, belting, and other property and appurtenances used in the manufacture of said rules, etc., and in handling the materials therefor, and then had on hand large quantities of manufactured rules, and materials of various kinds in process of being made into rules and other things, and also had accounts receivable, and other choses in action and resources connected with said business, including a leasehold interest in certain real estate, and had an established business, trade, and goodwill, all of which property, interest, business, and goodwill the said defendants then sold, assigned, and transferred to the plaintiff by an agreement in writing dated January 28, 1893; and the said defendants further stipulated in said agreement that the demand for the kind of goods which they were then producing, owing to the nature of the goods, was limited in quantity, and restricted chiefly to the sections of the United States where lumber is manufactured and handled; and said defendants also agreed that the plaintiff, who was then engaged in the same business extensively, had ample facilities to supply the demands for said goods throughout the United States promptly and at reasonable prices. Said defendants jointly and severally bound themselves not to engage in, or be in any way, directly or indirectly, connected with, the manufacturing, dealing in, or handling of board or log rules, lumber gauges, log calipers, pencil holders, or any of the other goods which the defendants were then making or dealing in, within the state of Ohio, or elsewhere in the United States, at any time during the next ensuing twenty-five years; and the said Frank and Charles Fringeli specially agreed that they would not directly or indirectly engage in the manufacturing or production of any of said articles within the United States during the said period of twenty-five years; and said defendants further agreed to promote the interest and aid the business of said plaintiff, and agreed that the said plaintiff should receive all orders, letters, documents, papers, and correspondence then in the possession of the defendants, and all such letters and orders as they might thereafter receive; and said defendants then agreed and authorized the plaintiff to use the name of the Fringeli Rule Company for any purpose connected with the business, or which the plaintiff might deem essential to promote its business; and the said defendants also agreed not to use said name, or any of their names, in connection with the rule business, throughout the United States, during the said period of twenty-five years. As consideration for the transfer of said property and the agreement above specified, the plaintiff agreed to pay to said defendants the sum of $1,277.45, in certain instalments, ending March 1, 1894, all of which instalments have been paid according to said agreement by the plaintiff. It is further stipulated in said agreement that if said defendants Xavier and Lucas Fringeli, or either of them, shall in any respect violate the provisions thereof as to engaging in the manufacturing or handling said rules and other articles, then and in that case they shall become liable to the plaintiff, as for so much liquidated damages, in the sum of $5,000; and said Frank and Charles Fringeli also separately agreed in said contract not to engage, directly or indirectly, in the manufacturing, dealing in, or handling any of the goods in the foregoing agreement mentioned, and if they, or either of them do so, they shall become liable and indebted to the party of the second part in the sum of $5,000, liquidated damages. The plaintiff further says that the said defendants Xavier, Lucas, Frank, and Charles Fringeli have violated said agreement, and are infringing the same, in the manner following, to wit: They have established a factory at 272 Wellington avenue, in Cleveland, Ohio, and have equipped it with machinery, and are now therein engaged in manufacturing board and log rules, lumber gauges, log calipers, and other articles which they agreed not to manufacture, in said contract; and they are also selling the same, and sending out circulars to dealers in said articles all over the United States, offering to fill orders for all of said materials, and soliciting orders and correspondence, all in violation of said agreement, and without any right or authority from the plaintiff. The plaintiff further says that said conduct of said defendants causes a constant and increasing damage to its business, by interrupting and interfering therewith, and such damage is irreparable, owing to its peculiar nature, and because each and all of the defendants are insolvent, and have no property or resources to pay damages, and the plaintiff has no adequate remedy at law. The plaintiff further says that the said defendants are carrying on said business at No. 272 Wellington street aforesaid in the name of the Cleveland Rule Company, which all of the defendants claim is a partnership composed of the defendants Andrew Fringeli and George Junglas, but the plaintiff says that neither said Andrew Fringeli nor George Junglas has contributed any money or capital to said business, nor have they done, nor do they intend to do, anything in connection therewith; that they are not acquainted with the business, are not mechanics, have no money or resources, and are unable to take any part in the business which the other defendants are carrying on; that the names Andrew Fringeli and George Junglas are used by the other defendants collusively, for the purpose of cheating and defrauding the plaintiff, and concealing their real purpose and actions, and evading liability under said contract. The plaintiff says that all of the business carried on at said place under the name of the Cleveland Rule Company is directed and carried on in all respects by the defendants, Xavier, Lucas, Frank, and Charles Fringeli. The plaintiff says that it will sustain great and irreparable damages unless the further conduct and management of said business by said defendants is restrained by order of this court. The plaintiff further says that a copy of said contract, dated January 28, 1893, is hereto attached, and filed herewith. Wherefore the plaintiff prays that the defendants may be restrained by order of this court, and enjoined from manufacturing, handling, dealing in, or offering for sale any of said rules, calipers, or other things which they agreed not to manufacture as aforesaid; that on the final hearing hereof the plaintiff may have a judgment against said Xavier Fringeli and Lucas Fringeli for $5,000, and against said Frank Fringeli and Charles Fringeli for $5,000, and that all of said defendants be perpetually restrained from doing said acts, and from in any way interfering in the plaintiff's business in violation of said contract; and that the plaintiff may have such other and further relief in the premises as it may be entitled to have in equity."

In connection with the present case, see the more liberal rule of the Massachusetts decision in Anchor Electric Co. v. Hawks, post, 189.

Messrs. Dickey, Brewer, & McGowan, for plaintiff in error:

for a fair consideration and in good faith, to sell their goodwill in a business, trade, or occupation, and to agree not to pursue the same for a limited time in a prescribed territory.

The agreement as to time, territory, and kind of business, may have such scope as is necessary to protect the purchaser in the goodwill which he acquires.

Where the contract is an incident to a bona fide purchase of business and goodwill, and the restraint is such only as affords a fair protection to the interests of the vendee, it will be upheld without regard to time or extent of the restraint.

The true test is reasonableness, rather than the extent of time or space.

Lange v. Werk, 2 Ohio St. 520; Thomas v. Miles, 3 Ohio St. 275; Grasselli v. Lowden, 11 Ohio St. 349.

To prevent competition in the business of rule making was the controlling idea of this corporation, the Lufkin Rule Company, and though it had "ample facilities to supply the demand promptly and at reasonable prices," the usual plea of such corporations and of trusts and combinations,—yet it is for the court to look further and contemplate what such corporations might do.

State, Atty. Gen., v. Standard Oil Co. 49 Ohio St. 137, 15 L. R. A. 145.

In Richards v. American Desk & Seating Co. 87 Wis. 603, the court held that the pleading was demurrable in not affirmatively showing that the restraint was reasonably necessary to protect defendant's interest under the contract.

Minshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question in this case arises on a demurrer to the petition, which was sustained in the common pleas, and the judgment was affirmed in the circuit court. From the petition and the agreement annexed to it, it appears that Xavier and Lucas Fringell, as partners under the name of the Fringell Rule Company, were carrying on the business at Cleveland, Ohio, of manufacturing and selling rules and other instruments used principally in measuring lumber, and that the plaintiff, the Lufkin Rule Company, an Ohio corporation, with its principal office at Saginaw, Michigan, engaged in the same business on January 28, 1893, purchased the business and assets of the Fringellis, together with the goodwill of the firm; they agreeing not to engage in the same business, directly or indirectly, in the state of Ohio or in the United States, for a period of twenty-five years. The Fringellis also assented to the statement, contained in the agreement between the parties, "that the demand for the different kinds of rules which they produce is limited as to quantity, and restricted to the section of the United States where lumber is manufactured and handled; and the parties of the second part [Lufkin Rule Company] have ample facilities to supply the demand in all sections of the United States, promptly, at reasonable figures." Afterwards, the agreement having been performed on the part of the plaintiff, the defendants violated it, and continue to violate it, by carrying on the same business, with others, at Cleveland, Ohio, in the name of the Cleveland Rule Company. It asks for liquidated damages, as fixed by the agreement, and for an injunction restraining the defendants from further prosecuting the business.

It is the settled rule in this state that all agreements in general restraint of trade are against public policy and void; but it is held that agreements that only impose a partial restraint, made in connection with the purchase of a business, that are reasonably necessary to make available the goodwill purchased with the business, and are reasonable, and not oppressive, may be enforced. The case of Lange v. Werk, 2 Ohio St. 519, is the leading one on the subject. The authorities there, both in England and this country, at that time were so fully and intelligently considered as to dispense with their examination here. In that case the party, by his covenant, was restrained from engaging in the business of manufacturing stearin or star candles in Hamilton county, state of Ohio, or at any other place whatsoever in the United States. The covenant was regarded as divisible, and that that part of it which bound Lange not to pursue the business or give his assistance at any place in the United States was void, being in general restraint of trade; but as to Hamilton county, it was held that, if it were attended with certain other necessary requisites, it might be good. These requisites were stated to be: (1) That the restraint is partial; (2) that it is founded on a valuable consideration; and (3) that the contract is reasonable, and not oppressive,—the presumption being always, in the first instance, that it is illegal, and must be overcome by the party seeking to enforce it, before relief can be had. The presumption of illegality arises from the fact that any restraint of the kind tends to oppression, by depriving the individual of the right to engage in a pursuit or trade with which he is generally most familiar, and consequently the community of the services of a skillful laborer; and the general effect must be, more or less, to encourage idleness, and affect the price of such things as has been produced by his labor. These are the general reasons against any restraint of trade, and, being founded in the nature of things, cannot be materially varied by any change in the times and circumstances of the people. The judge, however, in delivering the opinion in the above case, says that "no case is to be found where such a contract has been upheld, which covered the whole of England or a state of this Union." Such restraints are regarded as general. And it will be observed that in the case before us the restraint at the least, is to the state of Ohio, and hence the agreement is not capable of such a division as under any circumstances would make it a valid one. It is in general restraint of trade. In Taylor v. Blanchard, 18 Allen, 370, 90 Am. Dec. 208, where the restraint extended only to the state of Massachusetts, the court said: "We do not think the extent of the territory embraced in a state affects the principle. Whatever may be the extent of the state, the monopoly restricts the citizen from pursuing his business unless he transfers his residence and his allegiance to some other state or country. Its tendency is to drive business and citizens who are skilled in business from this to other states. If one is not at liberty to carry on his business here, but is at liberty to do so elsewhere, he will be likely to go elsewhere, and employ others to go with him." And see also Chappel v. Brockway, 21 Wend. 157; Dunlop v. Gregory, 10 N. Y. 241, 244, 61 Am. Dec. 746; Wright v. Ryder, 36 Cal. 842, 95 Am. Dec. 186; Homerv. Ashford, 8 Bing. 828. The doctrine of Lange v. Werk was followed in Thomas v. Miles, 3 Ohio St. 274. There the restraint extended to carrying on the business in the city of Cincinnati, or any other point where agencies might be established. It was held that under the facts of that case, while the restraint as to Cincinnati was reasonable, and might be sustained, yet, so far as it attempted to prevent Miles from competing with any branch that Thomas might establish at any and all other places, it was clearly opposed to public policy and void. It was not departed from in Morgan v. Perkamus, 36 Ohio St. 517, 88 Am. Rep. 607. There the restraint was partial. Mrs. Morgan carried on the business of a dressmaker in the town of Felicity, Clermont county, Ohio. She sold her business to another, with the goodwill, and bound herself not to carry it on in the same town, or at any place within such distance as would interfere with the business. Mrs. Morgan commenced to carry on the same business in Felicity, and was enjoined. The goodwill being in general nothing more than the probability that the old customers will resort to the old place for the purpose of trade, it is apparent that in this case the restraint imposed was reasonable, being no more than was required to secure the goodwill of the business to the purchaser, and was not oppressive, as she was at liberty to carry on the same business outside of the limits to which the goodwill of her former business, carried on in Felicity, extended. Partial restraints on trade, of this character, have been generally sustained, and they are the only ones that have been, in this state or elsewhere, unless it be in a few modern instances, to which we will hereafter refer.

But there is a particular feature in this contract, reflecting on its purpose and character, that deserves notice, to wit, the statement, to which the Fringells are required to, and do, assent, that the demand for the kind of goods they were then manufacturing was limited in quantity, and restricted chiefly to particular sections of the country; and that plaintiff, who was then engaged in the same business extensively, had ample facilities to supply the demand "promptly and at reasonable prices." This was likely introduced for the purpose of showing the reasonableness of the contract, but, when analyzed, tends more strongly to show that its principal object was, not simply to acquire the defendant's business and its goodwill as an investment, but to purchase them out of business, that it might have a more complete monopoly of the entire business of making rules, and therefore, on principles of public policy, should not receive any aid from the courts in its enforcement. That the field is a limited one only furnishes the more reason on the part of the public that it should not be engrossed by a single person, and the statement that it has the facilities to supply the public at reasonable prices lacks perception of the real ground of objection. Certainly we are not called on to relearn how little human cupidity can be trusted when it has the opportunity to enrich itself at the expense of others. A disposition to overlook this feature only shows how far, in some of the cases, we are getting away from the salutary principles of the common law, which never permitted a person to occupy a position in which his duties were opposed to his interests. No one could be judge in his own case, nor, in a fiduciary capacity, buy of or sell to himself. The case of Diamond Match Co. v. Roerber, 106 N. Y. 478, 60 Am. Rep. 464, is referred to by plaintiff as supporting the validity of the restraint on trade imposed by this contract, and we are not disposed to controvert the claim. The defendant, Roerber, who was engaged in the manufacture and sale throughout the United States of friction matches, sold his business, with its goodwill, to the plaintiff, engaged in the same business, and agreed that he would not at any time within ninety-nine years engage in the same business anywhere in the United States, with the exception of the states of Nevada and Montana. In an action for a violation of the agreement, the restraint was held to be reasonable. In this case, and some others, the decision is acknowledged to be a departure from the well-established rule of the earlier decisions, notably Mitchel v. Reynolds, 1 P. Wms. 181, followed and approved by Ranney, J., in Lange v. Werk. In this case, and in those similar to it, the question seems to be considered as one wholly between the parties; and if the restraint is no more than the purchaser requires as a protection to the enjoyment of what he purchased, and for which the vendor received a fair consideration, then it is argued that there is no objection to the contract, because the limits of trade and commerce are now so great, under modern conditions, that a general restraint is not more than is reasonable to afford protection to the purchaser in his business. This, as we think, is fallacious, as it ignores the interest of the public in the question which now, more than at any former time, is involved. All monopolies, combinations, and agreements, of whatever nature, formed for the purpose of controlling the production and manufacture of commodities, are generally considered against public policy, as thereby prices may be unreasonably increased to the consumer, and are almost uniformly entered into for such purpose. Heretofore the right of any trade or business to determine for itself the extent of production and the price that shall prevail, has been stoutly denied by the public. This can only be done by the government, and then only in extreme cases, amounting to a necessity. So general have these agreements become, and their attendant evils, as to have arrested the attention of the legislatures of some of the states; and laws have been passed to correct as far as possible the evils. And in 1890 the Congress of the United States passed an act, known as the "Sherman Law," to protect trade and commerce against unlawful restraints and monopolies. In construing this act the Supreme Court in United States v. Trans-Missouri Freight Assn. 166 U. S. 290, 323, 41 L. ed. 1007, 1023, held that under its provisions any restraint of trade affecting the interstate trade and commerce of the United States is invalid. It had been claimed in argument that it only included such contracts in restraint of trade as were unlawful at common law. These statutes give emphasis to what has been heretofore regarded as a sound public policy by the courts.

But beyond this there is still another consideration connected with such monopolies and combinations that is not to be overlooked, from the standpoint of sound political wisdom and economy. It is to the interest of the republic that there should be, measurably, an equality in the fortunes of its citizens; and one of the best modes of accomplishing this, without the use of arbitrary means, is by encouraging separate and independent employments, and discouraging by law, and its administration in the courts, all tendencies to the concentration of property in the hands of the few,—a condition in which there will be a constant unrest and dissatisfaction among the masses that can bode no good to the nation. It may be safely affirmed that free institutions cannot long be maintained among a people where a few, possessed of great wealth, are the employers, and the many are mere laborers, wholly dependent on wages as a means of supporting themselves and families. These considerations, and others of a like character, constitute in great measure that sound public policy which looks with distrust upon all agreements in restraint of trade; and particularly such as may be used in the formation of monopolies, and the control by a few of all individual pursuits. Therefore contracts whereby men are purchased out of their business, and restrained from carrying it on anywhere else, should receive no aid from the courts. No more efficient method could be devised for the creation of a monopoly in any business. It simply requires a combination of persons possessed of a large amount of capital, for the purpose of engaging in a particular business, and purchasing that of all others engaged in the same business, and binding them not to engage in the same business anywhere else. Among the various methods adopted for the purpose of engrossing a particular business, this seems to have become quite a favorite one, when the business may be, and generally is, carried on by individuals on a limited capital; for the reason, no doubt, that in such cases it is easier to accomplish the desired result in this way than by the formation of a trust, through which an entire business may be carried on,—each separate owner, as a beneficiary of the trust, receiving its or his proportion of the net earnings. To say in such cases that the vendor should be bound not to carry on his business, because he has received an adequate consideration for his agreement, is no answer to the objection that the agreement tends to foster the formation of a monopoly, and is therefore against public policy. The reasoning of the cases in which a departure from the common law had been adopted fails to persuade us that we should disregard the rule that has been so long settled in this state by the decisions of this court. On the contrary, the changed conditions on which the argument proceeds tend the more strongly to convince us that, in the interest of a wise public policy, it should be more firmly adhered to.

Judgment affirmed.

v.

Horatio C. HAWKS.

(.....Mass.....)

An agreement by officers of corporations not to engage in business for five years in any way to interfere with or compete with the business of a new corporation to which each of the old companies sold its business is not against public policy, although the new business is of a nature to extend over the whole country, and is more general than that of either of the old companies, combining the business of installing and constructing electric plants and appliances, which one of them had carried on, with that of manufacturing and dealing in such appliances, which the others had carried on.

(May 19, 1898.)

REPORT by the Supreme Judicial Court for Suffolk County after a decree in favor of plaintiffs in an equity suit to restrain defendant from violating his agreement not to enter into business in competition with the plaintiffs.
Decree for plaintiffs.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Sherman L. Whipple and William R. Sears, for plaintiffs:

There is no decision in Massachusetts that a covenant not to engage in business, given in aid of the sale of a goodwill, is void when such a covenant was reasonably necessary to perfect the sale.

Pierce v. Fuller, 8 Mass. 223, 5 Am. Dec. 105; Perkins v. Lyman, 9 Mass. 522; Stearns v. Barrett, 1 Pick. 443, 11 Am. Dec. 223; Palmer v. Stebbins, 3 Pick. 188, 15 Am. Dec. 204; Pierce v. Woodward, 6 Pick. 206; Alger v. Thacher, 19 Pick. 51, 81 Am. Dec. 119; Gilman v. Dwight, 18 Gray, 355, 74 Am. Dec. 634; Taylor v. Blanchard, 13 Allen, 370, 90 Am. Dec. 203; Angier v. Webber, 14 Allen, 211, 92 Am. Dec. 748; Dean v. Emerson, 102 Mass. 480; Morse Twist Drill & Mach. Co. v. Morse, 103 Mass. 78, 4 Am. Rep. 513; Dwight v. Hamilton, 113 Mass. 175; Boutelle v. Smith, 116 Mass. 111; Ropes v. Upton, 125 Mass. 258; Bishop v. Palmer, 146 Mass. 469; Llandforth v. Jackson, 150 Mass. 149; Gamevell Fire Alarm Teleg. Co. v. Crane, 160 Mass. 50, 22 L. R. A. 673; Smith v. Brown, 164 Mass. 584.

Only by allowing the owner of a business of wide area to enter into a covenant of this nature can the owner of such a business upon its sale receive adequate compensation for the goodwill; for obviously that goodwill is practically worthless unless the vendor can covenant that he will not compete against his vendee.

Rannie v. Irvine, 7 Mann. & G. 969.

In England the law now seems to be definitely decided in favor of the plaintiffs' contention.

Marim, Nordenfelt Guns & A. Co. v. Nordenfelt [1893] 1 Ch. 630 [1894] A. C. 585.

In the following cases a restraint limited in time and unlimited in space was held valid:

Whittaker v. Howe, 3 Beav. 383; Rousillon v. Rousillon, L. R. 14 Ch. Div. 351; Moenich v. Fenestre, 67 L. T. N. S. 603; Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Schott S. & Co. [1892] 3 Ch. 447; Dubowski v. Goldstein, 74 L. T. N. S. 180.

The reasonableness of the restraint is generally regarded as the test in this country.

2 Parsons, Contr. 8th ed. p. 875; Fowle v. Parke, 131 U. S. 88, 33 L. ed. 67; Carnig v. Carr, 167 Mass. 544, 35 L. R. A. 512.

Mr. Freedom Hutchinson, for defendant:

The agreement is in restraint of trade, without limitation of space, and is against public policy, and void.

Bishop v. Palmer, 146 Mass. 469; Taylor v. Blanchard, 13 Allen, 370, 90 Am. Dec. 203; Alger v. Thacher, 19 Pick. 51, 81 Am. Dec. 119; Gamevell Fire Alarm Teleg. Co. v. Crane, 160 Mass. 50, 22 L. R. A. 673; Consumers' Oil Co. v. Nunnemaker, 142 Ind. 560; Wiley v. Baumgardner, 97 Ind. 66, 49 Am. Rep. 427; Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 20 Wall. 64, 22 L. ed. 315; Fox, Solid Pressed Steel Co. v. Schoen, 77 Fed. Rep. 29; Trenton Potteries Co. v. Oliphant (N. J. Ch.) 39 Atl. 923.

If the test of reasonableness is to be applied to this restriction, then the restriction should not be more than was reasonably necessary to protect the purchaser in the enjoyment of the property, business, and goodwill which he bought and paid for.

This question of reasonableness is one of law for the court, to be determined from the contract and material allegations of the bill, all of which are admitted in this case.

Whart. Contr. § 483; Bishop, Contr. § 517; Benjamin, Sales, § 527; Wiley v. Baumgardner, 97 Ind. 66, 49 Am. Rep. 427; Herreshoff v. Boutineau, 17 R. I. 3, 8 L. R. A. 469; Consumers Oil Co. v. Nunnemaker, 142 Ind. 564; note to Angier v. Webber (Mass.) 92 Am. Dec. 758.

The time when the contract is entered into is alone looked to in determining whether a contract is reasonable or not.

Rannie v. Irvine, 7 Mann. & G. 969; Cook v. Johnson, 47 Conn. 175, 36 Am. Rep. 64; Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & A. Co. [1894] A. C. 585.

This restriction is more than was reasonably necessary to protect the purchaser in the enjoyment of the property which it bought and paid for, and is void because it embraced important branches of business not sold by defendant, viz., the "manufacture and sale of electrical supplies," and it is unreasonable, where the defendant sold only the business of installing electrical plants and appliances, that he should be barred from the business of manufacturing and dealing in electrical supplies. He could reasonably have been barred only from the business which he sold, and the protection of the interest sold required no more.

Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & A. Co. [1894] A. C. 580, [1893] 1 Ch. 630; Badische Anilin und Soda Fabrik v. Schott S. & Co. [1892] 3 Ch. 447; Perls v. Saalfeld [1892] 2 Ch. 149; Oakdale Mfg. Co. v. Garst, 18 R. I. 484, 23 L. R. A. 639.

If there be simply a stipulation, though in an instrument under seal, that a trade or profession shall not be carried on in a particular place, without any recital in the deed, and without any averment showing circumstances which render such contract reasonable, the instrument is void. But, if there are circumstances recited in the instrument (or probably if they appear by averment), it is for the court to determine whether the contract be a fair and reasonable one, or not.

Benjamin, Sales, § 527; Lange v. Werk, 3 Ohio St. 519.

Knowlton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The only question which we need to discuss in this case is whether the stipulation on which the bill is founded is void as against public policy. The stipulation is as follows: "It is further agreed by all the persons whose names are set hereunder, officers of the corporations hereinabove described, that they will not hereafter at any time, directly or indirectly, as partner, agent, officer of a corporation, or in any other wise, enter into or conduct, or assist in conducting, any business that shall in any way interfere with or compete with the proposed business of said Anchor Electric Company for a period of five years, except that any one of said persons sever connection with said Anchor Electric Company as provided by paragraph 6 of said agreement of September 29, 1894." The defendant was the business manager of the Hawks Electric Company, a corporation, and a shareholder therein; Norman Marshall was the business manager of the Iona Manufacturing Company, a corporation, and a shareholder therein; and Phillip M. Reynolds was the business manager of the Brown Electric Company, a corporation, and a shareholder therein. On September 29, 1894, these three persons entered into an agreement in writing to form a new corporation under the laws of Maine, of which Hawks was to be the president, Reynolds the treasurer, and Marshall the vice president and assistant secretary, and of which these three were to be the managing board of directors. Four other persons were to be selected to make up the full board of directors, of whom one was to be chosen from the board of directors of each of the above-mentioned corporations. Each of these corporations was to sell all its assets to the new corporation at their actual cash value, to be determined as provided in the writing, and an agreed price of a substantial amount fixed by the writing was to be allowed by the new corporation for the goodwill of each of the three corporations. Each of these three persons was to subscribe for and take one third of the capital stock of the new corporation, and the assets of each of the three corporations at the value ascertained as provided by the writing were to be received pro tanto by the new corporation in payment for this stock, and the balance was to be paid for by the subscribers in cash. The three persons severally agreed that, so long as the agreement should continue, they would "devote themselves unreservedly to the interests and duties of the office which they occupied, and the promotion in every way of the interests of the corporation to be formed." On the back of the writing was an agreement, signed by the three, fixing the salaries which they were severally to receive in the new corporation, and an additional stipulation as to the allowance for assets of the three corporations. It was provided that the agreement should be binding only as approved by a majority of the shareholders or boards of directors of the three corporations. The Anchor Electric Company was afterwards established as a corporation under the laws of Maine, in accordance with the contract. In this connection there was another agreement made on October 12, 1894, between the Anchor Electric Company and the other three corporations, whereby the assets and goodwill of the three were transferred to the new corporation at specified agreed prices, which were paid in stock of the new corporation. A part of this agreement of the three old corporations with each other and with the Anchor Electric Company was in these words: "They will not hereafter at any time continue the business of manufacturing and dealing in electrical goods or specialties of any sort or description, after the 15th day of October, 1894, except to sell and dispose of merchandise on hand at this date, not herein transferred to the Anchor Electric Company, and will do no business of any sort or description except such as is necessary in liquidation of said three electric companies." The agreement was signed by each of the four corporations, by their respective officers, Hawks, Reynolds, and Marshall, and the stipulation in question was the 6th article of the agreement. The judge found that the instrument had been executed in all its parts except this 6th article, and had been adopted by the corporations. There was a provision in the first agreement whereby either of the three persons could withdraw from the new corporation if he was at any time put at a financial disadvantage by the other two in reference to salary or income, and could sell his stock to the others at a price to be agreed upon or fixed by arbitration. The judge before whom the case was heard found that the defendant sold his stock in the new corporation, and withdrew from it, but not under the provision above referred to; and that he has violated, and intends to violate, the 6th article of the last agreement. He found that all the allegations of the bill bearing upon the validity of the 6th article were proved. He also found as a fact, so far as he could properly so find, that the 6th article was reasonable and necessary for the carrying out of the transaction set forth in the agreement, and that the value of the stock of the Hawks Electric Company was largely dependent upon its being kept. It is found that the business of the plaintiff is of a nature that may extend over the whole country. We are thus brought to a consideration of the law applicable to the case.

From very early times certain contracts in restraint of trade have been held void as against public policy. They are objectionable on two grounds: They tend to deprive the party restrained of the means of earning a livelihood, and they deprive the community of the benefit of his free and unrestricted efforts in his chosen field of activity. The distinction was long ago taken between contracts involving a partial restraint of trade and contracts involving a general restraint of trade; the former being held valid if not unreasonable, and the latter invalid. The changes in the methods of doing business, and the increased freedom of communication which have come in recent years, have very materially modified the view to be taken of particular contracts in reference to trade. The comparative ease with which one engaged in business can turn his energies to a new occupation if he contracts to give up his old one makes the hardship of such a contract much less for the individual than formerly, and the commercial opportunities which open the markets of the world to the merchants of every country leave little danger to the community from an agreement of an individual to cease to work in a particular field.

The general principle that arrangements in restraint of trade are not favored is, however, firmly established in law, and now, as well as formerly, is given effect whenever its application will not interfere with the right of everybody to make reasonable contracts. Whenever one sells a business with its goodwill, it is for his benefit as well as for the benefit of the purchaser that he should be able to increase the value of that which he sells by a contract not to set up a new business in competition with the old. The right to make reasonable contracts of this kind in connection with the sale of the goodwill of a business is well established. But the particular provisions which are reasonably necessary for the protection of the goodwill of many kinds of business are very different now from those required in the days of Queen Elizabeth. Then the courts had occasion to inquire whether a limitation upon the right to engage in the same business as that sold was unreasonable because it included a town instead of a single parish, or extended a distance of 10 miles instead of 5. Now the House of Lords in England has held by a unanimous decision in a recent case that such a limitation which covered the whole world was not unreasonable. Because in early times it seemed inconceivable that an agreement to refrain from establishing a business of the same kind anywhere in the Kingdom should be necessary to the protection of the goodwill of any existing business, it was laid down as an arbitrary rule that agreements so comprehensive in their terms were void. Thus the restriction between a general restraint of trade and a partial restraint of trade grew up. Contracts applying to any territory less than the whole Kingdom were considered in reference to their reasonableness, having regard to the purpose for which the contract was made. By the unanimous decision of the House of Lords in the case of Nordenfelt v. Maxim Nordenfelt Guns & A. Co. [1894] A. C. 536, affirming the unanimous judgment of the court of appeal in [1893] 1 Ch. 630, it is now settled in England that a covenant, unrestricted as to space, not to engage in a particular kind of business for twenty-five years, made in connection with the sale of the property of a manufacturing establishment, is valid if, having regard to the nature of the business and the limited number of its customers, it is not wider than is necessary for the protection of the covenant, nor injurious to the public interests of the country, as were found to be the facts in that case. The earlier English authorities are reviewed at length in the opinions, and it is unnecessary to refer to them here. Arbitrary rules which were originally well founded have thus been made to yield to changed conditions, and underlying principles are applied to existing methods of doing business. The tendencies in most of the American courts are in the same direction. Oakdale Mfg. Co. v. Garst, 18 R. I. 484, 23 L. R. A. 639; Fowle v. Park, 131 U. S. 88-97, 33 L. ed. 67-74; Oregon Steam Nav. Co. v. Winsor, 20 Wall. 64, 23 L. ed. 315; Tode v. Gross, 127 N. Y. 480, 13 L. R. A. 652; Diamond Match Co. v. Roeber, 106 N. Y. 473, 60 Am. Rep. 464; Whitney v. Slayton, 40 Me. 224; Western Wooden-ware Assn. v. Starkey, 84 Mich. 76, 11 L. R. A. 503.

In this commonwealth the general doctrine of the cases seems to be that, in connection with the sale of the goodwill of a business, the vendor will be bound by any covenant which is reasonably necessary for the preservation and protection of the property which he sells. 41 L. R. A.

Pierce v. Fuller, 8 Mass. 223; Perkins v. Lyman, 9 Mass. 523; Stearns v. Barrett, 1 Pick. 443, 11 Am. Dec. 223; Palmer v. Stebbins, 3 Pick. 188, 15 Am. Dec. 204; Pierce v. Woodward, 6 Pick. 206; Angier v. Webber, 14 Allen, 211, 92 Am. Dec. 748; Dean v. Emerson, 103 Mass. 480; Morse Twist Drill & Mach. Co. v. Morse, 103 Mass. 73, 4 Am. Rep. 513; Boutelle v. Smith, 116 Mass. 111; Bopen v. Upton, 125 Mass. 258; Handforth v. Jackson, 150 Mass. 149.

In cases in which such covenants have been held bad they were deemed to go further than was reasonable to give full value to the property sold. In Bishop v. Palmer, 146 Mass. 469, relied on by the defendant, the covenant was unrestricted as to space and was made in connection with the sale of the property and goodwill of a local business, not peculiar in its nature, for the protection of which so extensive a covenant was held to be unnecessary. The case of Gamewell Fire Alarm Tel. Co. v. Crane, 160 Mass. 50, 22 L. R. A. 673, is not inconsistent with the contention of the plaintiff. It is said in the opinion that the "plaintiff did not buy the goodwill of a mercantile business, and the defendant, Crane, had no customers for fire alarm and police telegraph machines and apparatus." A ground of the decision stated by a majority of the court is as follows: "The stipulation seems to us to be something more than is reasonably necessary to protect the plaintiff in the enjoyment of the property it bought, even if that should be adopted as the test, upon which we express no opinion." Inasmuch as the stipulation in the present case is only to do no business for five years that shall interfere with or compete with the proposed business of the Anchor Electric Company, it seems quite clear, under the authorities in Massachusetts, that the stipulation goes no further than is reasonably necessary to protect the goodwill of the business sold by the defendant's corporation, and that it should, therefore, be held valid, unless a distinction is to be made between competition with the business of the Anchor Electric Company and competition with the business sold by the defendant and his company. The business sold by the defendant was chiefly installing and constructing electric plants and appliances. The business of the new corporation included with this that which formerly was done by the other two companies, namely, manufacturing and dealing in electrical appliances. In considering this branch of the case, the nature of the contract of sale should be regarded. The defendant's business was sold to be conducted as a part of a new and more general business. Very likely the price paid for it was larger, and the goodwill was deemed more valuable, because it was to be so conducted. The plaintiff corporation carried on different, but closely connected, departments of the electrical business, and the different departments were so related to each other that sometimes it would be difficult, if not impossible, to distinguish between competition with one department and competition with another. Moreover, this was a contract for mutual profit in conducting the new business, which, under the findings of the court, has all presumptions in its favor. Each party was to devote himself to the interests of the new corporation. Although the parties provided for the establishment of a corporation, their arrangement was in the nature of a copartnership. The profits of the new corporation were to be shared by the old corporations, which had sold their property, and become stockholders in the new one. It is difficult to see any good reason why the contract of the three persons to promote the interests of the new corporation should not be binding upon them. This contract necessarily includes the agreement not to enter into competition against the new corporation. The case seems to come within the language of Chief Justice Chapman in Morse Twist Drill & Mach. Co. v. Morse, 103 Mass. 78-75, 4 Am. Rep. 518, where he says the "defendant did not technically become a partner with the plaintiffs, yet he became the associate of the other stockholders in the business, he himself inducing them to join him in it, and having a large interest in the formation of the company; and the same principle that enables a partner to bind himself to do nothing in competition with the business of the firm ought to apply to him." We are of opinion that the stipulation not to compete with the business of the plaintiff corporation is as binding on the defendant as if it were merely not to compete with such business as previously had been done by the Hawks Electric Company.

Decree for the plaintiff.

NEW YORK, NEW HAVEN, & HARTFORD RAILROAD COMPANY.

(.....Mass.....)

1. A person passing from a railroad station across a track to a platform, intending to take a train for which he has purchased a ticket, is a passenger, within the meaning of Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212, relating to the liability of a railroad company for negligently causing the death of a passenger.
2. The negligence or carelessness of a railroad company, and the unfitness, or gross negligence or carelessness of its servants or agents, should be submitted to the jury on evidence that a train running at extraordinary speed struck a person as he was attempting to get on a somewhat crowded platform from which passengers were accustomed to take trains, which was across the track from a station, and which was narrow and insufficient for the accommodation of the passengers accustomed to use it.

EXCEPTIONS by plaintiff to rulings of the Superior Court for Suffolk County dismissing an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's intestate. Sustained.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

NOTE.—As to the rights of a person who has started for a train as a passenger, see Webster v. Fitchburg R. Co. (Mass.) 24 L. R. A. 521, and note; also Wood v. Pennsylvania R. Co. (Pa.) 35 L. R. A. 41 L. R. A.

Messrs. A. A. Strout, R. W. Bartlett, and H. N. Rice for plaintiff.

Messrs. Benton & Choate for defendant.

Field, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

There are four counts in the declaration, some of which are counts at common law, and the others are counts under Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212, in one of which, at least, it is alleged that the plaintiff's intestate was a passenger. We are of opinion that the evidence does not show that the plaintiff's intestate was in the exercise of due care. He ran across the tracks from the station to the platform, in front of an approaching train, which was in plain sight and which he must have seen. This consideration disposes of all the counts except those brought under Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212, in which it is alleged that the plaintiff's intestate was a passenger. Whether there was evidence for the jury that the plaintiff's intestate, at the time he was injured, was a passenger, within the meaning of Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212, is a question of more difficulty. The justice presiding at the trial appears to have been of opinion that the decision in Webster v. Fitchburg R. Co. 161 Mass. 298, 24 L. R. A. 521, shows that the plaintiff's intestate was not a passenger at the time he was injured. The question whether a person who intends to take a train, but has not taken it, has become a passenger, has been considered in many cases, but not often with reference to this particular statute. The plaintiff's intestate undoubtedly was a passenger in the sense that he had a right to be at the station, and to cross the walk to the platform on the other side, and the railroad company, we think, owed him the duty which it owed to passengers generally, to provide suitable accommodations and safe and convenient ways of access to the train. While he was at the station he was under that protection which railroad corporations owe to all persons who arrive at a station intending to take a train. Jordan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 165 Mass. 346, 32 L. R. A. 101; Dodge v. Boston & B. S. Co. 143 Mass. 207, 2 L. R. A. 88; Warren v. Fitchburg R. Co. 8 Allen, 227, 85 Am. Dec. 700. It is plain, we think, that the plaintiff's intestate had presented himself at the proper place,—the place provided by the railroad for passengers,—intending to take a train when it arrived. In this respect the case differs from Webster v. Fitchburg R. Co. 161 Mass. 298, 24 L. R. A. 521. In McKimble v. Boston & M. R. Co. 139 Mass. 542, and in Merrill v. Eastern R. Co. 139 Mass. 252, it was held that a passenger continues to be a passenger, within the meaning of Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212, while crossing the premises of the railroad company to get upon the street after rightfully leaving a train stopping at a station. The effect of the decision in Warren v. Fitchburg R. Co. 8 Allen, 227, 85 Am. Dec. 700, as applied to the facts stated in the exceptions in the present case, is that if the plaintiff's intestate had a ticket for the passage to Boston he was a passenger while passing from the station across the track to the platform. One object of the statute now incorporated in Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212, is said to be the punishment of a railroad company for negligently causing the death of a passenger. Com. v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 134 Mass. 211; England v. Boston & M. R. Co. 153 Mass. 490; Young v. Old Colony R. Co. 156 Mass. 178; Connolly v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 158 Mass. 8; and Winslow v. Boston & M. R. Co. 165 Mass. 264.—were actions at common law, in which the plaintiffs were injured, not killed. We think that in Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212, the word "passenger" must be held to have its customary meaning, and that, under our decisions, there was evidence that the plaintiff's intestate had become a passenger at the time he was injured. The evidence tends strongly to show that he had not abandoned his intention of taking the train and of proceeding in it to Boston.

Was there evidence for the jury of the negligence or carelessness of the corporation, or of the unfitness or gross negligence or carelessness of its servants or agents, while engaged in its business? We think that there was. There was evidence that the platform was narrow, and the space insufficient for the accommodation of the passengers who were accustomed to use it in taking in-bound trains; that on this occasion the platform was crowded with passengers who intended to take the train; that the plaintiff's intestate got one foot on the platform, but was somewhat obstructed by the crowd, and but for the crowd might perhaps have saved himself; that the platform was so constructed that the locomotive and cars running on the track next to it overhung the edge of the platform; and that the approaching train was running at an extraordinary rate of speed, up to and beyond the walk along which the passengers were expected to go across the track to take the train. We are of opinion that the case should have been submitted to the jury on the counts, under Pub. Stat. chap. 112, § 212, in which it is alleged that the deceased was a passenger.

For these reasons, in the opinion of a majority of the court the exceptions should be sustained.

UNITED STATES CIRCUIT COURT OF APPEALS, THIRD CIRCUIT.

STANDARD LIFE & ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY of Detroit, Plff. in Err.,

v.

John CARROLL.

(68 U. S. App. 76, 86 Fed. Rep. 567.)

1. An accident insurance policy is not within Pa. act May 11, 1881, providing that no application, constitution, or by-laws referred to in a life or fire insurance policy shall be received in evidence or considered part of the policy or contract unless correct copies are contained in or attached to the policy.

2. A provision in an accident insurance policy for smaller indemnity, in case the insured is injured while engaged in an occupation more hazardous than that specified in the application is reasonable, and will be enforced by the courts.

(April 11, 1898.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court of the United States for the Western District of Pennsylvania to review a judgment in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover the amount alleged to be due on an accident insurance policy. Reversed.

Before Acheson and Dallas, Circuit Judges, and Bradford, District Judge.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. C. Heydrick for plaintiff in error.

Mr. W. J. Breeze for defendant in error.

Acheson, Circuit Judge, delivered the opinion of the court:

The question for our determination is whether, under the special verdict, judgment should have been entered in favor of Annie Carroll, the plaintiff below, in the sum of $1,600, with interest from the 1st day of July, 1896, or in the sum of $4,000 with interest from said date. The action was upon an accident insurance policy dated January 24, 1895, which provides as follows:

"The Standard Life and Accident Insurance Company of Detroit, Michigan, incorporated in 1884, in consideration of the warranties in the application for this policy, and of $24, hereby insures John Carroll, of Titusville, Pa., by occupation a passenger conductor, under classification extra preferred for the term of twelve calendar months from noon of 24th day of January, 1895, in the sum of $20 per week, against loss of time, not exceeding fifty-two consecutive weeks, resulting from bodily injuries caused solely, during the term of this insurance, by external, violent, and accidental means, which shall, independently of all other causes, immediately and wholly disable him from transacting any and every kind of business pertaining to the occupation under which he is insured; or if the entire loss of one hand or foot, by severance at or above the wrist or ankle, shall result from such injuries alone within ninety days, will pay the insured one third the principal sum herein named, as a specific indemnity, in lieu of said weekly indemnity; or if such injuries shall, within said period, entirely destroy the sight of one eye, one eighth of said principal sum, as a specific indemnity, in lieu of said weekly indemnity; or in the event of the entire loss of two hands or two feet, or of one hand and one foot, by severance at or above the wrist or ankle, or of the entire loss of the sight of both eyes, within ninety days, solely through the injuries aforesaid, will pay the insured the full principal sum hereof; or, if death shall result from such injuries alone within ninety days, will pay the principal sum of $4,000 to Annie Carroll, wife, if surviving, or, in the event of her prior death, to the legal representatives or assigns of the insured; except that, if the insured be injured in any occupation or exposure classed by this company as more hazardous than that stated in said application, the insurance, weekly indemnity, or specific indemnity shall be only for such sum as the premium paid will purchase at the rate fixed by said company for such increased hazard."

The plaintiff's own evidence in chief showed that, while exercising the occupation of a conductor of a mixed railway train,—composed of freight cars, with a combination passenger and baggage car attached,—the insured, John Carroll, received injuries, by external, violent, and accidental means, from which his death resulted within ninety days thereafter. The defendant gave in evidence, under objection, the application of John Carroll for this accident policy, in which he stated his occupation to be that of a "passenger conductor"—the same occupation as that stated in the policy itself; and the defendant also gave in evidence its "Accident Manual," exhibiting its classification of risks and premiums of insurance in the several classes of hazards, and showing that the occupation of conductor of a mixed railway train was classed by the company as more hazardous than that stated in the said application and policy, and that the premium paid for the said policy of insurance would purchase, at the rate fixed by the company for such increased hazard, the sum of $1,600, and no more.

From the above extract from the policy, it will be perceived that subsequent change of occupation by the insured during the term of insurance was contemplated by the parties to the contract, and was provided for in and by the policy. To effectuate their intention in this regard, the parties made the application of the insured, and the company's classification of hazards, essential parts of their contract. Nevertheless it is contended that the application and classification of hazards are to be excluded from consideration by reason of the Pennsylvania act of May 11, 1881. That act is as follows:

"An Act Relating to Life and Fire Insurance Policies. Section 1: Be it enacted," etc., "that all life and fire insurance policies upon the lives or property of persons within this commonwealth whether issued by companies organized under the laws of this state or by foreign companies doing business therein, which contain any reference to the application of the insured, or the constitution, by-laws, or other rules of the company, either as forming part of the policy or contract between the parties thereto, or having any bearing on said contract, shall contain or have attached to said policies correct copies of the application, as signed by the applicant, and the by-laws referred to; and unless so attached and accompanying the policy, no such application, constitution, or by-laws shall be received in evidence in any controversy between the parties to, or interested in, the said policy, nor shall such application or by-laws be considered a part of the policy or contract between such parties." Pub. Laws 1881, p. 20 (Purdon, Dig. 1646, pl. 62).

At the date of this act there was, and still is, in Pennsylvania, a legislative classification of insurance. The act of May 1, 1876 (Pub. Laws, 53), No. 46, provides for the incorporation of four different kinds of insurance companies: First, to make insurance against fires and marine risks; second, to make insurance upon lives; third, to make insurance upon health, and against accidents; and fourth, to make insurance upon live stock. And the act contains distinctive provisions applicable to these several classes of insurance companies. Now, the act of May 11, 1881, does not purport to cover all policies of insurance, but it is limited to two specified classes. The subject matter of the act is expressed in its title, "An Act Relating to Life and Fire Insurance Policies;" and the enacting clause reads, "All life and fire insurance policies upon the lives or property of persons," etc. Presumably the legislature intended to exclude from the operation of the act the classes of insurance policies not named. The suggestion that the act includes policies of insurance against bodily accidents seems to us to be quite inadmissible. The instrument sued on here is strictly an accident insurance policy. The form of the policy is that commonly used in insurance against bodily accidents. The primary purpose is to secure a weekly indemnity in money to the insured in the event of his disability from accidental injury. In certain specified contingencies, resulting from accidental injury, a specified gross sum is to be paid. In some of these resulting contingencies the stipulated specific payment is a proportionate part of the principal sum named in the policy, and in other contingencies the whole principal sum is to be paid. One of the latter is death resulting from the accident within ninety days thereafter. But this contingent provision does not make the instrument a life-insurance policy, either in a popular or in a legal sense.

The views we have thus expressed require a reversal of this judgment, unless, as the counsel for the defendant in error contends, the supreme court of Pennsylvania has construed the act of May 11, 1881, as embracing accident insurance policies, equally with life and fire insurance policies. It is claimed (and the reporter's syllabus gives some color to the contention) that in the case of Pickett v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. 144 Pa. 79, 13 L. R. A. 661, that learned court put such a construction upon the act of 1881. Now, we have examined that case with great care, verifying our understanding of the facts as stated in the official report by consulting the copy of the record contained in the paper books found in the First Law Library, Philadelphia (vol. 140, Paper Book Series); and we feel entirely justified in saying that the decision by no means goes to the length supposed. The plaintiff there declared upon "a policy of insurance in the sum of $5,000 upon the life of John W. Moore." The stipulation upon which the plaintiff relied and under which recovery was had was in these words: "The Pacific Mutual Life Insurance Company of California, . . . in consideration of the warranties in the application [for this insurance, and the stipulations herein contained] and of the sum of $37.50, insured John W. Moore, by occupation, profession, or employment a contractor and driller [residing in Warren, county of Warren, and state of Pennsylvania], in the sum of $5,000, for the term of twelve months ending on June 4, 1890. The said sum to be paid to the legal representative of the insured after due notice and satisfactory proof that the insured has, during the continuance of this policy, sustained such violent and accidental injuries as shall externally be visible upon his person, and which shall alone have caused his death within ninety days of the date of such accident."

This was the only insurance effected by the policy. Following the above-cited clause are the words, "Or, if policy be issued for both death and indemnity, will pay the insured; . . ." but the policy, as issued, was not for both death and indemnity. The insurance was only upon the life of the insured. The instrument, as issued, might well be held to be a restricted life-insurance policy, within the meaning of the act of May 11, 1881. The court ruled that the act did apply to that particular policy. The great question in Pickett v. Pacific Mut. L. Ins. Co. was whether a condition against "inhalation of gas" applied to an involuntary and unconscious inhalation of poisonous gas by the insured in the course of his employment, and it was held that the condition did not apply. That question, which went to the substantial merits of the case, and was decisive of the controversy, was discussed with great fullness in the opinion of the court. The other question, namely, the applicability of the act of 1881 to the case, was briefly disposed of thus:

"Another ground of defense suggested in the defendant's fifth, sixth, and seventh points was that the deceased was injured in an occupatton or exposure classed by the company as more hazardous than that specified in the policy, etc. The points referred to appear to be predicated of testimony which was improperly before the jury. The company, in disregard of the provisions of the act of May 11, 1881, Pub. Laws, 20, had failed to attach to the policy copies of the by-laws or application, and should not have been permitted, against plaintiff's objection, to give them in evidence. The act was passed in the interest of honesty and fair dealing, and its provisions should be strictly enforced. We have no doubt they apply to such companies as the defendant."

This language, of course, was used with reference to the particular instrument before the court and must be so read. There is no warrant, we think, for the assumption that the court thereby meant to declare that the act of May 11, 1881, applies to accident insurance policies. In the present case the offer of the application was not to defeat a recovery, or to set aside any of the stipulations of the policy. The parties contracted with reference to a future change of occupation by the insured. Such change was not to avoid the policy. It was allowable upon agreed terms. The change of occupation simply altered the amount of indemnity so as to accord with the increased hazard. This is the plain contract of the parties, evidenced by the policy itself. The provision for changes of occupation and hazard is reasonable and just, and, indeed, in the interest of the holders of accident-insurance policies. We discover no good reason here for denying effect to the provision.

The judgment is reversed, with costs to the plaintiff in error in this court; and the cause is remanded to the Circuit Court, with directions to enter judgment in favor of the plaintiff in the sum of $1,600, with interest from the 1st day of July, 1896, and costs in the court below.

CALIFORNIA SUPREME COURT.

1. The words "for other purposes" in the title of a statute have no effect under Const. art. 4, § 24, providing that a statute shall have but one subject, which shall be expressed in the title, and provisions on other subjects shall be void.

2. Provisions as to political conventions, and nominations thereby and voting therein, and as to expenditures by candidates, and the placing of names on official ballots, are void, when made in a statute providing for general primary elections.

3. A primary election provided for by statute is an election "authorized by law," within the meaning of Const. art. 2, § 1, prescribing the qualifications of electors at all elections authorized by law.

4. The qualifications as to residence of voters at primary elections, prescribed by the act of March 13, 1897, do not comply with the Constitution, as the only condition they provide is thirty days' residence in the county prior to the election, whereas the Constitution requires residence in the state for one year, in the county ninety days, and in the precinct thirty days, and that naturalized citizens must have been such ninety days.

5. The restriction of the right to vote at the primary elections by act of March 13, 1897, § 22, to those whose names appear upon the great or precinct registers, or the supplements thereto, used at the last general election, is unconstitutional, as it excludes various classes of electors who have a constitutional right to vote.

6. The power of the legislature to require an oath of a bona fide present intention to support the nominees selected by the delegates there elected as a test of the right to vote at a primary election presents a matter demanding most serious consideration, but is not decided in this case.

(March 24, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Tulare County in favor of defendants in an action brought to enjoin defendants from carrying out the provisions of a primary election law. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Thomas V. Cator for appellant.

Mr. F. B. Howard for respondents.

Garoutte, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action to determine the constitutionality of a primary election law passed at the last session of the legislature, and approved March 13, 1897. It is contended upon the part of the various counsel assailing this law that its enforcement will be an expensive burden upon the people; that, under the guise of a great reform, a system of elections has been devised which, by its expensive and complicated procedure, greatly increases the tendency to place the political life of the state in the hands of those who make politics a profession; that the whole theory of the law is wrong in regulating the political action of parties, associations, and individuals, and thereby destroying that freedom of political associations which has heretofore always existed in this country, and under which it has become so great; that the act, as a whole, is incapable of practical operation by reason of complicated matters of detail, its inconsistencies, and contradictory provisions; that it has no applicability to small counties and sparsely-settled districts; and that no demand for such a law is found aside from a few of the larger cities of the state. It is shown by the brief of Mr. F. J. Sullivan, representing the nonpartisan party, that the inevitable tendency of the operation of the act will be to overwhelm and destroy all small political parties, and prevent the organization of new parties; that, inasmuch as no party may be organized after a convention, and secure representation upon the official ballot, it follows that if this law had been in force at the last presidential election there could have been neither a Gold Democratic party nor a Silver Republican party in this state; that it has the greatest tendency to discourage independent parties and independent voting, and thereby nullifies some of the vital and most meritorious provisions of the Australian ballot law. All the claims advanced by counsel in these regards as to the objectionable character of the law may be true. We are satisfied that many of them are true. But this court has no power to correct the evils in this law. It is not our province to approve good legislation and condemn bad legislation. The act stands upon the statute book as the lawful expression of the will of the people of the state, and with the good or bad policy exercised in enacting it we cannot deal. By its passage the legislature has attempted to meet existing political conditions, and remedy great evils found therein. It is not for the court to say whether failure or success will follow as a result of its practical operation. Within its domain the legislative power is absolute, and the remedy for unwise legislation is not with the courts, but with the people. In the present proceeding it is our duty alone to pass upon the validity of this act, tested by the various provisions of the Constitution of the state. The act is entitled "An Act Providing for General Primary Elections within the State of California, and to Promote the Purity thereof by Regulating the Conduct thereof, and to Support the Privileges of Free Suffrage thereat, by Prohibiting Certain Acts and Practices in Relation thereto, and Providing for the Punishment thereof, and for Other Purposes." Acts 1897, p. 115. A provision of the state Constitution provides: "Every act shall embrace but one subject, which subject shall be expressed in its title. But if any subject shall be embraced in an act which shall not be expressed in its title, such act shall be void only as to so much thereof as shall not be expressed in its title." Const. art. 4, § 24.

Let us test the title of this act in the crucible furnished by the foregoing provision of the Constitution. The legislature in framing this title were above all things candid. Upon its very face the law-making power challenged the sound policy of this provision of the Constitution, and, avowedly disregarding it, declared that the purpose of the act was the creation of a primary election law and "other purposes." Under the cloak of "other purposes," all and every conceivable kind of legislation could hide and thrive in the body of the act, and thus the constitutional provision be set at naught. In this state when these words "for other purposes" are found in the title of an act of the state legislature they accomplish nothing, and in reading the title our eyes are closed to them. We then have before us tested by its title an act dealing solely with general primary elections, and providing penalties for violating the law relating thereto. Any matters of legislation contained in the body of the act not bearing upon primary elections must go out; the constitutional provision quoted so declares. Weighing and measuring the legislation found in the act by this test, very many provisions have no place there. It would seem that the legislature, in using the words "for other purposes" in the title, used those words advisedly, and in good faith lived up to them fully. For the legislation found in section after section of the act can find no justification in its title, save under those words of boundless meaning, "for other purposes."

Section 1 defines what are state, district, and local conventions of political parties. Section 2 declares that state conventions shall have power at their option to divide themselves into district conventions to nominate candidates for Congress, or other district nominees. Section 10 declares that, after a call for a primary election has been issued by the election commissioners, the governing body of any political party or organization desiring to secure a place upon the official ballot for its nominees at the succeeding election must publish a call for a convention, and provides in detail for the time when the convention may be called, and requires notice to be given in certain papers thereof. Section 12 declares that no person shall be allowed to hold more than one proxy at any convention. Section 13 provides that no nomination by any political convention (with certain exceptions) shall be put upon any official ballot, unless such convention is constituted in accordance with this act. Section 17 declares who may sign a petition authorizing the placing of names of candidates upon the official ballot without the aid of conventions. Section 24 declares certain powers of state conventions. Section 33 provides that no candidate nominated by a convention shall be placed upon the official ballot unless he files an affidavit setting forth certain facts as to the expenditure of moneys in securing his nomination. Section 34 provides that candidates shall make an itemized statement of all moneys expended in securing nominations. Section 35 provides for penalties against candidates in refusing or neglecting to file the above-mentioned statement. Section 36 declares who shall be entitled to have their names placed upon the official ballot. The foregoing matters, taken from the body of the act, are fairly illustrative as comprising legislation not justified by its title. Many of these things are totally foreign to any question relating to primary elections, and others are so remotely connected with that subject as to clearly come within the prohibition of the constitutional provision. These matters of legislation, not being embraced within the purview of the title, are void and fall to the ground. Yet, while the elimination of them from the act to some extent may leave it weak and enfeebled, it still has sufficient vitality to stand alone, and we pass to a further examination of its condition viewed from other angles, and tested by the aid of other crucibles furnished by the Constitution.

Section 1, art. 2, of the Constitution provides: "Every native male citizen of the United States, every male person who shall have acquired the rights of citizenship under or by virtue of the treaty of Queretaro, and every male naturalized citizen thereof, who shall have become such ninety days prior to any election, of the age of twenty-one years, who shall have been a resident of the state one year next preceding the election, and of the county in which he claims his vote ninety days, and in the election precinct thirty days, shall be entitled to vote at all elections which are now or may hereafter be authorized by law." And, in furtherance of this constitutional declaration, § 11, art. 20, of the Constitution provides: "The privilege of free suffrage shall be supported by laws regulating elections, and prohibiting under adequate penalties all undue influence thereon from power, bribery, tumult, or other improper practice."

When tested in the crucible furnished by these provisions of the organic law, the whole act must give way, as failing to meet the requirements there laid down. The primary election provided for in the present act is an election "authorized by law" under the foregoing provision of the Constitution. This must be so, for the law is a mandatory law. It has been directly decided to be an election referred to in the Constitution. Murphy v. Hanly, 111 Cal. 868. It must be an election under this provision of the Constitution, or the legislature would have no power to provide that money should be taken from the state and county treasuries to pay the expenses of conducting it. The validity of any taxation, looking towards the raising of money for such purposes, would be absolutely void if the elections provided for by the act are not elections recognized by and referred to in this constitutional provision. These things being true, the legislature has no power to deprive any citizen of the state, who fills all the requirements demanded by the section of the Constitution quoted, from voting at an election provided for by this act. In this country the right to vote is recognized as one of the highest privileges of the citizen. It is so recognized, not only by the citizen, but by the law; and any infringement by legislative power upon that right as granted by the Constitution is idle legislation. If the legislature by this act has deprived citizens of the right to participate in the elections therein provided, who are qualified to participate under the Constitution,—aye, even if the legislature has deprived one citizen so qualified of such right,—the act is void, as an attempted exercise of power it does not possess. As we have seen, § 11, art. 20, of the Constitution, authorizes the legislature to pass laws in support of the privilege of free suffrage. This certainly does not mean the authorization of laws looking towards the curtailment and deprivation of free suffrage. The legislature has the power to pass laws looking to the proper and reasonable regulation of the exercise of the right of free suffrage, and when that has been done its power has been exhausted.

Before passing to an examination of the act itself, for the purpose of ascertaining who are entitled to participate in the elections held thereunder, we will consider another matter closely allied to the question now under consideration. Among other things found in § 23 of the act, it is provided: "Any native born citizen who since the last general election has become of legal age, or any person who has become naturalized since the last general election, shall be entitled to vote at any primary election; providing he has made application to have his name placed upon the precinct register of the county in which he resides, and of which he has been a legal resident for thirty days prior to any primary election." It will be seen by this provision that all native-born citizens who since the last general election have become of legal age, and who have been legal residents of the county for thirty days prior to the election, are entitled to vote. It will also be observed that all citizens who have become so by reason of naturalization since the last general election, and are legal residents as aforesaid, are likewise entitled to vote. Under this provision, citizens made so by naturalization upon the day next preceding the election would be entitled to vote. Such legislation is not a curtailment of the constitutional right of suffrage, but an enlargement of that right; that is, the legislature has attempted to extend the right of suffrage to certain classes of citizens outside of those classes mentioned in the Constitution. If the legislature has such power, it could extend the right to aliens, to minors, to women. It has no such power. The legislature can no more extend the right of suffrage to persons not included in the constitutional provision than it can deprive persons there included of the right. The application of the maxim, Expressio unius est exclusio alterius, bears with full force upon this provision of the Constitution declaring who are competent to vote at elections authorized by the laws of this state. The legislation just quoted from the act bearing upon native-born citizens arriving at the age of twenty-one years after the last general election, and citizens naturalized since the last general election, is void, as being in direct contravention of the Constitution of the state. This contravention of the Constitution consists in this: that a legal residence in the county alone for thirty days prior to the election is the only condition required by the act, whereas the Constitution requires a legal residence in the state for one year, and in the county ninety days, and in the precinct thirty days. This legislation is also in contravention of the Constitution, in this: that the naturalized citizen under the Constitution is not entitled to vote unless his naturalization occurred at least ninety days prior to the day of election.

Section 22 of the act provides: "No person shall be allowed to vote whose name does not appear upon the great or precinct register of the county, or the city and county, used at the last general election held before such primary election, in the precinct in which he desires to vote as a person entitled to vote in such precinct, or unless his name appears upon the supplements to such great or precinct registers." Here is a direct, bald declaration that only those electors whose names appear upon the great or precinct registers, or the supplements thereto used at the last general election, are entitled to vote. In § 23 we find that portion of the statute giving to certain naturalized citizens and native-born citizens who have arrived at years of majority since the last general election the right to vote at the primary election, and providing the means by which they may have their names placed upon the register; but this provision of the law we have already held void as violative of the constitutional provision bearing upon the qualification of voters. The same section also provides that an elector moving from one county to another since the last general election may secure a transfer of his registration; but there are no means provided by which he may have his name placed upon the register used at the primary election. Hence his transfer of registration avails him nothing; for no man may vote unless his name appears upon the register or supplement thereto.

Keeping in view the law's demand that no person shall be allowed to vote whose name does not appear upon the register or supplement mentioned, we will enumerate the various classes of electors, qualified under the Constitution to participate in elections, that are debarred from participating in elections held under this act: (1) All native born citizens who have arrived at age since the last general election. (2) All foreign-born citizens naturalized since the last general election and ninety days prior to the primary election. (3) All electors who have changed their residence from one county to another since the last general election. (4) All electors who have secured a residence in the state since the last general election. (5) All electors of the state at the last general election who failed to have their names placed upon the great or precinct registers or supplements thereto prior to that election. (6) All foreign-born citizens who were naturalized within ninety days next preceding the last general election.

It will thus appear that the legislature has declared only those electors whose names appeared upon the great or precinct register of the county, or the supplement thereto, at the last general election, entitled to participate in elections held under this act. If the legislature had enacted similar legislation as to a state or national election, it would have been so palpably void as to fall at the mere suggestion of its appearance before a judicial tribunal. Yet it would be a judicial absurdity to say that citizens of a state having the right under the Constitution to participate in state and national elections may be deprived by the legislature of the right to participate in the elections authorized and fostered under this act. As before suggested, these elections are made mandatory by the law. Revenue is raised by the ordinary means of taxation upon all the property of the state to pay the expense of conducting them. Their exclusive conduct and management is taken from political parties, associations, and individuals, and placed in the hands of the state. Their validity can only be upheld upon the theory that they are matters of vital import to the general welfare of the state, and therefore matters in which every citizen and every taxpayer is beneficially interested. In other words, the legislature, believing a sound public policy demanded such a course, has made these elections a state institution. By the whole tenor of the act they are placed upon the plane of state elections, and in the consideration of the law bearing upon them must be so recognized. If the legislature has the power to deprive one class of constitutional electors of the right to participate therein, it has the power to deprive six classes; and, if it be conceded that it has the power to so legislate, of necessity an election thus held would be a stranger to the Constitution, and a pure creature of the statute. Such conditions cannot exist, for the Constitution declares, that the men here debarred from voting shall be entitled to vote at all elections which may hereafter "be authorized by law." The word "elections," as here used, refers to elections affecting the political life of the state. This is such an election. It is essentially a political election "authorized by law," and therefore an election within this provision of the Constitution.

Section 17 provides that by the act of voting the voter declares as a test of his right to so vote a bona fide, present intention of supporting the nominees selected by the delegates there elected, and before voting an oath to that effect may be required. The power of the legislature to affix such a test to the right to vote will be alluded to hereafter; but, conceding the existence of the power, then all electors entitled to vote under the Constitution, who are ready and willing to comply with this requirement of the law, have a common right to participate in such election, and any discrimination in favor of or against any class or individual is special legislation and prohibited by the Constitution. For this reason, even if it be assumed that the elections provided for by the act are not elections recognized by the constitutional provisions which we have had under consideration, still the act must fall by reason of the special legislation to which we have here drawn attention.

The power of the legislature to establish a test for voters at any election presents a matter demanding the most serious consideration. If it were a state or national election, where state officers or presidential electors were chosen, no one would have the temerity to say that a legislative test could be invoked. And the moment you recognize the existence of power in the legislature to create tests in these primary elections you recognize the right of the legislature to create any test which to that body may seem proper. While the test prescribed in this act may be said to be a most reasonable one, yet the right to make it carries with it the right to make tests most unreasonable. If the power rests in the legislature to create a test, then the power is found in a Democratic legislature to make the test at a primary election a belief in the free coinage of silver at the ratio of sixteen to one, and the same power is found in a Republican legislature to make the test a belief in a protective tariff. If such a power may be sustained under the Constitution, then the life and death of political parties are held in the hollow of the hand by a state legislature. These suggestions present matters for grave consideration, even conceding that the elections provided for in the act come within the provision of the Constitution bearing upon elections, and that they are therefore mere matters of legislation with which the legislature has full and untrammelled power to deal. We understand this law is the first of its kind in the United States. Its mandatory features present one of the greatest and most important innovations upon past legislation in this country bearing upon primary elections. Under the mandates of this act, all political parties and associations must come under its wing or be destroyed. They must all bow down before it as the price of their existence. These things are only done by giant strides in state legislation, and the power of the state legislature to thus enact with reference to political parties presents grave and interesting questions. The foregoing suggestions are put forth in order that the state legislature in future, when dealing with this question, may appreciate the importance of its work when viewed in the light of the constitutional difficulties to be met and overcome. For the reasons previously given, wherein we held the law invalid, we have refrained from discussing these important matters but content ourselves with merely suggesting them.

For the foregoing reasons the judgment is reversed, and cause remanded, with directions that the proceeding be dismissed.

SANFORD COMPANY, Appt.

(70 Conn. 573.)

Liability for the safety of the staging is not placed by law upon a manufacturer of ornamental decorations who, at the request of a building contractor, sends his servant to put up decorations ordered for the building, telling him the builder will see to the staging, when the servant is injured by the fall of an additional staging erected at his request by an employee of the builder, although he was assured by his foreman, who urged him to go to do the work, that the staging would be entirely safe.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Court of Common Pleas for Hartford County assessing damages after defendant's default in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries for which defendant was alleged to be responsible. Reversed.

Statement by Torrance, J.:

The questions in the case arise entirely upon the finding of facts, which is as follows: "(1) On June 8, 1897, the plaintiff was sixty-seven years old, and had been for many years an ornamental plasterer. He was then, and for eight or nine months had been, in the employ of the defendant. (2) The defendant was, and now is, a corporation organized, under the joint stock laws of the state of Connecticut, for the manufacture of plastic ornaments and decorations, and placing the same in buildings, located and having its principal place of business in the city of Hartford. (3) The defendant in the spring of 1897 had made, on the order of one John F. Caulfield, a mason and contractor of New Britain, certain plaster ornaments for St. Joseph's Roman Catholic Church, which at that time was in process of erection at New Britain by said Caulfield, as general contractor. (4) Said Caulfield was an experienced mason and contractor, having been engaged in business as such for thirteen years. (5) The masonwork and plain plastering of said church had been practically completed by said Caulfield, and the interior woodwork was being placed in position, when the injury to the plaintiff occurred. A solid and substantial staging had been built by said Caulfield or his workmen for the purpose of reaching said work, and stood about 2 feet distant from the walls, measured from the inside of the staging to the face of the walls. Said staging had been used, and was being used, by all the workmen engaged on the interior of the church. (6) After said ornament had been delivered to Caulfield, he told the defendant that his men could not put it in place, and requested the defendant to place the ornamental work in position; and Caulfield agreed to furnish whatever was necessary,—that is, staging, a helper, plaster, putty, etc. The plaintiff had no knowledge of this agreement, except as hereinafter stated. (7) On June 8, 1897, the defendant, by its foreman, requested the plaintiff to go to New Britain and place said ornaments in position. The plaintiff told the foreman that he had never put ornaments in place; that he had never worked on staging in his life, and knew nothing about building them; and that he would not do it. These statements as to his lack of experience with, and knowledge of, staging were true. The foreman told him that Caulfield was to see to the staging, that the main staging was already in place, and that it had been used by all the workmen on the interior of the church, and assured him that the staging would be entirely safe. The plaintiff thereupon consented to go. (8) The plaintiff asked that he might have one Schwartzing as a helper, and the foreman agreed to send him with the plaintiff. (9) On the next day the plaintiff and Schwartzing went to New Britain. Defendant's foreman met them there, by agreement, and took them to the church. He there pointed out to the plaintiff the places where the several ornaments were to go, and told him, if he wanted any help, as, for instance, the bringing of water, plaster, or putty, or the shifting of any staging, to call on a workman then present, whom he pointed out to the plaintiff. This was one Burns, a mason in the employ of Caulfield. (10) Burns was an experienced mason, competent to build staging. He was paid by Caulfield. (11) The plaintiff was paid by defendant, who charged his time at an increased rate to Caulfield. He was in the exclusive employment and control of defendant while doing the work. He was himself in charge of this job, and received no orders from anyone after beginning work. He did not in any way communicate with Caulfield. (12) The plaintiff and Schwartzing were engaged in placing the ornaments in position Friday, Saturday, and Monday, June 4th to 7th. On the afternoon of Monday the plaintiff was about to fasten up a frieze which ran between, and on the same level as, the capitals of two small pilasters, which latter projected from the wall about 6 inches, and were about 15 feet from the floor. Up to this time they had used the main staging mentioned in paragraph 5 hereof. They could not conveniently reach the location for this frieze from the main staging, and the plaintiff asked Burns to make an additional stage, projecting from the main staging towards the wall. (13) Burns built said additional staging, but he negligently failed to properly support it, and it was not strong enough for the use required. (14) Almost immediately after the plaintiff went upon the staging, it gave way and precipitated him to the floor. (15) The plaintiff was seriously bruised, and received injuries to the spine, which have rendered him permanently unable to do the usual work of his trade, or any work except of a very light kind. He was confined to the house for three months, and has constantly suffered much pain. (16) The defendant suffered a default, and the hearing was as to the damages after such default. Upon the foregoing facts the plaintiff claimed that the negligence of said Burns in constructing the staging was imputable to the defendant, and constituted a breach of the duty owed by a master to his servant, and that substantial damages should be awarded. The defendant claimed that the negligence of said Burns was the negligence of a servant of an independent contractor, and was not imputable to the defendant. The defendant claimed further that the accident which caused the plaintiff's injuries was one of the risks of employment assumed by plaintiff; that, if said Burns was not the servant of an independent contractor, he was a fellow servant of the plaintiff, and that, therefore, defendant was not liable for his negligence; and that only nominal damages should be awarded. The court overruled the claims of the defendant, and rendered judgment for the plaintiff in the sum of $1,000 and costs of suit.*

* The memorandum of decision by the lower court, Peck, J., was as follows:

On these facts the plaintiff seems to me clearly entitled to recover in this action.

"It is the master's duty to exercise reasonable care to provide for his servant a reasonably safe place in which to work, reasonably safe appliances and instrumentalities for his work, and fit and competent persons as his collaborators. . . . The designation of an agent, however fit and competent that agent may be for the execution of the master's duties, does not fill out the sum of the master's obligation, nor serve to relieve the master from further responsibility. Until the agent, thus selected and empowered, in fact acts up to the limit of the duty of his master to act, the master's duty is not done. The master's duty requires performance. He may at his option perform in person, or delegate performance to another. In either case reasonable care must be exercised in the doing of the act required to be done by the master." McEligott v. Randolph, 61 Conn. 157; Wilson v. William L. Linn Co., 60 Conn. 453, 47 Am. Rep. 658; Gerrish v. New Haven Ice Co., 63 Conn. 9; O'Keefe v. National Folding Box & Paper Co., 66 Conn. 38.

"The duties of a master in most cases are easily distinguished from those of an employee. The proprietor of a cotton mill is bound to have a safe building, a safe dam or engine, and safe machinery, and he is bound to keep them so. To do that he must employ skilled mechanics, who perform his duties. Their negligence is his negligence. The English rule says that he has done his whole duty when he has employed skillful, careful men to do this work. We think that a more salutary rule would be to require him to see that the work is actually done with care and skill." Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co., 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 590.

If Burns was not the servant of an independent contractor, he must have been the servant or an "instrumentality" is not a very important question in view of the language of the Connecticut cases. It must surely come within one of the three terms, and no distinction is made between them as to the extent of the master's obligation.

To a workman like the plaintiff, whose own duties have nothing to do with the making of the scaffold, but who cannot do his work at all until one is provided for him, it is both the place of his work and an instrumentality necessary to be provided for him by the master. A difference might exist in the case of a carpenter or mason, who by the usual course of his employment is required to put up his own staging. In that case the servant's employment includes the putting up of the staging. In the case at bar his employment could not begin till the staging was provided.

The defendant recognized the duty, and undertook its performance. He agreed with Caulfield to provide necessary staging. He assured the plaintiff that safe staging would be provided, and he pointed out Burns to him as the person to whom he was to look to build it. The plaintiff relied solely on the master's obligation and assurance, employed the man whom the master had pointed out to him, and received the injury through that person's negligence.

It makes no difference that Burns was in the employ of Caulfield, and paid by him. The defendant designated him to do the especial duty which it owed to its servant, and for that purpose he was its representative. When the master had bidden his servant, "Apply to Burns for any needed staging," the servant had no occasion to ask who paid Burns's wages, or who sent him to the church.

The defendant claims that Burns, if acting in behalf of the defendant, was the fellow servant of the plaintiff, within the familiar fellow servant doctrine. But this doctrine does not constitute an exception to the rule of the master's liability. No person is a fellow servant within the meaning of the rule who is performing the master's peculiar duty.

"The agents who are charged with the duty of supplying safe machinery are not, in the true sense of the rule relied on, to be regarded as fellow servants of those who are engaged in operating it. They are charged with the master's duty to his servant." Ford v. Fitchburg R. Co. 110 Mass. 240, 14 Am. Rep. 568, quoted in Wilson v. Williamantic Linen Co. 50 Conn. 457, 47 Am. Rep. 653. See also Darrigan v. New York & N. E. R. Co. 52 Conn. 285, 52 Am. Rep. 590; McElligott v. Randolph, 61 Conn. 157, and Gerrish v. New Haven Ice Co. 63 Conn. 9.

The question whether the determining mark of a vice principal, as distinguished from a fellow servant, is his superiority in grade, or the nature of the duties which he performs, that is, whether they are or are not the duties of the master, upon which the American courts have differed so widely, has been definitely decided for this state in favor of the latter test in McElligott v. Randolph, 61 Conn. 157, and Sullivan v. New York, N. H. & H. R. Co. 62 Conn. 200.

Nor is it any more possible for the master to avoid his own obligations by casting them upon an "independent contractor." The duty constantly remains upon the master until its performance, and whatever means he adopts to fulfil it, whether the hiring of a servant, or the contracting with a contractor, are but his own efforts toward its performance, which must result in the actual use of reasonable care in providing the place or the instrumentality, before he is relieved. The law of independent contractors has its principal application to the relations between the master and third persons.

The defendant made the ingenious claim that the defendant, while the employer of the plaintiff, was not his master in the legal sense. This distinction can only exist where the employer has for the time given up the control and direction of its employee to another, who has become his master for the time being. But the facts furnish no foundation for this claim. The defendant's foreman took the plaintiff to the church, and gave him all the direction as to his duties which were required. It in no way appeared that he passed under the direction of Caulfield, or that he ever communicated with or even saw him. He was paid for his time by the defendant, who charged it to Caulfield at an increased rate.

The defendant relies largely upon the cases of Devlin v. Smith, 89 N. Y. 470, 42 Am. Rep. 311, and Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 107, both of which were cases of injury by the insufficiency of a scaffolding, and somewhat similar in their facts to the case at bar.

Devlin v. Smith seems to be decided on a theory of the master's responsibility quite different from that which is held in the Connecticut cases. The court says: "Where injury to an employee results from a defect in the implements furnished, knowledge of the defect must be brought home to the employer, or proof given that he omitted the exercise of proper care to discover it. Personal negligence is the gist of the action."

This states a rule as to the master's liability in regard to the implements furnished to the servant so different from the Connecticut rule as to make the case of little authority here.

In Butler v. Townsend, a later case, the court below had charged the jury that the master was bound to furnish place for his servant, and that the contractors entrusted with the work of putting up a staging were fulfilling his duty, and he was responsible for their negligence. The court of appeals reversed the judgment by the vote of four judges to three, the majority putting the case squarely on the ground of a distinction between a "place" and an "instrumentality" as to the master's obligation, and holding that a scaffolding is an "instrumentality," to which the rules stated in Devlin v. Smith were applicable. They concede that if the scaffolding were a "place" the master would not be excused by the existence of an independent contract for its erection, nor by the absence of personal negligence.

All our Connecticut cases define the rule as applying exactly to the same extent to the place in which, and the instrumentality with which, the servant is put to work, the distinction is very minute and doubtful, and the cases seem to me to be inconsistent with the comprehensive and liberal rule for the protection of the servant laid down in the cases in this state already cited.

The damages suffered by the plaintiff reached at least the full jurisdiction of the court, and judgment is rendered that he recover of the defendant $1,000 and his costs of suit.

of defendant and, if so, he was the fellow servant of plaintiff.

Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 111; O'Connor v. Neal, 153 Mass. 281; Kimmer v. Weber, 151 N. Y. 417.

Caulfield was the master of both Burns and of the plaintiff. If the plaintiff was lent or hired out by defendant to Caulfield, the defendant is not liable for the negligence of Caulfield's servant.

Donovan v. Laing, W. & D. Constr. Syndicate [1893] 1 Q. B. 629; Johnson v. Lindsay [1891] A. C. 371; Delaware, L. & W. R. Co. v. Hardy, 59 N. J. L. 35; Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 206.

The payment of plaintiff's wages by defendant is not conclusive, nor is the fact that defendant rendered Caulfield a charge additional to the same.

Rourke v. White Moss Colliery Co. L. R. 2 C. P. Div. 205; Murray v. Currie, L. R. 6 C. P. 24; Johnson v. Boston, 118 Mass. 114; The Harold, 21 Fed. Rep. 428.

It was a mistake to assume as the duty violated that of providing a safe place for the work of the servants. The staging was not, in the sense of the rule, the place in which the work was to be done, but an appliance or instrumentality by means of or through the aid of which the work was to be done.

Butler v. Townsend, 126 N. Y. 110. See Hogan v. Smith, 125 N. Y. 774; McCampbell v. Cunard S. S. Co. 144 N. Y. 552; Kimmer v. Weber, 151 N. Y. 417; Adasken v. Gilbert, 165 Mass. 443.

The foreman's language cannot be construed as a guaranty of the safety of every appliance which the plaintiff might choose to order when he was on the job, and of course it was beyond the scope of the foreman's power to give such assurance.

Kimmer v. Weber, 151 N. Y. 423.

Mr. Timothy E. Steele for appellee.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The decisive question in this case is whether, upon the facts found, it was the duty of the defendant to provide the staging upon which the plaintiff was to do his work in the church building. If it was, there is no error. If it was not, there is. In the discussion of this question it will be assumed that the plaintiff, while doing the work in the church, was and remained, as the finding shows, the servant of the defendant; and, further, that the staging furnished to the plaintiff was, as claimed by him, a place for the servant to work in, rather than a mere tool or appliance, within the meaning of the rule hereinafter referred to.

The general rule requiring the master to use reasonable care to provide a reasonably safe place for the servant to work in, and performance of that requirement, as the full measure of his duty in this respect, is well settled in this state. Wilson v. Willimantic Linen Co. 50 Conn. 483, 47 Am. Rep. 653; McElligott v. Randolph, 61 Conn. 157. This was the rule applied in this case in the trial court, and the important question is whether it was applicable under the facts found. The first part of the rule above referred to is usually stated as follows: "It is the master's duty to exercise reasonable care to provide for his servant a reasonably safe place in which to work." McElligott v. Randolph, 61 Conn. 157, 161. This, as a general statement of the general rule applicable in most of the cases of this kind, is accurate enough. It is sufficiently accurate as applied to cases like the two hereinbefore cited from our own Reports. As thus stated, however, the duty, and the liability arising from a negligent failure to perform it, would appear to rest upon the master at all times and under all circumstances, whenever and wherever his servants may be at work for him; but this, clearly, is not so. There are cases where the servant may be at work for the master, and yet no such duty or liability rests upon the master. In cases where the servant does his work upon staging, scaffolding, or similar structures, it frequently happens that it is the duty of the servant, by force of his employment, to make such structure reasonably safe for his own use. In such cases the general rule does not apply in favor of such servant. 1 Shearm. & Redf. Neg. 5th ed. § 195, and cases cited; McGorty v. Southern New England Teleph. Co. 69 Conn. 635. Then, again, this general rule is not ordinarily applicable to cases where the master neither has nor assumes possession, use, or control, legal or actual, of the premises or place where the servant may be at work. The general rule is based upon such possession, use, and control by the master of the premises where he puts his servants at work for him; and, speaking generally, his duty to use due care to make and keep such place reasonably safe flows from, and is measured by, such possession, use, and control. Just as the master's liability for the acts of his servants while engaged in his business is based upon his power to control them, so his duty to provide reasonably safe premises is founded essentially upon his occupation, use, and control of such premises. This being the reason of the rule, when the reason does not exist the rule is inapplicable. If an employer sends his servant to a distant place, by rail, to do a piece of work on the premises of B, it would hardly be contended, in the absence of a special agreement to that effect, that the master would be responsible to the servant for the negligence of the transportation company in failing to carry the servant safely, or for the negligence of B in failing to keep his premises in a reasonably safe condition. In the case supposed, the servant, both while being carried, and while at work on B's premises, is at work for his master, and the railroad car and the premises of B are places where he is directed to and does perform work for his master; and yet the master, as master merely, would be under no duty to use reasonable care to make such places reasonably safe. The law in such cases reads no such duty into the contract of hiring. If the master assumes possession and control of the premises of B. with his consent, even temporarily, for the purpose of doing the work there, the result might be different. Such a case might be, under certain circumstances, within the reason of the rule. Ordinarily, however, we think the law reads such a duty on the part of the master towards the servant into the contract of hiring only with reference to premises used, occupied, or controlled by the master. If this were not so, the duty and liability of the master would be very burdensome. He would be, in effect, frequently made responsible for the negligence of third parties with reference to premises he had never seen, and about the condition of which he knew, and perhaps could know, nothing. The merchant would, in effect, be liable to his clerk for the negligence of the customer with respect to the safety of the premises upon which the clerk goes to deliver his master's goods, and the master, plumber, or carpenter to his workman for the negligence of the householder upon whose premises he sends the workman simply to make some slight repairs. In all such cases the servant, if injured, without fault on his part, by the negligent failure of the owner or occupier of the premises to keep them in a reasonably safe condition, has his remedy against such owner or occupier, and, in the absence of some agreement to that effect, has none against the master. We think the case at bar, upon a proper construction of the finding, falls within this class of cases. Unless it was the duty of the defendant to furnish the staging in question, the judgment in this case cannot be supported. Such a duty could rest upon the defendant only upon two grounds: (1) Because it had specially assumed it in this case; or (2) because the law imposed it upon the defendant as master. We think the facts found fail to show either that the defendant specially assumed, or that the law imposed, any such duty. If the defendant specially assumed any such duty, that was a fact to be found by the trial court, either expressly or by necessary implication. It is not found expressly, nor by necessary implication. The question on this part of the case is whether, if no such duty rested upon the defendant by law, the facts found warrant the conclusion, as matter of law, that it assumed such a duty. The strongest thing in the finding in favor of such a conclusion is the fact that the defendant assured the plaintiff that the staging would be entirely safe; but this fact, taken either alone or with the other facts found, clearly does not warrant any such conclusion as matter of law. The assurance was given at the very time that the defendant told the plaintiff about the strong staging that had been already erected and in use in the building, and at the very time when plaintiff was informed that Caulfield, and not the defendant, was to see to the staging. What the defendant said to the plaintiff, as detailed in the finding, falls far short of an agreement to be responsible for the staging already built, or to be built, by Caulfield or his servants. The most that can be said about the finding upon this point is that it contains evidential facts tending to prove such an agreement, but such facts do not, as matter of law, constitute such an agreement. Taking the finding as a whole, it is quite clear that it does not show that the defendant specially assumed the duty in question. In justice to the trial court, we ought to say that its decision is not based upon the ground that the defendant specially assumed any such duty, but upon the ground that such duty was imposed by law upon the defendant, as master, under the circumstances; and the remaining question is whether this is so.

The facts clearly show that Caulfield was, before and at the time the plaintiff went to work in the building, in the exclusive occupation and control of the building and premises and staging, and so remained till after the plaintiff's injury. The building was in New Britain. The defendant's place of business was in Hartford, where plaintiff worked for the defendant. The agreement between the defendant and Caulfield was, in effect, that the defendant should furnish a skilled workman to place the ornament, and Caulfield would furnish staging and all else. The plaintiff was not informed of the details of this agreement, but this is of no importance on this part of the case. It was important as evidence bearing upon the question whether the defendant specially assumed the duty to furnish staging, but not upon the question whether the law imposed the duty upon the defendant as master. The defendant sent the plaintiff from Hartford to this church building in New Britain to perform this work. The defendant had never been in possession or control of the premises, even temporarily, up to the time the plaintiff went there. It never was, upon the facts found, in possession or control of these premises at all, in any such sense as to make it responsible to its servants for their safety. The case, then, as disclosed by the record, is simply the ordinary one where a master, without more, sends his servant to work upon the premises of B, at B's request. In such case, in the absence of agreement to that effect, the law does not impose on the master the duty of caring for the safety of the servant upon B's premises.

There is error in the judgment complained of, and the cause is remanded for the assessment of nominal damages.

2. An administrator de bonis non has the right, even at common law, to receive intestate property which still exist, in specie, unchanged and unconverted, in the hands of a third person, who has no legal right to it, even if he has received it from an executor whose accounts have been settled and approved.

4. A court of probate has incidental power to construe wills for the purpose of deciding whether a claim under them is made in good faith and is or is not prima facie utterly without any foundation in law or in fact, so far as this is necessary to determine the existence of the conditions for the exercise of its power to appoint administrators de bonis non.

A PPEAL by Adeline L. Snow and Mary E. Snow from a judgment of the Superior Court for Tolland County reversing a judgment of the Probate Court which refused to appoint administrators de bonis non for the estates of Elijah S. Chapman and Eunice Chapman, deceased. Affirmed.

The facts sufficiently appear in the opinion.

Messrs. Lewis Sperry and Charles Phelps, for appellants:

Not only is no further administration needed, but the appointment of an administrator de bonis non would avail nothing, because, upon the facts as they appear of record, the administrator could have no jurisdiction in the premises.

When it appears that substantially all of the outstanding debts have been paid by the parties entitled to the fund, under the terms of the decedent's will, the appointment of an administrator to close up the estate is improper as involving unnecessary expense.

Catlin v. Huestis, 11 Ohio C. C. 120.

Expressions have been sometimes used which would seem to indicate that this court has heretofore held that a bequest of a life estate, with remainder over to the heirs of the life tenant, is void as contravening the statute of perpetuities.

In the case at bar both wills had run their course. The property had already vested in the heirs, subject, however, of being divested by the right of Eunice Chapman to expend the principal. This is not an action upon the construction of a will. There is nothing uncertain or indefinite regarding the terms of either will. The heirs are now and have always been the children of Elijah and Eunice Chapman, and the sisters of Doremus D. Chapman. The property has never been in danger of being carried beyond the line drawn by the statute of perpetuities. No danger other than that of a mere naked possibility ever threatened the property given by the will. Both wills have been approved by the probate court and have remained on file for a term of years; in their provisions the parties interested have acquiesced.

In St. John v. Dann, 66 Conn. 404, the court held the provisions of the will valid, although recognizing the possibility of their contravening the statute of perpetuities.

Messrs. William Waldo Hyde and Joel H. Reed for appellee.

Torrance, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In 1879, Mr. Chapman died, leaving a will, in which he gave the life use of all his property to his wife, and at her death he gave it to such person or persons as she by her will should appoint. In 1880, the executor under this will rendered his final administration account, which was accepted and allowed. In 1884, Eunice, the wife of Mr. Chapman, died, leaving a will in which she appointed Gelon W. West as the person to receive all the estate of her husband in her possession at her decease, and also gave to him the entire residue of her own estate, in trust to pay the rents and profits of the entire property to her son, Doremus, during his life, and at his decease to distribute the trust property to those persons who should then be his natural heirs at law. In November, 1889, West, the trustee and executor under the will of Eunice, filed his accounts as trustee and as executor, which were duly allowed and accepted. He then had in his possession something over $15,000 belonging to the trust fund, consisting of both real and personal estate. He resigned his office of trustee, and Mr. Paulk was appointed his successor in that office. West died in 1890. Paulk has acted as trustee under the will of Eunice since his appointment. In December, 1896, Doremus died, leaving a will, in which he left all his property to his widow. The executor under that will claimed that the trust property in Paulk's hands at the death of Doremus was intestate property belonging to the estates of Elijah and Eunice, in which he had an interest, and that an administrator de bonis non upon each estate should be appointed, in order that said claim might be tried and determined. The superior court took the executor's view of this matter, and the principal question here is whether it erred in so doing.

The claim that the property in Paulk's hands is intestate property is based upon the assumption that the gift over to the heirs of Doremus, in his mother's will, is void. The appellant's claim, in substance, (1) that, even on the assumption that the property in Paulk's hands is intestate estate, it would not be assets in the hands of an administrator de bonis non, because it has been already fully administered, and consequently such an administrator ought not to be appointed, for he would have nothing whatever to do; (2) that the question whether the property is or is not intestate estate was not properly before the lower court, and could not be determined by it; (3) that, if such question was before it for determination, it should have held the gift over to be valid, and not void.

The first claim is not tenable. It is based mainly upon rules of the common law which were never adopted in this state, or have been changed or modified by statute, or have little or no application in these cases. At common law "executors and administrators took the legal title to the goods and chattels of the deceased; nor were they, before the statute of distribution (22 & 23 Car. II. (1670)) bound to distribute the surplus after the payment of debts and legacies. Both held in autre droit; and therefore neither could dispose by will of the property remaining in specie; but both had the power, while living, of changing, altering, and converting the property; and whatever was thus altered or converted became their own goods, and descended on their deaths to their own representatives. Such change or conversion of the goods was (so far as regards the administrator de bonis non) a complete administration, and put them as effectually beyond the reach of his commission as if they had never belonged to the testator or intestate." Coleman v. M'Murdo, 5 Rand. (Va.) 51; Potts, Wollerton, v. Smith, 8 Rawle, 361, 24 Am. Dec. 359; Beall v. New Mexico, 16 Wall. 535, 21 L. ed. 292, and cases cited in note in 24 Am. Dec. 379. A somewhat technical meaning was thus given to the word "administered," so far as regarded the administrator de bonis non. As to him, goods, chattels, or credits of the decedent, changed, altered, or converted by the executor or administrator, were "administered." The administrator de bonis non succeeded only to goods, chattels, and credits of the decedent which had not been administered; and goods, chattels, and credits "not administered" meant goods, chattels, and credits which had been the property of the decedent at his death, and remained in specie, unchanged and unconverted, when the administrator de bonis non was appointed. Thus, money received by the former executor or administrator in his representative capacity, and kept by itself separate from his own money, is regarded as "not administered;" but, if mixed and mingled with his own money, so that its identity is gone, it is regarded as converted, and so "administered" so far as the administrator de bonis non is concerned. Beall v. New Mexico, 16 Wall. 535, 21 L. ed. 292; Marvel v. Babbitt, 143 Mass. 226. The administrator de bonis non was regarded as taking the specific property of the decedent as his immediate successor, and not as succeeding to a prior executor or administrator; hence there was said to be no priority between them. Suits brought by or against the predecessor could not, as a rule, be prosecuted by or against his successor, and judgments obtained by or against the predecessor were not available in favor of or against the successor. Alsop v. Mather, 8 Conn. 584, 21 Am. Dec. 708; American Bd. of Comrs. for Foreign Missions' Appeal, 27 Conn. 844.

These rules of the common law have been changed or modified to some extent in many, if not most, of the states, including our own. The rule that an executor or an administrator was entitled to the surplus of the personal estate after the payment of debts was never adopted in this state. Bacon v. Fairman, 6 Conn. 121-129. They are regarded here as mere agents or trustees for those beneficially entitled to the property as creditors, legatees, heirs, or distributees. Woodhouse v. Phelps, 51 Conn. 521-523; Robbins v. Coffing, 52 Conn. 118, 143; Wilmerding v. Russ, 38 Conn. 67. And it is now made a crime for any executor or administrator to "wrongfully appropriate and convert to his own use the money, funds, or property" of the estate. Gen. Stat. § 1579. At the very beginning of this century it was by statute made the duty of an administrator de bonis non "to ask for, demand, and receive" of his predecessor, "his heirs or administrators, all the goods and effects of the deceased, and also all the books of accounts, bonds, notes, or other securities, documents, or papers whatsoever, touching the estate, which may be needed in the settlement thereof;" and it was further then provided that all actions at law or in equity, pending against such predecessor when he went out of office, should survive, and might be prosecuted by or against his successor. Revision 1808, p. 271. These provisions, in substance, have been law ever since, and other changes in the same direction have been made from time to time, as shown by the General Statutes. An executor of an executor is no longer, as at common law, entitled to administer the estate of the first testator. Gen. Stat. § 553. When a will disposes of only a part of the estate, the executor or administrator with the will annexed is ex officio the administrator of the intestate estate. Id. § 564. When an executor or administrator dies before completing or accounting for his trust, his personal representative must settle the account in the court of probate, and pay the amount found due to the successor. Id. § 617. Courts of probate, after the removal of an executor or administrator and the appointment of his successor, may enforce the delivery of property, held by the former, to the latter "in the same manner as a court of equity might do." Id. § 612. Under § 445, an executor or administrator paying money or delivering property pursuant to the order of a court of probate having jurisdiction is protected from personal liability, even if the order is subsequently set aside, but the property so delivered or money paid may be recovered, "by the person entitled, from any person receiving or in possession of the same." These and other statutory changes, which it is unnecessary to refer to, have modified the doctrines of the common law with reference to the rights and duties of an administrator de bonis non. Under the changes thus made in our law, this court, in Pinney v. Barnes, 17 Conn. 420, held that money of the estate in the hands of an executor removed from office,

"no matter from what source received, nor for whom ultimately destined," belonged to the administrator de bonis non, and that he was the proper party to institute proceedings to recover the same against his predecessor in office. In Mansfield v. Lynch, 59 Conn. 320, 12 L. R. A. 285, it was held that, where an executor had paid over money of the estate by mistake to a creditor, the administrator de bonis non could sue for and recover from the creditor the money so paid. In that case the money so paid by the executor wrongfully or mistakenly was an asset of the estate which had been "administered" by him, within the technical common-law meaning of that word; but this fact was not allowed to defeat the right of the administrator to sue for and recover it.

If, then, the property here in question is intestate estate, and has already been "administered," within the common-law meaning of that term, so that under the rules of that law an administrator de bonis non could not claim it, nor administer it, still we think that under our law such an administrator would be entitled to claim and recover and administer it. It does not appear to be wanted to pay debts, but, if it be intestate property, it is wanted for distribution, and administration is never complete until the assets of the estate have been turned over to those rightfully entitled to them. But, even if the strict rules of the common law are to govern in this matter, we think, on the facts found, that the administrator de bonis non would be entitled to recover, hold, and administer this property if intestate. It is found that the property in Paulk's hands is substantially the same identical property which belonged to Elijah and to Eunice Chapman. It still exists in specie, unchanged and unconverted, so far as appears, in the hands of a third person, who, if it be intestate property, has no legal right to it. Under these circumstances, it would, even under the rules of the common law, go to the administrator de bonis non. Beall v. New Mexico, 16 Wall. 535, 21 L. ed. 292. In either view of this matter, then, if the property is in fact intestate, we think the administrator de bonis non of the estates of Elijah and Eunice Chapman is entitled to recover, hold, and administer it as assets of those estates. Indeed, he is the only person who can properly do so. Pinney v. Barnes, 17 Conn. 420. The appellants say that the distributees of Elijah and Eunice can sue for and recover it, and divide it among themselves, all the debts having been paid. But who are the distributees? That question must be settled by the court of probate, and, in order that it may do so, "it is plainly essential that such an estate [an intestate estate] should be pending for settlement in said court, in the orderly and prescribed way." Connecticut Trust & S. D. Co. v. Security Co. 67 Conn. 438, 442. And, to secure this essential in the cases at bar, the executor of both estates being dead, and no successor ever having been appointed, it is necessary that an administrator de bonis non upon each estate should be appointed. The claim of the appellants that Paulk was appointed as the successor of West in the administration and was now administrator, is not borne out by the finding, and need not be further considered.

The other two grounds of error claimed may be considered together. They are briefly, first, that the court below erred in construing the wills at all; and second, that it erred in holding that the gift over in Eunice's will was void. The power to determine directly and conclusively the construction to be given to wills is not committed to the court of probate, nor to the superior court sitting as an appellate court of probate. Such a power involves the right, to try and finally determine disputed titles to property, real and personal, and this is not given to those courts. Hewitt's Appeal, 53 Conn. 24; Mallory's Appeal, 62 Conn. 218; Cone's Appeal, 68 Conn. 84. But, though the court of probate cannot directly try and finally determine questions of title to personal property, it has the power to pass upon them incidentally and indirectly, and for some specific purpose, whenever such an incidental power is necessary to the exercise of a jurisdiction confessedly conferred upon it. Thus it has been held that, although it is not competent for the court of probate to determine directly the amount or validity of creditors' claims it had power, in its settlement of the administration account, to decide on the validity of the claims of creditors paid by the administrator or executor, so far as it respects the allowance of such payments in his account (Edmond v. Canfield, 8 Conn. 87); and that it had the incidental power to determine who the heirs are "for the particular purpose of completing the settlement of the estate, and in order that the executor may be protected" (Davenport v. Richards, 16 Conn. 310, 319). The court of probate has the exclusive power to appoint executors and administrators, under conditions prescribed by law; and in determining in a given case whether it will exercise that power, it must possess the incidental power to decide, subject to review on appeal, whether the conditions for the exercise of its power to appoint exist; and this may include, in cases like the present, the power to construe wills, for the purpose of deciding whether the claim made under them is made in good faith, and whether it is or is not prima facie, utterly without any foundation in law or in fact.

In the cases at bar, the executor of Doremus claimed before the probate court that the property in question here was intestate estate because the gift over in the will of Eunice Chapman was void; that, if that were so, part of said property belonged to him as the representative of Doremus; that the executor upon both estates was dead, and no one had been appointed in his stead; and that he desired to have an administrator de bonis non appointed upon each estate, to the end that he might properly prosecute his claim. These claims he also made in the superior court. It was the province and duty of both courts to look at the wills, and to construe them, to the extent and for the purpose of determining whether the claims were made in good faith, and whether they were or were not utterly without foundation in law or in fact. Further than this they were not bound to go. It was not within the province of either court, nor was it its duty, to pass finally upon the validity of the executor's claim that the gift over was void, nor did the superior court, we think, attempt to do this. In Woodhouse v. Phelps, 51 Conn. 521, an administrator de bonis non was appointed, though it turned out that there was nothing for him to do. In State v. Smith, 52 Conn. 557, such an administrator was appointed, although it turned out that there was no property belonging to the estate. In Connecticut Trust & S. D. Co. v. Security Co. 67 Conn. 488, such an administrator was appointed, although it was claimed that the property sought to be recovered through him had never vested in his decedent. In these and cases like them it is not the duty of the court of probate, when asked to appoint an administrator de bonis non, to pass upon the legal validity of the claims sought to be made available through such an appointment. Mallory's Appeal, 62 Conn. 218. It is enough that the claim is made in good faith, and appears to have some foundation in fact or in law. If the claim of the executor was made in good faith, and did not prima facie appear to be utterly without reason or foundation in fact or in law, and if the appointments might avail the executor, then we think that, upon the other facts found, it was the duty of the probate court to make them.

Messrs. S. T. Thomas and A. B. Duvall, for defendant in error:

The joint resolution of Congress, approved February 26, 1892, authorizes the Commissioners to make and enforce all such reasonable and usual police regulations in addition to those already made under act of January 26, 1887, as they may deem necessary for the protection of lives and limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the District of Columbia. Congress intended thereby to increase the powers of the commissioners to the full extent of those frequently, if not generally, intrusted to municipal corporations.

Whether the regulation in question is unreasonable can only be determined by experience.

Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. District of Columbia, 10 App. D. C. 111; Twilley v. Perkins, 77 Md. 260, 19 L. R. A. 684.

Alvey, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case is brought here on writ of error from the police court of this district, and presents the question of the right to ride bicycles of a certain structure on the streets of the city of Washington, in violation of the terms of police regulation No. 80.

The defendant, Frederick W. Moore, the plaintiff in error, was charged by information in the court below, with having, on the 8th day of January, 1896, on Sixth street, in the city of Washington, ridden a certain bicycle, "with the lower end of the handle bars on a plane lower than 4 inches below the top of the saddle at its center, contrary to and in violation of the police regulations of the District of Columbia." The defendant pleaded not guilty, and was tried and convicted, and was sentenced to pay a fine of $5, and in default thereof to stand committed to the workhouse for fifteen days.

The commissioners of this district are authorized by the act of Congress of January 26, 1887, to make and enforce usual and reasonable police regulations, and, among other things, "to regulate the movements of vehicles on the public streets and avenues, for the preservation of order and protection of life and limb," and, in addition to this provision, the commissioners, by joint resolution of Congress of February 26, 1892, "are authorized and empowered to make and enforce all such reasonable and usual police regulations as they may deem necessary for the protection of lives, limbs, health, comfort, and quiet of all persons, and the protection of all property within the District of Columbia."

It was in pursuance of the power thus delegated that the commissioners of the District made and published, among others, the following regulation relating to the use of bicycles on the streets and avenues of the city, and which regulation was in force at the time of the commission of the offense charged.

Article X., § 30, as amended, provides that "every bicycle on a public highway shall at all times be under the control of the rider. And inasmuch as safety in passing with rapidly moving vehicles requires that the riders or drivers approaching each other shall be able to judge of the probable movement of the approaching vehicle, no cycle shall be ridden on the streets within the city limits with the lower end of the handlebar on a plane lower than 4 inches below the top of the saddle at its centre, and the rider shall at all times keep his head in such a position as to command a view ahead of not less than 800 feet. But this provision shall not be applicable to members of the bicycle squad of the police force."

At the trial it was proved, in support of the prosecution, and the facts as proved were admitted to be true, that on the 8th day of January, 1898, the defendant was riding on a bicycle on one of the streets of the city, and that the lower end of the handlebars on said bicycle were on a plane lower than 4 inches, to wit, between 7 and 8 inches below the top of the saddle at its center; that the defendant was in all other respects complying with the provisions of § 30 of the police regulations. And, this being all the evidence offered in chief, the prosecuting attorney rested the case.

The defendant then proved by quite a number of witnesses, many of whom were expert bicycle riders, that the effect of enforcing the regulation would be to deprive the defendant and many others of the use of their private property, by preventing the use of their bicycles, constructed as that belonging to the defendant; and that said regulation was unusual and unreasonable, and that it was unnecessary, unjust, and oppressive. The prosecution then produced evidence in rebuttal by quite a number of witnesses, to show the contrary of the facts proved on the part of the defendant.

Upon the evidence thus produced, and upon the whole case, the defendant asked the court to rule, as matter of law, that the portion of the 30th section of the police regulations hereinbefore quoted, relating to bicycles, requiring the lower end of the handle bars on such vehicles to be on a plane not lower than 4 inches below the top of the saddle at its centre, (1) is unconstitutional and void; (2) that the commissioners had no power to enact any such regulation; (3) that, even if the commissioners had the general power to enact a regulation upon the subject, that said portion of said regulation here involved is unreasonable, unjust, and oppressive, and deprives the defendant of the use and enjoyment of his property. But the court refused to make any of the rulings as requested; and ruled that the portion of the regulation here in question was constitutional and valid; that the commissioners had power to make the regulation; and that the regulation on its face was usual, reasonable, and valid; and thereupon convicted the defendant. From which rulings the defendant excepted.

The several rulings were assigned as error at the hearing in this court.

With respect to the question of the unconstitutionality of the regulation attempted to be enforced, we are clearly of the opinion that there is no foundation for that objection. The power of Congress over this District is plenary; and the power delegated to the commissioners by the act of 1887, and the joint resolution of 1892, is sufficiently comprehensive to embrace the power to make and enforce the regulation complained of by the defendant. The limitations or restrictions imposed by the acts of Congress upon the exercise of the power are only that the regulations made in pursuance thereof shall be both reasonable and usual in their character and manner of enforcement. If it be shown and determined that the regulations, or any material parts thereof, are unusual or unreasonable, they would be inoperative and void, to the extent that they are so unusual or unreasonable, because, in such case they would not be within the power delegated by Congress. For it is a settled principle that municipal ordinances or regulations cannot enlarge or change the legislative grant of power to the municipal agency.

And even without respect to the special limitations or restrictions imposed by the acts of Congress, and in the absence of express delegations of authority, all by-laws, ordinances, and police regulations of municipal corporations must be reasonable, and not inconsistent with any statute of the legislature, nor with the general principles of the common law that prevails in the state or district, particularly those having relation to the liberty of the citizen or the right of private property. Nor must any ordinance or regulation be unnecessarily oppressive to the citizen; nor can an ordinance or regulation be legally made and enforced which contravenes a common right, unless the power to do so be plainly conferred by legislative grant. 1 Dill. Mun. Corp. §§ 819, 820, 825; Yick Wo v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 556, 371, 80 L. ed. 220, 226.

But the municipal government usually possesses the power, either by express grant, as in the present case, or by virtue of their general authority, to make by-laws and ordinances relating to the public safety and good order of the inhabitants; to regulate the rate of speed of the travel of vehicles in the public streets; the route or street over which omnibuses, stage coaches, drays, etc., may run; the time of day in which the streets may be used for certain purposes; to interdict stoppages in the streets to the delay of others; to exclude vehicles of all kinds from entering upon or passing over the sidewalks, etc. And it has been decided in many cases that bicycles and tricycles are vehicles within the meaning of that term, and are subject to municipal regulation as are other vehicles that travel upon the streets. Twilley v. Perkins, 77 Md. 260. 19

L. R. A. 634; State v. Yopp, 97 N.C. 477; Taylor v. Goodwin, L. R. 4 Q. B. Div. 228. The public safety and convenience may require regulations of this character, but they must not, unless made by virtue of specific authority, be unreasonable, or improperly in restraint of trade, or of the exercise of personal rights, or of the lawful use of private property. Com. v. Stodder, 2 Cush. 562, 48 Am. Dec. 679; Com. v. Robertson, 5 Cush. 488.

But in a case such as the present, the question whether the regulation is reasonable or unreasonable and oppressive to the citizen, in the exercise of his rights and in the use of his private property, is more or less a question of fact. The bicycle is a vehicle of comparatively recent use upon the streets, and is of various construction. Its safe use upon the streets may depend greatly upon the expertness of the rider, as well as upon the construction of the vehicle itself. If the vehicle, such as that of which the defendant is accused of riding on the streets, is ordinarily safe to persons traveling the streets, when used by a person of ordinary care and skill in riding, then there would seem to be no reasonable necessity for excluding the use of such vehicle on the streets; and the regulation by which such vehicle is excluded from the streets may be said to be unreasonable, and to operate to deprive the defendant of the lawful use of his property. But, on the other hand, if the ordinary and reasonably careful use of the vehicle on the streets in any manner tends to endanger and annoy the traveling public on the streets, and this by reason of the non-conformity in the construction of the vehicle to the requirement of the regulation, then the regulation is reasonable and proper, as applied in restraint of the use of the vehicle on the streets.

The regulation is required to be reasonable and usual; and it was competent to the defendant to show that, in its application to his vehicle, it is both unusual and unreasonable, and therefore unnecessary to effect the purposes contemplated by the acts of Congress under which the regulation was made. He introduced evidence for this purpose, but that evidence appears not to have been considered by the court below, in holding the regulation to be reasonable and valid on its face, without regard to extrinsic facts. In this we think the court erred. The court should have considered the facts as proved, in connection with the regulation.

In holding that the regulation "on its face was usual, reasonable, and valid," the court, of course, excluded all consideration of the evidence introduced by both the defendant and prosecution. But, as we have said, it was the right of the defendant to show, if he could, by introducing extrinsic evidence, that the regulation was both unusual and unreasonable as applied to his vehicle, and this could only be done by the practical test of experience of those capable of making an ordinary skillful use of the particular vehicle, or vehicles constructed on the same plan and model—by showing that the ordinary use of such vehicles was reasonably safe to the streets and traveling public thereon. The onus of thus showing rests, of course, upon the defendant.

"What is reasonable," says Dillon (Mun. Corp. vol. 1, § 338), "depends upon the nature of the offense [charged] and the circumstances." Of course, the circumstances must be shown and considered. The question of the right to introduce extrinsic evidence to show that the ordinance or regulation sought to be enforced was unreasonable, arbitrary, and oppressive in its operation, is fully illustrated by the cases of Yick Wo and Wo Lee v. Hopkins, 118 U. S. 856, 30 L. ed. 220. In those cases, extrinsic evidence of the application of the ordinances and the manner of their execution was admitted; and the court, in referring to the aid derived from the extrinsic evidence, said: "In the present cases we are not obliged to reason from the probable to the actual, and pass upon the validity of the ordinances complained of, as tried merely by the opportunities which their terms afford, of unequal and unjust discrimination in their administration. For the cases present the ordinances in actual operation and the facts shown establish an administration directed so exclusively against a particular class of persons as to warrant and require the conclusion that, whatever may have been the intent of the ordinances as adopted, they are applied by the public authorities charged with their administration, and thus representing the state itself, with a mind so unequal and oppressive as to amount to a practical denial by the state of that equal protection of the laws which is secured to the petitioners, as to all other persons, by the broad and benign provisions of the 14th Amendment to the Constitution of the United States." Page 373, 30 L. ed. 227. See also the case of Baltimore & O. R. Co. v. District of Columbia, 10 App. D. C. 111.

By the act of Congress of March 2, 1897, providing for writs of error from this court to the police court of this district, this court has no power to review and decide upon the facts of the case. Its power is of a special nature, and that is to review questions of law that have been presented to and decided or refused to be decided, by the court below and certified to this court by bill of exception. The question of fact, as presented to the court below, as to whether the facts on proof were sufficient to show that the regulation in question was reasonable or unreasonable, is a question, on the proof in the case, that this court is without authority to decide the one way or the other. But where, as in this case, the court erroneously rules upon the construction and application of the regulation in question, upon its face alone, and without regard to the facts in proof, there is such error in law as requires this court to reverse the judgment and to remand the cause that a new trial may be had.

The judgment below is therefore reversed, and a new trial awarded; and it is so ordered.

GEORGIA SUPREME COURT.

Charles MARSHALL, by Next Friend, Pff.
in Err.,
v.

MACON SASH, DOOR, & LUMBER COMPANY.

(.....Ga.....)

*A child has no right of action for the homicide of its stepfather.

(March 24, 1893.)

ERROR to the Macon City Court to review a judgment in favor of defendant in an action brought to recover damages for the alleged negligent killing of plaintiff's stepfather. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. Marion W. Harris for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. Dessan, Bartlett, & Harris for defendant in error.

Lewis, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The question made in this case arose as follows: Suit was brought by three minor children, by their next friend, to recover damages from the defendant company by reason of its negligence, whereby Jim Price, the stepfather of the plaintiffs, was killed. It is alleged that plaintiffs are the only heirs of Price, he having left no widow and no other children, and that he married their mother eight years prior to his death; and, from the time of said marriage to the day of his death, he maintained and supported plaintiffs as his children, rearing them in his own home, feeding, clothing, and schooling them, and exercising over them complete parental control, by consent of their mother and of themselves; and that such relation continued up to date of his death, up to which time he not only contributed to their support, but they were entirely dependent upon him for a livelihood. The action was dismissed on demurrer, on the ground that stepchildren have no right of action for a homicide of a stepfather, under the law of Georgia. To this ruling of the court the plaintiffs excepted.

The plaintiffs base their action upon this provision of the Civil Code: "A widow, or, if no widow, a child or children, may recover for the homicide of the husband or parent; and if suit be brought by the widow or children, and the former or one of the latter dies pending the action, the same shall survive in the first case to the children, and in the latter to the surviving child or children. The husband may recover for the homicide of his wife, and if she leaves child or children surviving, said husband and children shall sue jointly, and not separately, with the right to recover the full value of the life of the deceased, as shown by the evidence, and with the right of survivorship as to said suit if either die pending the action. A mother, or, if no mother, a father, may recover for the homicide of a child minor or sui juris, upon whom she or he is dependent, or who contributes to his or her support, unless said child leave a wife, husband, or child. Said mother or father shall be entitled to recover the full value of the life of said child." § 8828. The clear meaning of these words in the first sentence quoted is that a widow may recover for the homicide of her husband, and, if no widow, a child or children may recover for the homicide of the father. It is contended in this case that the stepfather stands in loco parentis as to his stepchildren, and that the latter may recover damages for the negligent homicide of the former. Our attention has been called to no authority in which it has ever been decided that the word "parent," either in the legal or ordinary acceptance of that term, includes a stepfather or stepmother. It is true that cases have arisen in which it has been held for some purposes that the stepfather may stand in loco parentis as to the children of his deceased wife. For instance, where he assumes the care and custody of his infant stepchildren, so long as he maintains them as members of his family under the parental roof, the law would give him the right to control and govern them as he would his own children; and he would also have the right to protect them against wrong and injury. But it would not follow from this, either that he was under any legal obligation to maintain and support them, or that the children would have any legal interest in his life. Plaintiff in error cites several authorities, and among them the case of Holloway v. Holloway, 86 Ga. 576, 11 L. R. A. 518, where it was held that one who undertakes to care for stepchildren is the head of a family, and, as such, is entitled to a homestead. This right grows out of the statute which gives to each head of a family the right to a homestead, and does not confine the right simply to the parent of minor children. One who assumes the care and support of an infant brother left fatherless and motherless by the death of its parents stands in some respects in loco parentis as to such infant; but it certainly cannot be urged that on this account the minor would have a right of action for the homicide of the older brother, under the provisions of § 8828 of the Civil Code. The word "parent" is used in the statute for the manifest reason that the child or children might, under certain circumstances, recover either for the homicide of the mother or the father. In the event of no widow, the statute gave them a right of action for the homicide of their father. In the event of the homicide of the mother, the statute gave them a joint right of action with the husband. The right of action provided for in the above Code section did not exist at common law. This statute is therefore in derogation of the common law, and applying to it the universal rule of strict construction, we cannot see how there is any escape from the conclusion that the legislature never contemplated giving a child any right of action for the homicide of a step-parent.

Judgment affirmed.

All the Justices concur.

INDIANA SUPREME COURT.

STATE of Indiana, ex rel. John A. BURGHS, Appl.,

v.

John C. WEBSTER et al.

(.....Ind.....)

1. One already practising medicine by virtue of a license issued under the old law is not entitled to a new certificate and license, as a matter of course, under the law of March 8, 1897, but the board of registration and examination can inquire whether his former license was rightfully obtained, and also whether he is a fit person to practise medicine.
2. The requirement that all physicians shall obtain a new certificate and license under the act of March 8, 1897, although they had been previously practising medicine and held a license under the old law, and that the validity of the old license, and the fitness of the applicant, might be examined by the medical board, is a valid exercise of the police power of the state.

APPEAL by relator from a judgment of the Superior Court for Marion County refusing a writ of mandamus to require defendants to issue to him a certificate entitling him to practise medicine. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Elliott & Elliott and Noel & Laehr, for appellant:

If the statute is to be construed as giving power to take away vested rights without notice, or by retroactive provisions, or as conferring upon officers belonging to the administrative or ministerial department of government, judicial powers, or as delegating to officers belonging to such department legislative functions, then the whole act is void, because the provisions are not distinct and separate, and hence the whole act must fall.

The notice given by law of the meetings of the board simply brought one desiring a certificate from it before it for the purpose of submitting the statutory evidence prescribed by the statute. He was not before the board for any other purpose.

Where individual rights are involved, notice to the individual as to such individual rights is necessary, and a general notice of the time and place of meeting of a board does not bring him before the board to respond to or controvert charges against his character.

Kunts v. Sumption, 117 Ind. 1, 2 L. R. A. 655.

The fact that the statute empowers an officer or board to decide preliminary questions does not make the duties of such officer judicial or discretionary. If the principal question is to be decided upon "specified evidence," or "upon a given state of facts," mandamus will lie.

If this be true of a privilege, which it has not been attempted to regulate by statute—the privilege to practise law—and if the courts possess the inherent power to prescribe reasonable rules for the admission of persons desiring to practise, is there any reason why a quasi-judicial body created for the purpose of examining into the character and qualifications of applicants for the privilege of practising medicine may not possess the power which it is expressly given?

The right to regulate the practice of medicine stands upon a higher ground even than the right to license the practice of law. The regulation of the law is one which, at the best, can concern only property rights, and does not come as clearly as does the practice of medicine within the police power of the state.

Howard, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This was an action brought by the relator, in the name of the state, for a writ of mandate, to require the appellees, who constitute the state board of medical registration and examination, to issue to him a certificate entitling him to a license to practice medicine, under the provisions of an act of the general assembly regulating the practice of medicine, and for other purposes, approved March 8, 1897. Acts 1897, p. 255; Horner's Rev. Stat. 1897, § 5352a, and following sections. On the issue of an alternative writ as prayed for, the appellees made return, and to this return the relator filed his demurrer. A supplemental return was also made to the alternative writ, to which exceptions were filed. A demurrer was also filed to the return as a whole, including the supplemental return. Both demurrers were overruled, as were also the exceptions to the supplemental return. Judgment was then entered, that the relator take nothing by his action.

In his complaint the relator recites that he has been practising medicine in Indiana continuously since September 19, 1896, under a license regularly issued on that day by the clerk of the Marion circuit court, according to the law regulating the practice of medicine in force prior to the act of 1897. Acts 1885, p. 197; Burns's Rev. Stat. 1894, §§ 7818 et seq. In his complaint he also sets out his application and affidavit for a certificate to practise medicine under the new law, showing that he was a graduate, in 1893, of the American Electric Medical College of Cincinnati, and in 1897 of the American Medical College of Indianapolis. He also exhibits an affidavit filed with the board to the effect that he has not been guilty of felony or gross immorality, and is not addicted to the liquor or drug habit, and that his general reputation for moral character is good. He also recites a tender to the board of $1 as a license fee, as provided in the act, and says that he has repeatedly demanded a certificate, and that the board has refused to issue him one; and he prays an alternative writ of mandate, requiring the defendants to issue him a certificate entitling him to a license to practise medicine. The appellees, in their return, set up, in brief, that they have been delayed in acting upon relator's application, by reason of the great amount of work required for the satisfactory discharge of their duties; that they have been notified verbally that charges would be filed against the relator, and for that reason have postponed action upon his case, which is still pending. In the supplement to the original return, filed a day or two thereafter, it is averred that on October 19, 1897, written charges were filed with the board in the matter of the application of John A. Burroughs for a certificate entitling him to be licensed to practise medicine, charging that the licenses received by him on September 19, 1896, and March 26, 1897, were obtained by misrepresentation as to the character of the colleges upon whose diplomas the licenses were granted, and that he has been and is guilty of gross immorality in seeking and obtaining medical practise by false and fraudulent representations as to his ability to effect cures, and by falsely and fraudulently guaranteeing cures, and that he is also guilty of gross immorality in circulating indecent and obscene literature through the mails and through the community; and the return further shows that upon the filing of duly verified charges, as shown, the board set a date for the hearing and determination of the charges, and immediately served a copy of the charges, with written notice of the time and place of the hearing set by the board, upon the relator. The provisions of the act of 1897 which affect the questions raised in this case are found in §§ 1, 2, and 5 of the act. Section 1 provides: "That it shall hereafter be unlawful for any person to practise medicine, surgery, or obstetrics in this state without first obtaining a license so to do, as hereinafter provided." In § 2 it is provided that any person desiring to begin the practice of medicine, surgery, or obstetrics shall procure from the state board a certificate that he is entitled to a license. In order to procure such certificate, the applicant shall submit to the board his diploma, with his affidavit setting for the time and under what circumstances it was received, and that he is the person to whom it was issued. His identity as the person to whom the diploma was issued is to be further corroborated by the affidavit of two freeholders. Provision is also made for the examination of any applicant whose diploma is from a college not recognized by the board as maintaining a sufficiently high standard of medical education. Further provision is made in this section for the giving of certificates to persons already engaged in the practice of medicine under former laws. Upon the receipt of the certificate from the board and the presentation of the same to the county clerk, the applicant will be entitled to receive from the clerk the required license. In § 5, among other things, it is provided that the board shall fix a schedule of the minimum requirements which must be complied with by applicants for examination for license, and must also establish rules for the recognition of medical colleges, so as to keep the requirements up to the average standard of medical education in other states. In fixing such rules it is expressly provided that the board shall not "discriminate for or against any school or system of medicine." Provision is also made for refusing certificates in certain cases, and also for revoking licenses when granted.

The relator was in the practice of medicine at the time the law of 1897 took effect, under licenses procured under the act of 1885, supra. Those licenses he filed with the board, as required by § 2 of the act of 1897; and he claims the right to a certificate under the following provisions of said section: "All persons practising medicine, surgery, and obstetrics in the state of Indiana when this law goes into effect, and desiring to continue the same, shall within ninety days thereafter obtain a certificate that they are entitled to do so by presenting to the state board of medical registration and examination the license possessed by them at the time of the passage of this law, together with an affidavit that they are the legal possessors of the same, and the persons mentioned therein; and such applicant shall pay to the board the sum of one dollar ($1) at the time of making such application. The board shall thereupon issue to such applicant a certificate, which, when presented to the county clerk of the proper county, shall entitle the holder to a license to practise medicine, surgery, and obstetrics in the state of Indiana."

If the foregoing provisions were all that were contained in the act in relation to persons already in the practice of medicine at the date of the approval of the law, there is no doubt that the relator would have been entitled to the writ of mandate asked for. The act would then mean that anyone already practising medicine by virtue of a license issued under the old law would be entitled to a certificate and license, to be issued under the new law. The simple fact that a license had been given under the old law would be the only evidence needed to entitle him to a license under the new law. And this is what the relator contends for. But there are provisions in § 5 of the act which materially modify the foregoing provisions of § 2, as follows: "The state board of medical registration and examination shall have the right to review the evidence upon which a license has been obtained, and, if it shall be found that a license has been obtained by fraud or misrepresentation, the board may revoke such license. The board may refuse to grant a certificate to any person guilty of felony or gross immorality, or addicted to the liquor or drug habit to such a degree as to render him unfit to practise medicine or surgery, and may, after notice and hearing, revoke a certificate for like cause. An appeal may be taken from the action of the board." These words certainly authorize the board to do something more than merely inspect the old license before they issue the certificate for a new one. Under those sweeping provisions the old license is merely prima facie evidence of a right to the new one. The board, in effect, is given authority to inquire whether the former license was rightfully obtained; and, even then, if the applicant is an unfit person to practise medicine, by reason of criminal conduct or immoral character or habits, the board may refuse a certificate. Moreover, after the giving of the certificate, provided no license has been issued upon it, the board may after notice and hearing, revoke the same. To protect the applicant from any injustice on the part of the board in so refusing or revoking a certificate, the act provides for an appeal. The tribunal of appeal, though not named in this section, is the circuit or superior court of the proper county,—the county of his residence,—as shown in § 2 of the act. It thus appears, when all the sections of the act, particularly §§ 2 and 5, are read together, as they must be, that the relator's license, issued to him under the act of 1885, did not necessarily entitle him to a certificate from the board, unless the board were also satisfied, upon examination, that such licenses were obtained without fraud or misrepresentation, and besides, that the applicant was morally a fit person to engage in the practice of medicine. As to "any person holding a license under the provisions of this act" (the act of 1897), if he be guilty of any of the acts of immorality or other wrongdoing named in § 5, it is further provided that such license "may be revoked" by the board, upon the finding and judgment of the circuit court. This provision, however, has no application to such a case as that before us, where the relator's license was granted, not under this act, but under a former law. The act of 1897, in effect, revoked such former license, as appears from § 1, above set out; and the new license can be issued in its place only in the manner set forth in the act itself. The board may revoke its own certificate, on notice and hearing, before a license has issued thereunder; but, if the license has actually issued under the new law, then it can be revoked only on the finding and judgment of the court. The appellant is therefore in error in contending that any finding or judgment of a court is necessary to the revoking of a license granted under the old law. Such license, as already said, was revoked by the law itself, in the act of 1897, and remains in force only until the board has acted upon the application for the new license. If the new license is granted, it takes the place of the old one. If it is refused, the applicant has no right to practise medicine, unless on appeal to the court from the action of the board, the board is required to issue a license.

Whether the law is a wise one is not for the courts to say. It may be, as contended, that, as men are free to choose those who shall minister to the needs of the soul, so also should they be free to choose those who shall minister to the ills of the body. It may be that such laws repress independent investigation, and so retard the progress of medical knowledge. It may be that many of the most valuable medical discoveries were made in spite of the prejudice and protest of men learned in the old and time-tested lore of their day. It may be, finally, that such laws are out of harmony with our free institutions, according to which each citizen may pursue his own work, his own studies, his own occupation, in so far as he does not trench on the equal rights of his fellows and the welfare of the community in which he lives. These are, however, questions for the legislature; and, so long as the act is not clearly in violation of any provision of the Constitution, it cannot be held invalid. The legislature has judged that the safety of the public health requires the guards that are placed around the practice of medicine by this law; and, notwithstanding the questions made by counsel, we are unable to see that the act is not a valid exercise of the police power of the state. Had the board refused to act on the application of the relator, he could undoubtedly have compelled action. But the petition for mandate is not to compel the board to act on his application, but to compel it to grant him certificate for a license. This, under the act, as we have seen, he cannot compel the board to do. The board must act after investigation, and then grant or refuse the application, as may be found right. In case of refusal, the statute grants the right of appeal. The relator has therefore no cause to complain.

We do not understand what failure as to notice is shown in the statute. The statute itself is notice that the legislature has set aside the old licenses, and given a reasonable time in which to apply for new licenses in their place. The applicant for a new license has presented himself before the board, and, of course, must be held to have notice of whatever disposition the board may make of his application. In case he is granted a certificate, and the board sees fit to revoke it before he has procured his license, notice and a hearing are provided for. And, if he actually receives his license, it cannot be revoked until a formal action is had in court, including the filing of a verified charge against him, by way of complaint, followed by summons, finding, and judgment. There is no failure of notice. Indeed, the statute of 1897 is a much more guarded and limited exercise of the police power in regard to the licensing of physicians than many that have been upheld by the courts as valid and constitutional. As said by counsel for appellees: "Statutes similar to the one under consideration, denying to all physicians in the state, lawfully engaged in practice, the right to continue such practice, until they conform to the requirements of the statute, and restricting the practice of medicine to persons who are able to demonstrate their qualifications, have been held constitutional, as a proper exercise of the police power of the state in nearly every state of the Union and in the Supreme Court of the United States. *Eastman v. It has been held that the state may regulate the trade of plumbing, and limit the privilege by examinations (Singer v. State, 72 Md. 464, 8 L. R. A. 551; People, Nechameus, v. Warden of City Prison, 144 N. Y. 529, 27 L. R. A. 718); and also engineers (Smith v. Alabama, 124 U. S. 465, 31 L. ed. 508); and even lawyers (State v. Gaslay, 5 Ohio, 15; Goldthwaite v. Montgomery, 50 Ala. 486; Cohen v. Wright, 23 Cal. 293; Ex parte Yale, 24 Cal. 241, 85 Am. Dec. 62).

In every one of these cases it has been held that it is within the power of the general assembly to prescribe qualifications for the practice of the professions or trades named, and to regulate and control these professions, even to the point of taking away the right to practice from persons lawfully engaged in the practice who may be deemed insufficiently qualified in the judgment of the board or official to whom the examination of the applicant has been intrusted."

In Eastman v. State, 109 Ind. 278, 58 Am. Rep. 400, this court said: "The practice of medicine and surgery is a vocation that very nearly concerns the comfort, health, and life of every person in the land. Physicians and surgeons have committed to their care the most important interests, and it is an almost imperative necessity that only persons possessing skill and knowledge should be permitted to practise medicine and surgery. For centuries the law has required physicians to possess and exercise skill and learning, for it had mulcted in damages those who pretend to be physicians and surgeons, but have neither learning nor skill. It is therefore no new principle of law that is asserted by our statute; but, if it were, it would not condemn the statute, for the statute is an exercise of the police power inherent in the state. It is, no one can doubt, of high importance to the community that health, limb, and life should not be left to the treatment of ignorant pretenders and charlatans. It is within the power of the legislature to enact such laws as will protect the people from ignorant pretenders, and secure them the services of reputable, skilled, and learned men." And in Dent v. West Virginia, 129 U. S. 114, 32 L. ed. 623, it was said by the Supreme Court of the United States: "It is undoubtedly the right of every citizen of the United States to follow any lawful calling, business, or profession he may choose, subject only to such restrictions as are imposed upon all persons of like age, sex, and condition. This right may, in many respects, be considered as a distinguishing feature of our Republican institutions. Here all vocations are open to everyone on like conditions. All may be pursued as sources of livelihood, some requiring years of study and great learning for their successful prosecution. The interest, or, as it is sometimes termed, the estate acquired in them,—that is, the right to continue their prosecution,—is often of great value to the possessors, and cannot be arbitrarily taken away from them, any more than their real or personal property can be thus taken. But there is no arbitrary deprivation of such right where its exercise is not permitted because of a failure to comply with conditions imposed by the state for the protection of society. The power of the state to provide for the general welfare of its people authorizes it to prescribe all such regulations as, in its judgment, will secure or tend to secure them against the consequences of ignorance and incapacity, as well as of deception and fraud. As one means to this end it has been the practise of different states, from time immemorial, to exact in many pursuits a certain degree of skill and learning upon which the community may confidently rely, their possession being generally ascertained upon an examination of the parties by competent persons, or inferred from a certificate to them in the form of a diploma or license from an institution established for instruction on the subjects, scientific and otherwise, with which such pursuits have to deal. The nature and extent of the qualifications required must depend primarily upon the judgment of the state as to their necessity. If they are appropriate to the calling or profession, and attainable by reasonable study or application, no objection to their validity can be raised because of their stringency or difficulty. It is only when they have no relation to such calling or profession, or are unattainable by such reasonable study and application, that they can operate to deprive one of his right to pursue a lawful vocation. Few professions require more careful preparation by one who seeks to enter it than that of medicine. It has to deal with all those subtle and mysterious influences upon which health and life depend, and requires, not only a knowledge of the properties of vegetable and mineral substances, but of the human body in all its complicated parts, and their relation to each other, as well as their influence upon the mind. The physician must be able to detect readily the presence of disease, and prescribe appropriate remedies for its removal. Everyone may have occasion to consult him, but comparatively few can judge of the qualifications of learning and skill which he possesses. Reliance must be placed upon the assurance given by his license, issued by an authority competent to judge in that respect, that he possesses the requisite qualifications. Due consideration, therefore, for the protection of society, may well induce the state to exclude from practise those who have not such a license, or who are found upon examination not to be fully qualified. The same reasons which control in imposing conditions upon compliance with which the physician is allowed to practise in the first instance, may call for further conditions as new modes of treating disease are discovered, or a more thorough acquaintance is obtained of the remedial properties of vegetable and mineral substances, or a more accurate knowledge is acquired of the human system and of the agencies by which it is affected. It would not be deemed a matter for serious discussion that a knowledge of the new acquisitions of the profession, as it from time to time advances in its attainments for the relief of the sick and suffering, should be required for continuance in its practice, but for the earnestness with which the plaintiff in error insists that, by being compelled to obtain the certificate required, and prevented from continuing in his practice without it, he is deprived of his right and estate in his profession without due process of law. We perceive nothing in the statute which indicates an intention of the legislature to deprive one of any of his rights. No one has a right to practise medicine without having the necessary qualifications of learning and skill; and the statute only requires that whoever assumes, by offering to the community his services as a physician, that he possess such learning and skill, shall present evidence of it by a certificate or license from a body designated by the state as competent to judge of his qualifications." See also Hawker v. New York, 170 U. S. 189, 43 L. ed. 102. While in some respects quasi judicial, the action of the board is not judicial, any more than is the action of a county surveyor in fixing a boundary line, or of a county superintendent in giving or refusing a teacher's certificate, or the action of numberless other officers or boards in making investigations and decisions in matters committed to them. Neither is the circumstance that an appeal is allowed from a decision of the board an indication that its action is judicial. "The right of appeal from the action of boards in their administrative character," it was said by this court in Huntington County Comrs. v. Heaton, 144 Ind. 583 and 597, "is frequently conferred by statute. The appeal in such cases is not permitted because the action of the board is considered judicial, but it is granted as a method of getting the matter involved before a court that it may be determined judicially."

Judgment affirmed.

E. PALMER et al.

An injunction against keeping a bawdy house on certain premises cannot be granted on the ground that it is obnoxious to the neighborhood, and unfavorably affects the salable value of property in the locality.

(April 27, 1893.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for McCracken County in favor of plaintiffs in a suit brought to enjoin defendant from keeping a bawdy house. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Campbell & Campbell and W. G. Bullitt for appellant.

Mr. Charles K. Wheeler for appellees.

Haselrigg, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is agreed that the appellant keeps a bawdy house on a certain street in Paducah, and that its presence there is shocking to the moral sense of the community, and is especially obnoxious and disagreeable to the immediate neighborhood. The proof also conduces to show that the maintenance of such a house unfavorably affects the salable value of property in its locality. The question is: May the chancellor, under these circumstances, enjoin the appellant from using the house in question as a bawdy house? The chancellor below answered this question in the affirmative, and at the instance of certain real-estate owners in the neighborhood, entered the order of perpetual injunction appealed from. At the threshold it is noticeable that this is the first time in the jurisprudence of the state that the attempt has been made to suppress this evil by the substitution of the chancellor's orders in lieu of the processes of the criminal courts. This cannot be because new conditions have arisen, calling for the ever-expanding powers of the chancellor. The bawd we have always had with us, and the bawdy house. The absence of the exercise of such a power may not be conclusive against its use, but it is at least strongly persuasive that such power does not exist. It is not alleged that there are offensive sights or sounds about the obnoxious premises, but only that property is made less valuable in the vicinity, and that the moral atmosphere is tainted and pestilential. The injury is wholly consequential. It seems to us, under these circumstances, the criminal courts had best be left to enforce the criminal laws. These are confessedly entirely adequate for the purpose of suppressing such evils. To keep a bawdy house is to erect and maintain a nuisance, and is in itself a crime. The suppression of a nuisance, therefore, is but the infliction of a punishment for the crime. The one is inseparable from the other. The chancellor would therefore be, in effect, punishing the criminal by the civil process of injunction. In Anderson v. Doty, 38 Hun, 160, where this precise question was involved, the court held that courts of equity were not the proper tribunals in which to suppress the evil of keeping bawdy houses; that the usual and customary means, and those always theretofore employed, were set in motion by the courts which administer the criminal law, whose machinery was sufficient to give the community full relief. The only opposing authority is the older case of Hamilton v. Whitridge, 11 Md. 128, 69 Am. Dec. 184, which we cannot follow, as we conceive, without doing violence to the long-established practice in this state of relegating the enforcement of our laws against crime to the criminal courts.

We are constrained, therefore, to take a different view of this question from the chancellor, and his judgment is reversed, to the end that the petition for injunction be dismissed.

An ordinance prohibiting the owner of a carcass of a dead animal removing it, but requiring him to pay a public contractor, for its removal, a fee greater than the value of the carcass, is unconstitutional as an indirect confiscation of the property.

(April 29, 1893.)

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Jefferson County convicting him of violating an ordinance against hauling dead animals through the streets of the city. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Pryor, O'Neal, & Pryor for appellant.

Messrs. Kohn, Baird, & Spindle, for appellees:

If the subject-matter regulated or prohibited, as the case may be, is of such a nature that it can be reasonably said it might do harm unless regulated or prohibited, as the case may be, the legislature of the state or the local government has full power either to regulate or prohibit.

It is the class, and not the particular instance, that gives to the legislative department authority to put in force against it the police power of the state; nor has the court any jurisdiction to say that the legislative department has not exercised the power which it possesses in the most convenient or advantageous way.

So far as a police ordinance only attempts to regulate the uses of property, as distinguished from a destruction of the property itself, it is paramount to any property right.

Due process of law does not necessarily mean a judicial investigation upon a solemn trial, but what is due process of law with reference to any class of property depends upon the character of the property, its history, its condition, how it has been treated in the history of our people, and the uses to which it is ordinarily put.

Jenkins v. Ballantyne, 8 Utah, 245, 16 L. R. A. 689.

The question of regulating or prohibiting an industry or subject-matter that is of a generic kind to harm the public health, safety, or morals, is a question wholly of power vested in the legislative department, and with the manner of its exercise the courts have no concern; nor is it any objection that particular instances may be free of the objections pertaining to the class.

To regulate the removal of dead animals by granting the exclusive right to a public contractor, for fixed fees, invades no right of property, and grants no exclusive privilege, and is open to no constitutional objection. It is a customary and proper exercise of police power.

Behr*, 7 Mo. App. 345; Underwood v. Green, 8 Robt. 86.

Paynter, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The general council of the city of Louisville passed an ordinance giving the exclusive privilege to the public contractor to remove the carcasses of dead animals, not slain for food or to be used in useful arts, out of the city, such as horses, cattle, hogs, sheep, etc.; and it is the duty of such contractor, within twenty-four hours after he has received notice that there is a dead animal in the city, to remove it outside of the city to a place that appears to have been established, or to one that might thereafter be established, within the county of Jefferson. The owner or person in charge of any carcass may direct the place to which it shall be removed, upon the payment to the public contractor, of certain fees prescribed in the ordinance, to wit, $2.50 per head for each ox, bull, steer, or cow, $1 per head for each hog, etc.; and, upon the failure of the owner or person in charge to prepay the fee prescribed in the ordinance, the contractor is authorized to take possession of the carcass, and remove it to such rendering establishment as such public contractor may own or control outside of the city of Louisville, inside the county of Jefferson, where he shall proceed to render the same, and out of the proceeds of the materials and substances thus received from the rendering of the carcass he is to pay himself the fees prescribed in the ordinance for removing same, together with reasonable compensation for the services done by him in rendering or causing to be rendered such carcass of a dead animal; and if, after paying himself the fee and expenses indicated, there be any surplus left, he shall hold it for the benefit of the owner, provided the owner claims it within six months after the removal of the carcass. The ordinance further provides that it shall not be lawful for any person whatsoever, or copartnership of persons or corporation, except the public contractor, to remove the carcass of any dead animal, unless the public contractor fails to remove the same within twenty-four hours after being notified thereof; and if any person, copartnership of persons, or corporation, except the public contractor, shall remove, haul, or drag a carcass of a dead animal through, along, or across any of the public ways, streets, or alleys of the city of Louisville, they shall be subject to a fine.

The city of Louisville, pursuant to the ordinance, made a contract with certain persons to remove the carcasses of dead animals as provided by the ordinance. Tatum, Embry, & Co. and two other firms were factors in the city of Louisville engaged in the business of buying stock and of selling stock which was consigned to them. It appears that cars are overloaded with stock, thus causing the death of part or all of the carload. Other causes produce the death of stock which is shipped to them, and also stock dies at the stock yards of these factors. Owing to the fact that they are large dealers in stock, they have for disposal a large number of carcasses, principally of hogs and cattle. It is to the interest of these firms to realize all they possibly can out of the remains of dead animals. There appear to be two or more rendering establishments not far distant from the stock yards, and their owners hired the defendant, Christ Knauer, to drive their wagon in, hauling their dead animals over the streets of Louisville to a rendering establishment. This prosecution was instituted for the purpose of imposing a penalty upon the driver, Knauer, because he was hauling the carcass of a dead animal, belonging to one of his employers, on the streets of Louisville to a rendering establishment. The question of his guilt depends upon the validity of the ordinance in question. The evidence offered in this case tends to prove that the remains of their dead hogs can be hauled to the rendering establishment for from 5 to 10 cents per head; that the remains of an ox, bull, steer, or cow belonging to them can be removed to the rendering establishment for much less than 50 cents per head. The proof also shows that the remains of a hog, bull, cow, or steer are not worth hardly so much as the fees which the ordinance requires to be paid for its removal. The result is that they cannot pay the fees and realize anything whatever for the carcasses of their dead animals. In other words, if the public contractor removes them they get nothing for such carcasses.

The sole question in this case is whether the city can pass an ordinance which fixes the fees to be paid the public contractor for the removal of the carcass of a dead animal out of the city at such sums that their owners cannot pay them and realize anything out of them. Can the city in this indirect way confiscate the property of its owner and give it to the public contractor? Dead animals are not per se nuisances, and the owner's property rights do not cease at the death of the animal. Until such becomes a nuisance, the owner should have the right to realize whatever he can from it. Under the police power, the municipality certainly has the right, and it is its duty, to prevent carcasses of dead animals from becoming nuisances; and to that end it may prescribe the manner of and the time in which the owners shall remove or permit them to be removed. The employers of the appellant can remove the carcasses as speedily and in a manner that will cause as little offense to the public sense and taste as can the contractor. They can realize considerable sums by the sale of the carcasses by being permitted to make the removal. In the case of State v. Morris, 47 La. Ann. 1663, the court said: "To sustain that portion of the contract we would have to decide that a dead animal is per se a nuisance; that the ownership terminates at death. There is no question here of the exercise of eminent domain for the public good requiring compensation. The only question is the right to exercise the police power vel non. If the property is not a nuisance, the owner should not be prevented from obtaining its value, and should not be denied the right to make any disposition of it (however innocent and useful). It is not possible, under police regulation, to take property from one man and give it to another. The city might, as a sanitary measure, after having given the owner the opportunity to dispose of his dead animals, authorize a contractor to cart them away and appropriate them to his own use." In the case of River Rendering Co. v. Behr, 77 Mo. 98, 46 Am. Rep. 6, the court said: "We do not deny that the general assembly may confer upon municipal authorities the power to abate nuisances, and to declare what shall be deemed nuisances, but the latter power cannot be so absolute as to be beyond the cognizance of the courts to determine whether it has been reasonably exercised in a given case or not. Yates v. Milwaukee, 10 Wall. 497, 19 L. ed. 984. The ordinance in question cannot be maintained as a police regulation. It can never be necessary to take from one man his property and give it to another until the property is in such condition that it is, or is so used that it is likely to become, a nuisance; and even in the latter case, until it has become a nuisance, an opportunity should be given the owner to change the use, or make such disposition of his property as will prevent the apprehended danger. Or the city might, as a sanitary measure, by ordinance authorize the seizure and sale of dead animals by its proper officers, in order to prevent an improper sale or disposition of them by the owner, provided it secured to such owner the proceeds of such sale. This might be tolerated, but it would be on the very verge of debatable ground. . . . A dead hog or steer or sheep is not per se a nuisance. It was so ruled by the New York court of appeals in Underwood v. Green, 42 N. Y. 140. It was there observed that 'a dead hog is not per se a nuisance, even though it died of suffocation, and is not necessarily dangerous to public health. The owner may still put it to a useful and innocent purpose.' While a dead animal is not per se a nuisance, it may become so, and the city, under her charter, may pass such ordinances as are necessary to prevent it from becoming a nuisance, but she must in such legislation pay a proper regard to the rights of the owner of such property. The death of a domestic animal does not terminate the owner's property, and, while he may be required to make such use or disposition of the carcass as will prevent a nuisance, stench, or other inconvenience to the neighborhood, the municipal authorities cannot arbitrarily deprive him of his property by giving it to another. If not per se a nuisance, it is property, in the broadest sense of the term."

It requires no argument to show that neither a municipal nor any other government can take one man's property and give it to another. An ordinance declaring that the carcasses of all dead animals found in the city, which were not slain for food or to be used in the useful arts, become the property of the public contractor, would be unconstitutional. If the municipality cannot directly take the property of one person and give it to another, should it be permitted to do so indirectly? We think not. The fees which the employers of the appellant are required to pay the contractor before they are permitted to direct where the carcass shall be taken are so high that they cannot afford to pay them. The value of the carcasses will not justify them in paying the fees. It results that the contractor gets the carcasses as compensation for hauling them away, as the fee fixed in the ordinance is greater than the value of the carcass, and the owner cannot realize anything from the rendered product, as the cost of rendering is added to the amount of the fee fixed for the removal. The effect of an ordinance which does not allow the owner of a dead carcass to remove it, but requires him to pay a fee for its removal which is greater than its value, is precisely the same in effect as an ordinance which takes the carcass from one person and gives it to another. In so far as the ordinance has that effect it is unconstitutional. The proof offered by the appellee tends to show that the amount which the contractor received for the removal of all dead animals from the city is not unreasonable because of the fact that he is sometimes required to send his teams many miles to remove a single carcass. We do not think that because it is an advantageous contract to the city, and also to the interest of some of the citizens who may have animals to die that such ordinance should have been passed, can justify the city in taking, in the manner we have indicated, the property of the employers of the appellant. They cannot be compelled to relieve the city of the burden or other citizens of the expense by being forced to surrender their rights in property. Their property cannot be taken simply because the ordinance in question may relieve the city of an expense that it might otherwise have to pay.

The judgment is reversed for proceedings consistent with this opinion.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following response was handed down June 18, 1898, by Paynter, J.:

The court said in the opinion delivered that the municipality has the right, and it is its duty, to prevent carcasses of dead animals from becoming nuisances, and to that end it may prescribe the manner of and the time in which the owners shall remove them. We may add that the general council may provide by ordinance that in the event the owner of a carcass of a dead animal fails to remove it within the prescribed time, or pay such reasonable fee as may be fixed for its removal, it shall become the property of the city, or of such person as may be authorized, by contract with the city, to remove it; or it may be provided that, upon the failure of the owner to remove it within the prescribed time, it shall become the property of the city, or of such person as may be authorized to remove it.

FARMERS' LOAN & TRUST COMPANY v.

M. M. KILLINGER et al.
D. A. HALE et al., Impleaded, etc., Appls.

(46 Neb. 877.)

A court, upon setting aside a mere money judgment, has no power to continue

Headnotes by RYAN, C.

NOTE.—Continuing lien of judgment opened or set aside to permit a defense.

I. Distinction between opening and setting aside or vacating judgment.

IV. Effect of continuance of lien.

V. The second or final judgment.

VI. The final enforcement or collection.

I. Distinction between opening and setting aside or vacating judgment.

The power of the court to continue the lien of a judgment upon opening it to let in a defense seems to be well settled. But the principle I. R. A.

in existence the statutory judgment lien of the judgment set aside, that it may attach to such judgment as subsequently may be rendered in the same cause.

(January 2, 1898.)

APPEAL by D. A. Hale et al. from a judgment of the District Court for Madison county postponing the lien of the judgment which had been recovered by him against M.

pal case seems to be a pioneer case on the question of the right to continue the lien of a judgment upon setting aside or vacating it, as well as with reference to the distinction between opening and setting aside or vacating a judgment, unless Steinbridge's Appeal, 1 Penn. & W. 481, can be said to bear on that question. In that case it is said that "a judgment may be opened, or it may be set aside. If the former, it remains a judgment still, and with all the attributes as such; of which the order of the court has not deprived it," giving rise to the inference that if it were vacated or set aside it would not be a judgment with its usual attributes. But this was a case of opening, and not of vacating or setting aside.

M. Killinger to a mechanic's lien held by L. B. Baker in the adjustment of liens against Killinger's property in a proceeding to foreclose a mortgage. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the Commissioner's opinion.

Exley v. Berryhill, 36 Minn. 117; Whereatt v. Ellis, 68 Wis. 61.

The judgments of the court preserving the attachment and general judgment liens of appellants were judgments of the court until vacated, modified, or disposed of by the process prescribed by law. Entering another judgment is not one of them.

II. Power to continue lien on opening judgment.

In cases where defaults are opened, it is proper practice to allow the judgment already entered to stand as security. Hanse v. Fiero, 25 Abb. N. C. 46.

And a defendant failing to serve his answer within the time allowed for that purpose, upon excusing his default and showing a good defense is usually permitted to interpose it on motion to open the default on payment of the costs of the motion, judgment, execution, and levy thus existing to stand as security for the payment of any judgment the plaintiff may thereafter recover. Clark v. Lyon, 2 Hilt. 91.

A proceeding to let in a defendant to plead upon terms after judgment by default partakes of the nature of an equitable interposition on his behalf, and should be somewhat controlled by equitable considerations; and it is more just that the old judgment should be allowed to stand and the lien which may have been thereby obtained preserved to the plaintiff. Dulle v. Lally, 64 Ill. App. 292.

And on setting aside a default for want of a plea on the ground of merit if it appear probable that the plaintiff may lose his demand by reason of the defendant being in doubtful circumstances the court will order the judgment to stand as security. Anonymous, 6 Cow. 390.

And the plaintiff in an action which would abate by the death of the defendant, in which a motion to open a default had been made and denied, and there had been a long delay in renewing the motion, is entitled to have the judgment remain as security to protect his rights, and should not be required to accept in lieu thereof an undertaking to pay such judgment as might eventually be recovered. Hart v. Washburn, 42 N. Y. S. R. 440.

Where a defendant moves to open a default upon terms not of right, the court has power, as one of the terms, to require that judgment or execution shall stand as security, and will do so if the safety of the plaintiff demands it. Wilson v. White, 7 Cow. 477.

A defendant applying to have a judgment by default against him opened applies to the court for a favor, and in granting it the court has power to impose the condition that the debt shall be secured by lien on his property; and where he accepts the favor and the issue is tried upon the merits, the lien in equity continues until the debt is discharged. Holmes v. Bush, 35 Hun, 637.

Under power to open a judgment on such terms as shall be just, as well as under its general powers, a court may modify a judgment by depriving it of its ordinary character as res judicata. Nuckolls v. Irwin, 2 Neb. 60; Flagg v. Cooper, 22 Jones & S. 50; Am. Dig. 1890, p. 2180, § 886; Loomis v. Second German Bldg. Assn. 37 Ohio St. 392; Leonard's Appeal, 94 Pa. 180; Kittanning Ins. Co. v. Scott, 101 Pa. 449; Cope's Appeal, 96 Pa. 294.

If a judgment is opened but allowed to stand as security, for what may be afterwards recovered, it operates, notwithstanding its opening, as a lien upon the land.

Holmes v. Bush, 35 Hun, 637.

Messrs. Campbell & Wallis and Wigton & Whitham for appellees.

Ryan, C., delivered the opinion of the court:

This action was for the foreclosure of a mortgage made to the Farmers' Loan & Trust judicata, and leaving it in full force as a lien or collateral security. Griswold Linseed Oil Co. v. Lee, 1 S. D. 531; Negley v. Counting Room Co. 2 How. Pr. N. S. 237.

And the court has authority, under its general powers, as well as by statute, in New York, in its discretion and upon such terms as it believes to be just, to relieve a party from a judgment and allow an answer to be made, and in pursuance of this authority it may modify the judgment by depriving it of its ordinary character as res judicata, and leaving it in full force as a lien or collateral security. Mott v. Union Bank, 38 N. Y. 18.

And where a judgment is opened under South Dakota Comp. Laws, § 4939, conferring power to relieve a party from a judgment taken against him through his mistake, inadvertence, surprise, or excusable neglect, upon such terms as may be just, the court may, in addition to costs, impose as terms that the judgment stand as security for any judgment that may be finally recovered by the plaintiff in the action, and where the judgment is for a large amount the terms should be, that in addition to costs the judgment should stand as security, or, in lieu thereof, a good and sufficient bond should be given, conditioned for the payment thereof. Griswold Linseed Oil Co. v. Lee, 1 S. D. 531.

So, the court, on opening a default of a plaintiff to reply to a counterclaim set up by the defendant upon which he has taken judgment, may direct the judgment on the counterclaim to stand as security, with the right to either party to make such motion as to such judgment on the decision of the question as to the plaintiff's right to recover his costs of action set up in the complaint, as he shall be advised. Pomares v. Duncan, 25 Abb. N. C. 58.

And an order allowing leave to amend a complaint by inserting another count for an additional claim made after the entry of a judgment by default upon the original complaint which had been opened to permit a defense, but left to stand as security for such subsequent judgment as might be obtained, need not be conditioned that such default judgment be vacated, but it may be allowed to stand as security for the subsequent judgment for the consideration stated in the original complaint. Union Bank v. Mott, 19 How. Pr. 114, 10 Abb. Pr. 376.

And a requirement of a bond for the payment of any damage which might be recovered in an action to recover unliquidated damages for malicious prosecution, the amount claimed having no relation to the amount the plaintiff would be held entitled to recover if he recovered at all, is improper, and an order requiring such bond will be modified on appeal so as to open

Company by M. M. Killinger and his wife. There were made defendants Louis Stein & Co., David Hale, and L. B. Baker. A controversy not settled to the satisfaction of one party was between L. B. Baker, who had filed his claim for a mechanic's lien against the real property of Killinger on August 6, 1889, and D. A. Hale, who had recovered judgment against M. M. Killinger on May 2, 1889. One of the journal entries introduced in evidence in this case was as follows:

David A. Hale v. M. M. Killinger. Wm. V. Allen's Journal Entry. And now, on this 29th day of July, 1889, it being a judicial day of the regular April, 1889, term of this court, this cause came on for hearing to the court on the defendant's motion to set aside the judgment heretofore the default and allow the services of an answer, upon payment of costs, and upon condition that the judgment stand as security for any judgment that the plaintiff might ultimately recover. Glickman v. Loew, 29 App. Div. 479.

So, where two partners have been regularly brought into court by process upon a demand owing by them as such, and an attorney employed by one of them appears for both, acting in good faith, and offers to allow judgment, which is accepted, the other, upon swearing to the merits, will be led in to answer to the complaint and defend the action, the judgment and levy therein to stand as security for any judgment finally obtained. Blodget v. Conklin, 9 How. Pr. 442.

And where an attorney appears for a defendant against whom a writ has been issued but not served, and suffers or confesses judgment without authority, if the attorney is not responsible or perfectly competent to answer to his assumed client the court will relieve against the judgment, and, in order to protect the plaintiff from suffering by the act of the attorney and at the same time save the defendant from injury, will let the judgment stand, but stay all proceedings and let in the defendant to plead. Denton v. Noyes, 6 Johns. 296, 5 Am. Dec. 237; Ellsworth v. Campbell, 31 Barb. 134.

So, in Cleveland v. Porter, 10 Abb. Pr. 407, a judgment against several joint debtors, obtained on service of summons upon one only under circumstances arousing a suspicion that it was obtained by connivance of the defendant served, was opened on motion of another defendant to permit a defense,—the judgment and all subsequent proceedings to stand as security, all further proceedings thereon being stayed until the determination of the issues.

And the same thing was done in Ford v. Whitridge, 9 Abb. Pr. 416.

And in Grazebrook v. McCreedie, 9 Wend. 438, proceedings on a judgment entered on a cognovit given by an attorney of two partners as such when in fact he was employed by only one, on whom a declaration had been served of which the other was ignorant, were stayed, and the other partner was permitted to put in a plea and contest the validity of plaintiff's demands.

So, in McTague v. Pennsylvania & N. E. R. Co. 44 N. J. L. 62, in which it appeared that the judgment debtor was entitled to be heard on the merits, the proceedings were opened to permit him to defend on the terms of letting the judgment and execution stand as security.

And in Nitchie v. Smith, 2 Johns. Cas. 286, a judgment by default regularly obtained against an administratrix was opened, and she was allowed to come in and plead, but it was directed L. R. A.

entered in this case, and to be let in to defend, supported by the affidavit of the defendant. On consideration of said motion, the same is granted by the court, the judgment set aside, and the defendant let in to defend, on condition that he pay all the costs of this case. To all of which the plaintiff duly excepted. It is further ordered that the plaintiff have forty days from this date to prepare and settle a bill of exceptions. It is further ordered that the attachment and general judgment lien obtained by the plaintiff in this case shall be preserved to him and in no manner be affected by this order.

On May 2, 1890, judgment was rendered in the above-entitled cause against the defendant for the sum of $888.45 and costs. The ed to stand as security for the assets remaining after payment of prior judgments confessed, and for assets quando acciderint.

And in Hall v. First Nat. Bank, 133 Ill. 234, it was held that a verdict for the plaintiff without the assessment of damages, in an action upon a draft, is not erroneous where, on motion of the defendants to set aside a default and for leave to plead, the court stayed proceedings on the judgment and allowed the defendants to plead, but refused to set it aside, allowing it to stand as a security for the plaintiffs until the trial of the issues, and the defendants availed themselves of the leave of the court to plead to the merits.

So in Dulle v. Lally, 167 Ill. 485, 64 Ill. App. 292, the judgment debtor was given leave to plead judgment to stand as security after the lapse of many terms of court.

And in Selover v. Forbes, 22 How. Pr. 477, a judgment in an action brought by a receiver who had no knowledge of the validity of the claim except that which he obtained from others, the defendant denying positively any indebtedness whatever, was opened upon the terms that the judgment and execution stand as security, and the sheriff be allowed to proceed on the execution, unless the defendant secured him thereon, the defendant to withdraw a pending appeal from an order, and pay all costs and costs of the subsequent proceeding and $10 costs of the motion to open it.

And in Brownell v. Rushman (N. Y.) 11 Rep. 584, it was held on appeal from an order opening a default, that the condition imposed, of payment of the costs of the action and that the judgment stand as security, was severe and unusual, but it was upheld upon the ground that it appeared to the court that the litigation was not continued in good faith.

So, upon a bill in chancery to enjoin a judgment at law, an absolute right to a certiorari to review which had been lost either by the loss of the bill of exceptions or the death of the judge without signing it, there must not be a decree annulling the judgment and granting a new trial in the law court, but the judgment should be allowed to stand as security for what may be found to be justly due, and the injunction allowed to stand until the retrial, and the decree should direct an issue or issues to be tried in the circuit court to find what the nature of the case requires, and upon the verdict the court will perpetuate or dissolve the judgment wholly or partially, according to the circumstances of the case. Grafton & G. R. Co. v. Davison (W. Va.) 29 S. E. 1028.

And the same rule applies where the justices composing the court before which the cause judgment which had been rendered just one year previously was for $620. As has already been stated, the claim of L. B. Baker for a mechanic's lien was filed August 6, 1889. The appellants claim that this lien was subject to the lien of whatever judgment should be recovered ultimately by Mr. Hale, and that, therefore, the final judgment in the sum of $385.45 should have been declared superior to the aforesaid mechanic's lien. The contention of the appellees that the lien of David A. Hale's judgment dated only from May 2, 1890, was sustained by the district court, and to reverse this postponement of his lien this appeal was taken.

In argument it was urged that the order setting aside the judgment in Mr. Hale's favor was made upon condition that the judgment lien previously existing should be preserved, and held to attach to whatever judgment ultimately should be rendered. This construction is not borne out by the language employed, for the order with reference to the preservation of said lien was made after, and independently of, the order setting aside the judgment.

It is further insisted that the language of the final paragraph of the above journal entry brought about one result, and that was that the lien of the judgment opened was by the court preserved for the enforcement of whatever final judgment should be rendered. To sustain this, appellants' counsel have cited several Pennsylvania cases. The practice in that state does not seem to depend upon an express provision of the statutes. We infer, however, that there is held to exist a material difference was tried had left the bench after the verdict was rendered so that a motion for a new trial could not be made. Knifong v. Hendricks, 2 Gratt. 212, 44 Am. Dec. 385.

Judgment will not be given as security, however, on an affirmative motion against a party who comes regularly upon the calendar to set aside a verdict or report on the merits; this can only be done where he applies for leave to move upon terms, not of right. Wilson v. White, 7 Cow. 477.

III. The Pennsylvania and Ohio rules.

In Pennsylvania the lien of a judgment is neither destroyed nor affected by an order opening the judgment for the purpose of letting the defendant in to make a defense. Kittanning Ins. Co. v. Scott, 101 Pa. 449; Cope's Appeal, 96 Pa. 294; Steinbridge's Appeal, 1 Penr. & W. 481.

But it will continue for the same period of time as if it had not been opened. Cope's Appeal, 96 Pa. 294.

And continues from the original date of entry. Steinbridge's Appeal, 1 Penr. & W. 481.

A judgment opened to let in a defense continues to be a judgment with all its incidents and for all purposes except execution, and it is not necessary that a special order be made that the judgment shall stand as security. Kittanning Ins. Co. v. Scott, 101 Pa. 449.

And pending the defense to a judgment opened for that purpose it may be revived, and the lien thereon continued, by issuing a scire facias thereon, but to continue it the plaintiff must proceed within the five years during which it is a lien as in other cases, though the issue remains undetermined, and the judgment opened to let in a defense is not affected or disturbed any further than is necessary for that purpose, and remains a valid and subsisting judgment for all other purposes. Kittanning Ins. Co. v. Scott, 101 Pa. 449.

And where an award is filed in favor of a creditor against a debtor, and after the expiration of twenty days therefrom the judgment becomes absolute and an execution is issued, and subsequently the court grants a rule to show cause why the award should not be stricken out, which is afterwards made absolute, but the court subsequently reconsiders its action and reinstates the rule, and afterwards again discharges it permitting an appeal from the award, the creditor recovering judgment on the final trial, the lien of such judgment is not postponed to that of other creditors who obtained judgment after the award and judgment and execution thereon, but previous to the final judgment. Leonard's Appeal, 94 Pa. 180.

So, in Ohio it is provided by statute (2 Swan & C. 1160) that where a second trial is granted under the statute the lien of the first judgment shall not be removed or vacated, but the real estate of the judgment debtor shall be bound as if no new trial had been demanded until the final determination of the case. Loomis v. Second German Bldg. Assn. 37 Ohio St. 392.

And under that provision the lien of the first judgment takes precedence over a mortgage given subsequently by the judgment debtor but before the final determination. Loomis v. Second German Bldg. Assn. 37 Ohio St. 392.

IV. Effect of continuance of lien.

A judgment which has been opened but left to stand as security for any future recovery neither acknowledges nor establishes any indebtedness, and is of no effect except merely as a security for the payment of any sum that may be found due. Mott v. Union Bank, 38 N. Y. 18, 8 Bosw. 591; Holmes v. Rogers, 18 N. Y. S. R. 652; Griswold Linseed Oil Co. v. Lee, 1 S. D. 531.

And where the judgment is left to stand as security on the opening of a default no execution can be issued thereon until the final determination of the controversy. Negley v. Counting-Room Co. 2 How. Pr. N. S. 237; Ford v. Whitridge, 9 Abb. Pr. 416.

An order opening a default, but leaving the judgment to stand as security, places the parties back where they were before the judgment was entered, and provides for the litigation of their rights, and the execution of the judgment would be inconsistent with the right thus to litigate. Mott v. Union Bank, 38 N. Y. 18.

And a defendant who accepts leave to defend granted by an order opening a default on condition that the judgment stand as security, no execution to issue thereon until the determination of the action, cannot afterwards insist that the terms upon which such leave was granted were irregular. Flagg v. Cooper, 22 Jones & S. 50.

And a default judgment modified by an order allowing the defendant to answer and litigate the plaintiff's claim, but directing the judgment to stand as security for the alleged indebtedness, is not a final determination of the rights of the parties which will prevent the issue of an order of arrest within the meaning of N. Y. Code, § 183, providing that the order may be made to accompany the summons, or at any time afterwards before final judgment. Mott v. Union Bank, 38 N. Y. 18, 8 Bosw. 591.

But a judgment entered by default and docketed, is a final judgment within the provision of N. Y. Code, § 1240, upon which an execution between opening a judgment and setting it aside. This inference seems justified by the following language, quoted from Steinbridge's Appeal, 1 Peur. & W. 491: "A judgment may be opened, or it may be set aside. If the former, it remains a judgment still, and with all the attributes as such, of which the order of the court has not deprived it. Here it was opened to let the party into not even a full defense; consequently it was no further disturbed than to effect that object." In Troubat & H. Prac. § 60,—a work specially designed for use in Pennsylvania,—is found this language: "Our remedy, also, for irregularity or collusion in the rendition of a judgment, is to overturn it; but, for pretermitted matter of defense, it necessarily is to open it, for it is impossible to say what may be found due. Our practice, therefore, is to try collusion by a collateral issue, but matter of defense by an issue in the cause which gives the defendant all proper advantage of matter of original defense without loosening the plaintiff's hold on the security gained by the judgment." The Pennsylvania cases cited in the brief for appellants were where the judgment had been opened, and the defendant let in to defend. They therefore afford no justification of the claim that in that state a may regularly issue, the order opening a default merely regulating its actual issue, and where the period during which no execution was to issue has expired, the judgment originally entered may be enforced in the way provided by law. Flagg v. Cooper, 22 Jones & S. 50.

An order opening a default and permitting a defense, but leaving the judgment to stand as security, modifies it by depriving it of its ordinary character as res judicata, but leaves it in force as a lien or collateral security. Negley v. Counting-Room Co. 2 How. Pr. N. S. 237.

And where he accepts the favor, and the issues are tried upon the merits, the lien in equity continues until the debt is discharged. Holmes v. Bush, 35 Hun, 637.

And an order setting aside a default, and directing that the judgment entered thereon should stand as security for any judgment in the action that might be thereafter rendered, creates a lien upon lands of the judgment debtor or which will justify a purchaser from an heir of the judgment debtor after his death in refusing to accept a deed, though an order had been made providing that a docket of such judgment should be marked suspended upon appeal. Holmes v. Bush, 35 Hun, 637.

A judgment by default which is opened but allowed to stand as security is a lien for what may be found to be really due, though obtained by fraud, accident, or surprise, and though what may be due be the whole or only a part of the debt recovered. Grafton & G. R. Co. v. Davison (W. Va.) 29 S. E. 1028.

And when another count is added by amendment the judgment may be allowed to stand as security for the subsequent recovery for the consideration stated in the original complaint. Union Bank v. Mott, 19 How. Pr. 114, 10 Abb. Pr. 376.

Where an injunction to a judgment which has been allowed to stand as security for what may be found to be justly due in a case in which a right to a certiorari has been lost is only perpetuated as to part of it, or only reversed in part, or the reversal is only of a part of the judgment, the lien of the part not affected continued from the date of the judgment. Grafton & G. R. Co. v. Davison (W. Va.) 29 S. E. 1028.

So, a judgment opened to let in a defense may, pending the issue thereof, be transferred to another county for the purpose of becoming a lien on property therein pursuant to the law. Kittanning Ins. Co. v. Scott, 101 Pa. 449.

And an order opening a judgment to admit a defense does not prevent the issuing of a scire facias within the statutory period, or of an alias whereby the lien may be continued. Cope's Appeal, 96 Pa. 294.

But where more than ten years have expired after the entry of a judgment which had been opened but allowed to stand as security, it ceases to be a lien on real estate, and an order for the issue of an execution cannot revive the lien. Hanse v. Fiero, 25 Abb. N. C. 46.

And a judgment creditor whose judgment has been opened to let in a defense, who desires to extend the lien of the judgment for a longer term than the statutory period of five years, must issue his scire facias to revive as prescribed by law, the same as in any other case. Cope's Appeal, 96 Pa. 294.

An order opening a default, and providing that the judgment shall stand as security, simply retains the judgment as a lien upon any land of the defendant, and does not extend the lien beyond the ten years provided for by N. Y. Code, § 1251, or the additional time under § 1255; and after such period of ten years the court, though it will permit an execution to issue thereon, will not permit it nunc pro tunc, as this might expose subsequent purchasers to litigation. Hanse v. Fiero, 25 Abb. N. C. 46.

So, an election by the plaintiff in an action in which a default judgment had been opened and permitted to stand as security and to amend his complaint on the trial is not a concession that the original judgment was unauthorized, and does not affect its character as a security. Hanse v. Fiero, 25 Abb. N. C. 46.

But the allowance of an amendment to a complaint by the insertion of another account for an additional claim after the opening of a judgment by default upon the original complaint, the judgment to stand as security for any judgment to be recovered, does not extend such judgment as a security for any matter which could not be recovered under the complaint upon which it was entered; it can stand only as security for such subsequent judgment as may be obtained for the consideration stated in the original complaint. Union Bank v. Mott, 19 How. Pr. 114, 10 Abb. Pr. 376.

V. The second or final judgment.

Where a judgment has been opened and a new trial ordered, but the judgment allowed to stand as security, a new judgment is required to be entered for the amount recovered on the second trial, without reference to the previous judgment. Miller v. Eagle Life & Health Ins. Co. 3 E. D. Smith, 184; Mott v. Union Bank, 8 Bosw. 591.

And notwithstanding the fact that the first judgment still remains upon record. Mott v. Union Bank, 8 Bosw. 591.

And the entry of a fresh judgment thereon for the amount of the recovery with costs as taxed is not subject to the objection that the practice is irregular, on the ground that there cannot be two judgments for the same demand as the first judgment is merely collateral to the second, and security for its payment. Negley v. Counting-Room Co. 2 How. Pr. N. S. 237.

judgment may be set aside, and yet that the lien of such judgment may continue to exist. In the case of Flagg v. Cooper, 22 Jones & S. 50, the judgment was not vacated, but leave to defend was granted upon the express condition that the judgment already in existence should stand as security, but that no execution thereon should issue. The fact that the defendant had availed himself of this condition influenced the court somewhat in the direction of holding the defendant bound by this provision. The case of Loomis v. Second German Bldg. Assn. 37 Ohio St. 392, also cited by the appellants, rather tends to deny than recognize the claim that a lien may survive a judgment after it has been set aside; for in that state it had been deemed necessary to effect that result that this statutory provision, quoted in the opinion, should be adopted, to wit: "In all cases where the party against whom a judgment is rendered obtains a second trial under the act to which this is amendatory and supplementary, the lien of the opposite party so obtaining such second trial, created by said judgment, shall not be by the obtaining of such second trial removed or vacated, but the real estate of said party so obtaining such second trial shall be bound in the same manner as if said second trial had not been demanded, until the final determination of the case." From

So, the plaintiff must, if he finally succeeds in the action, file with the clerk a new roll containing the bills or copies thereof with extracts from the minutes of the verdict or decision and other papers necessarily belonging to the judgment, which must be entered for the whole amount of damages and costs as if no former judgment roll had been filed. Hall v. Templeton, 4 N. Y. Week. Dig. 120.

And where a creditor recovers a second judgment, the first having been opened to let in a defense, but left to stand as security, the order opening it and such second judgment furnish record evidence that both are for the same cause, and constitute but one debt. Mott v. Union Bank, 8 Bosw. 591.

In Dows v. Boughton, 3 Hill, 452, however, it was held that where, after judgment and execution against a defendant, he is let in to defend on terms, the judgment and execution to stand as security, and the plaintiff afterwards obtains a verdict, he is entitled to an order upon the defendant to pay the taxed costs of the proceeding subsequent to the judgment on demand, or that judgment issue against him, the ruling being placed on the ground that the court could not amend the record by increasing the amount of their recovery without endangering the lien obtained by docketing the judgment, and that by amending the writ of fieri facias the levy upon personal property might be affected, and that no precedent existed for the rendition of a second judgment.

A subsequent judgment does not have the effect of vacating an original judgment which had been opened to let in a defense but left to stand as security. Flagg v. Cooper, 22 Jones & S. 50.

And the judgment which has been opened is not merged by the recovery of the second judgment in the same cause so as to affect its character as a security. Hansee v. Fiero, 25 Abb. N. C. 46; Holmes v. Bush, 35 Hun, 637; Loomis v. Second German Bldg. Assn. 37 Ohio St. 392.

As that would deprive the party of all benefits intended to be secured thereby. Holmes v. Bush, 35 Hun, 637.

A lien by docket or levy of a judgment by default directed to stand as security cannot be impaired by the act of the plaintiff in entering up a final judgment. Heinemann v. Waterbury, 5 Bosw. 686.

Nor does the lien of the second judgment relate back to the time of the first judgment. Loomis v. Second German Bldg. Assn. 37 Ohio St. 392.

Where a judgment has been opened to let in a defense, and the plaintiff falls in his action, however, a return of the security is effected by the cancellation of the collateral judgment, which loses its validity and effect when the action fails. Negley v. Counting-Room Co. 2 How. Pr. N. S. 237.

And where the plaintiff again recovers a judgment, which is reversed on appeal, the former judgment falls with the reversal of the second. Pierce v. Thomas, 4 E. D. Smith, 354.

An appeal in an action in which a default judgment has been opened and permitted to stand as security is to be taken from the final or subsequent judgment, and the papers comprising it are to be printed in the case upon appeal, and no reference need be made to the security judgment. Hall v. Templeton, 4 N. Y. Week. Dig. 120.

VI. The final enforcement or collection.

Where a judgment by default has been opened to let in a defense if the plaintiff finally succeeds in the action, the ordinary practice is to issue an execution upon the final judgment which is the real judgment in the case, and if that proves unproductive, then to pursue whatever lien the collateral judgment gives. Negley v. Counting-Room Co. 2 How. Pr. N. S. 237.

Where a judgment is entered on default, and is set aside but left to stand as security, there is no objection to taking precisely such future proceedings in the action as would be regular if no security had been given in that form or no judgment by default had ever been entered. Holmes v. Rogers, 18 N. Y. S. R. 652.

A judgment by default which is opened but permitted to stand as security like any other security is collateral merely to the judgment ultimately recovered, and is to be enforced after such recovery pro tanto and the money realized upon it is to be credited upon what may be termed the final judgment. Hall v. Templeton, 4 N. Y. Week. Dig. 120.

Where a judgment by default is opened to let in a defense, but is left to stand as security, however, and a levy has already been made on the collateral security, or a proceeding has been founded thereon, and such levy or proceeding has been preserved by the order opening the default, it will not be impaired, but may be enforced by the plaintiff if he finally recovers in the action. Negley v. Counting-Room Co. 2 How. Pr. N. S. 237.

So, in Holmes v. Bush, 35 Hun, 637, two methods of enforcing the lien of a judgment which had been opened but allowed to stand as security were suggested, the one being the sale of the land by a process to be issued on application to the court in the nature of an execution, and the other a suit in equity founded upon all the proceedings had in the action, and bringing before the court all the parties interested in the premises, but the court found it unnecessary to decide which was the proper method. See also Flagg v. Cooper, 22 Jones & S. 50; Dows v. Boughton, 3 Hill, 452, supra, IV.

this review of all the cases cited by the appellants upon this point, it is very clear that an order made, as was the one which we now have under consideration, has not been shown to have had the effect claimed to have been generally recognized as resulting from such an order. In Loomis v. Second German Bldg. Assn. 37 Ohio St. 892, it was said that "a judgment lien is a creature of the statute, and does not exist except by its authority." The correctness of this proposition will not be questioned. The provision of our statute found in § 477 of the Code of Civil Procedure, by virtue of which appellants' judgment created a lien of any kind, is in this language: "The lands and tenements of the debtor within the county where the judgment is entered, shall be bound for the satisfaction thereof from the first day of the term at which judgment is rendered." There is found in the statutes of this state no provision which makes this lien dependent upon any other consideration than the rendition of a judgment. It would be deemed an extraordinary and unwarranted proceeding if a court, contemporaneously with the entry of a mere money judgment, should order that by virtue thereof its lien should date from some time named before the first day of the current term. If such an order could not be made at the time of the rendition of the judgment, it could scarcely be possible for the court, upon the entry of an order setting aside such judgment, to provide that if thereafter, no matter if a year subsequently, there should be another judgment, its lien, instead of arising as provided by statute, should be deemed to have been in existence from the date at which the first judgment had its origin. We are not considering what order might properly be made by a court, in the exercise of its equity powers, continuing a lien, as between the parties to such an action. In the case wherein judgment was rendered, M. M. Killinger was the sole defendant. The party whose lien is sought to be postponed, therefore, could not be bound by an order or judgment on the theory that as to him it was res judicata. We are of the opinion that, under the circumstances, the court had no power, upon opening a mere money judgment, to order that the lien thereof should remain in existence, and attach to a subsequent judgment of like character, whenever such judgment might be rendered.

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

NEW YORK COURT OF APPEALS.

James A. ROBERTS, Appt.

(155 N. Y. 408.)

1. A corporation is not engaged in "carrying on manufacture," within the meaning of an exemption from taxes, when its business is that of purchasing, slaughtering, and selling sheep and lambs, although it utilizes the hides, wool, tallow, and offal, as well as the carcasses of the animals, and prepares and sells them as refrigerated mutton, rendered tallow, pulled wool, untanned hides, and fertilizer made of the offal, including the blood and legs.
2. The determination of the state controller that an assessment for taxes should be canceled on the ground that the property was not subject to assessment is not res judicata, and does not estop his successor from assessing the same property or franchise in subsequent years.
3. No distinction between dividends earned in a state and those earned out of it can be made in the assessment of a foreign corporation under Laws 1896, chap. 908.

(April 19, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, setting aside an assessment of corporation taxes upon relator by the state controller. Reversed.

NOTE.—On the question, What constitutes manufacturing?—see Com. v. Northern Electric Light & P. Co. (Pa.) 14 L. R. A. 107, and note; also People v. Brush Electric Illuminating Co., v. Wemple (N. Y.) 41 L. R. A.

Relator was a Maine corporation. But its principal business was carried on in Massachusetts. A branch of its business was located at Buffalo in New York state.

Further facts appear in the opinion.

Mr. Theodore E. Hancock, Attorney General, for appellant.

The respondent is not a corporation wholly engaged in carrying on manufacturing in the state of New York within the meaning of the corporation tax laws of the state.

The fact that the business is carried on by a corporation upon an enlarged scale, rather than by an individual, does not change the nature of the act itself.

This would apply to the taxes of 1894 and 1895.

Martin, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The principal and most important question involved in this case is whether the business conducted by the relator in this state was manufacturing, within the meaning and intent of the corporation tax laws, by the provisions of which manufacturing corporations carrying on "manufacture" within the state are exempt from the operation of the laws relating to corporation taxes.

Briefly stated, the principal business carried on by the relator was the purchasing of sheep and lambs, slaughtering them, pulling the wool from the hides or pelts, selling it, selling the hides, taking from the animals the offal, including the blood and legs, converting it into fertilizer, and then reducing the carcasses to a temperature which would retard decomposition, and shipping them to the place of delivery in refrigerator cars. We think this does not constitute "carrying on manufacture," within the spirit and meaning of the statutes.

The business conducted by the relator was obviously that of purchasing, slaughtering, and selling sheep and lambs. While it utilized the hides, the wool, the tallow, and the offal, as well as the carcasses of these animals, yet, to say that refrigerated mutton, rendered tallow, pulled wool, or untanned hides were manufactured articles would be quite incorrect. The words of a statute are to be given their natural, plain, obvious, and ordinary signification. To say that the relator was engaged in manufacturing mutton, wool, hides, or tallow would not be giving to the words "manufacture" or "manufactures" their ordinary and plain meaning. It may be that the fertilizer might be regarded as a manufactured article, but that was not the principal business in which the relator was engaged, but was a mere incident to it. Manifestly, none other of these articles was manufactured. At most, they were merely prepared for market and preserved until sold. We are clearly of the opinion that the relator was not a manufacturing corporation, nor engaged in "carrying on manufacture" in this state, within the spirit and meaning of the statutes.

Moreover, the principle of the decisions of this court is adverse to the contention of the respondent. People v. Knickerbocker Ice Co. 99 N. Y. 181; People, Union Pacific Tea Co., v. Roberts, 145 N. Y. 375. In the Knickerbocker Ice Company Case it was held that a corporation, engaged in collecting, storing, and preserving ice, of preparing it for market, and of transporting and vending it, was not a manufacturing corporation, under the provisions of the statute under consideration, and did not fall within the exception contained in it. In the Union Pacific Tea Company Case the relator was engaged in the sale of spices, baking powder, coffee, and tea. It purchased these articles in bulk, and the spices and baking powder were put up by it in packages for sale. Various kinds of tea were mixed together, and the compound was called and sold as "combination tea." The coffee was purchased in the raw bean, then roasted and ground, and in some instances different kinds were mixed together. The relator in that case claimed that it was a manufacturing corporation, and therefore exempt from the corporation tax, but this court held that the business carried on by it was not manufacturing, and that it was liable for the tax imposed. It is quite obvious, both upon principle and authority, that the relator in the case at bar was not a manufacturing corporation within the meaning of the corporation tax law, and the appellate division erred in holding otherwise.

Another ground upon which the respondent relies to defeat this appeal is that the decision of the controller in 1898, to the effect that the relator was not liable to taxation because it was a manufacturing corporation, was res judicata, and therefore the controller in 1897 was bound by that decision and estopped from holding otherwise. It appears from the record that in 1898 the relator applied to the controller for a cancellation of the taxes assessed against it for the years 1890, 1891, and 1892, upon the ground that it was a manufacturing corporation, and was engaged in no other business in the state of New York. That application was accompanied by the affidavit of an officer of the company, describing the business that was conducted in this state by the relator. On the hearing in the present case there was testimony to the effect that an officer of the relator came to Albany in November, 1898, to see the then controller in relation to the taxes thus assessed; that they went over the whole subject, and that subsequently, on December 1, 1898, the deputy controller wrote the relator a letter, which was to the effect that it was the opinion of the department that the relator was exempt from the taxes assessed by reason of its being a manufacturing corporation wholly engaged in carrying on manufacturing within the state of New York. It is to be observed that the assessment under consideration included none of the years for which the former assessment was made. Thus, the single question presented seems to be whether the determination of an assessing or taxing officer that an assessment made for one particular year should be canceled for the reason that the property was not subject to assessment, is conclusive upon succeeding officers against assessments for subsequent years upon the same property or franchise. Officers upon whom the duty of making assessments for the purpose of taxation is imposed are independent public officers, exercising public powers, charged with special public duties, possessing no jurisdiction as agents of the state, and for whose acts the state is not liable. Nor is the state responsible for any mistake or misfeasance by them in the performance of their duty. Mechem, Pub. Off. § 28; Lorillard v. Monroe, 11 N. Y. 392, 63 Am. Dec. 120. The statute imposes on such officers the duty to perform certain distinct and definite acts. By the statute under consideration, the duty was imposed upon the controller to tax every corporation, joint stock company, or association doing business in the state except certain corporations and institutions among which were manufacturing corporations carrying on manufacturing within the state. If, in 1894, 1895, and 1896, the relator was actually engaged in carrying on a business within the state which was not that of manufacturing, and, consequently, did not fall within any exception in the statute, then it was the plain duty of the controller to assess it for a corporate tax as provided by statute, and the fact that, through misapprehension or otherwise a former controller had refused or neglected to discharge his duty as such taxing officer could not interfere with or prevent a discharge of his duty by the present controller. In other words, this statute imposes upon the controller the duty of assessing upon corporations which are liable therefor the tax provided for by statute in each year during which they are liable to such assessment, independent of any action by a former controller. We are aware of no principle which would justify this court in holding that, because a former controller erroneously decided that the relator was not liable to be assessed for the years 1890, 1891, and 1892, the right to assess it for subsequent years was forfeited, or that the exercise of that right was in any way barred.

While it may be true that, where actions are brought involving a question as to the validity of a tax imposed under some particular statute, the determination of the question upon which its validity depends may become res judicata in a subsequent action, we think there is no ground for holding that the action of a mere assessing officer in determining that property is exempt from assessment for one year concludes the state as to the taxes imposed in subsequent years, and prevents other assessing officers from complying with the clear and plain requirements of the statute. We are of the opinion that the action of the controller, in 1893, in no way affected or estopped the controller, in 1897, from assessing a proper corporation tax upon the relator, and that the determination of the appellate division cannot be sustained upon that ground.

Another contention of the respondent is that the controller erred in the basis upon which this tax was assessed. That it was based upon the dividends of the relator is not denied. But the particular claim of the respondent is that its dividends were earned in its business transacted outside of the state of New York, that its business conducted in the state was without profit, and, consequently, that the dividends could form no proper basis for the assessment. The answer to that contention is that the statute declares the basis upon which the assessment is to be made, and makes no distinction as to the locality where the money was earned which was divided. We find nothing in the statute to justify the contention of the respondent.

We think the tax was properly assessed, that the basis adopted was the correct one, that the order of the Appellate Division was wrong, that it should be reversed, and that the determination of the controller should be affirmed.

All concur.

APPEAL by defendants from an order of the Appellate Division of the Supreme Court, Third Department, reversing an order of the Special Term for Albany County refusing to award a writ of mandamus to compel defendants to restore relator to his position as an employee in the capitol building. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. T. E. HANCOCK, Attorney General, and G. D. B. HASBROUCK, for appellants:

The supreme court has no jurisdiction to coerce the executive department of the government into obeying its writ of mandamus.

The governor is mentioned in the public building law eo nomine, and the duties are placed upon him because they are confided to his superior wisdom and character, and where such is the case the duty is executive.

Rice v. Austin, 19 Minn. 103, 18 Am. Rep. 330.

There is no case which goes to the extent of holding that the discretionary powers of an executive can be controlled by the court, but there are some cases holding that where the function is purely ministerial it can be controlled.

There is no distinct and separate public office—as trustee of public buildings; those words describe a function rather than officials, and the duties of trustees are eo nomine put upon the governor, and wherever duties by law are so devolved they are held to be on the executive and unenforceable by mandamus.

Messrs. Wallace & Nolan, for relator:

The relator was removed from his position for other causes than "incompetency and conduct inconsistent with the position held," and was deprived of his rights under chapter 716 of the Laws of 1894.

People, Corrigan, v. Brooklyn, 149 N. Y. 225, and authorities cited; People, Wardrop, v. Adams, 51 Hun, 588.

Admitting all the defendants attempted to show, it only establishes that this particular elevator was closed temporarily, not that it was abolished.

This was no justifiable excuse for the absolute and permanent discharge of relator.

People, Fonda, v. Morton, 148 N. Y. 156.

Defendants retained many other men who were not veterans to do the same and similar work. They were bound to prefer relator.

McCloskey v. Willis, 15 App. Div. 594; Re Sullivan, 55 Hun, 289; People, O'Connor, v. Adams, 53 Hun, 141.

The board of trustees of public buildings may be mandamus under chapter 716, Laws of 1894.

High, Extr. Legal Rem. 4.

The relator does not ask too much in asking for damages in this proceeding.

Section 2088 of the Code of Civil Procedure provides for an award of such damages.

People, Deverell, v. Musical Mut. Protective Union, 118 N. Y. 101; People, Goring, v. Wappingers Falls, 151 N. Y. 886.

If in any respect relator has asked too much, the final writ may award what relief the facts warrant.

People, Keene, v. Queens County Supers. 142 N. Y. 271; Code Civ. Proc. § 2082.

Haight, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

For a number of years the relator had been employed in the capitol of the state as a laborer, engaged in the running of the senate elevator. On the 2d day of October, 1895, he claims he was discharged. After the expiration of about five months, he procured an alternative writ of mandamus to issue to the then trustees and superintendent of public buildings, requiring his reinstatement as laborer in the capitol, upon the ground that he was an honorably discharged Union sailor of the War of the Rebellion. To the alternative writ an answer was filed on behalf of the defendants, raising issue, which, upon the stipulation of the parties, was referred to a referee to hear, try, and determine. After taking the evidence submitted by the respective parties, the referee made his report, finding that the relator had been dropped from the pay rolls by reason of the shutting down of the senate elevators for repairs, and that he had not been removed. Thereupon the peremptory writ was refused by the special term. An appeal was then taken to the appellate division, where the order of the special term was reversed and a peremptory writ was issued.

At the time the relator procured the alternative writ of mandamus Levi P. Morton was the governor of the state, Charles T. Saxton the lieutenant governor, and Hamilton Fish the speaker of the assembly.

The public building law of 1893, chap. 227, as amended, provides that "the governor, lieutenant governor, and speaker of the assembly shall be trustees of public buildings." As such they are authorized to appoint a superintendent who, "subject to the approval of the trustees, may appoint all persons necessary in the maintenance department of the public buildings and grounds under his charge, and suspend and remove any of them, and prepare rules and regulations for their government."

It will be observed that, under the provisions of the statute, the governor, lieutenant governor, and speaker become trustees by virtue of their offices, and that whatever duties devolve upon them as such pertain to their respective offices.

Chapter 312 of the Laws of 1884, as amended by chap. 716 of the Laws of 1894, provides that, "in every public department and upon all public works of the state of New York, and of the cities, towns, and villages thereof, and also in noncompetitive examination under the civil service rules, laws or regulations of the same, wherever they apply, honorably discharged Union soldiers and sailors shall be preferred for appointment and employment; age, loss of limb, or other physical impairment which does not, in fact, incapacitate, shall not be deemed to disqualify them, provided they possess the business capacity necessary to discharge the duties of the position involved. And, in all cases, the person having the power of employment or appointment, unless the statute provides for a definite term, shall have the power of removal only for incompetency and conduct inconsistent with the position held by the employee or appointee; and, in case of such removal, or such refusal to allow the preference provided for in this act of and for any such honorably discharged Union soldier, or sailor, or marine, for partisan, political, personal, or other cause, except incompetency, and conduct inconsistent with the position so held, such soldier, sailor, or marine, so wrongfully removed, or refused such preference, shall have a right of action in any court of competent jurisdiction for damages as for an act wrongfully done, in addition to the existing right of mandamus; the burden of proving such incompetency and inconsistent conduct, as a question of fact, shall be upon the defendant."

A failure on the part of the officials to comply with the terms of this act in letter and spirit, is made a misdemeanor. It is now contended that the appellate division had no jurisdiction to award a mandamus in this case. Much has already been written upon the subject. The courts of most of the states in the Union have had it under consideration, and, while they uniformly agree that the courts have no right nor power to interfere with the governor upon questions involving his judgment and discretion, yet they differ widely as to the power to interfere with his ministerial action. We shall not attempt any extended digest of these cases. Among those tending to sustain the power of the court to compel the executive to perform a ministerial act are Martin v. Ingham, 38 Kan. 641; Harpending v. Haight, 89 Cal. 189, 2 Am. Rep. 432; Middleton v. Low, 30 Cal. 596; Tennessee & O. R. Co. v. Moore, 36 Ala. 380; Ohumassero v. Potts, 2 Mont. 242; Cotten v. Ellis, 52 N. C. (7 Jones L.) 545; State, Whitman, v. Chase, 5 Ohio St. 528; State, Loomis, v. Moffitt, 5 Ohio, 862; Magruder v. Swann, 25 Md. 212; Chamberlain v. Sibley, 4 Minn. 312.

Of the cases which support the contention that the courts are without jurisdiction to control executive action are the following: People, Sutherland, v. The Governor, 29 Mich. 320, 18 Am. Rep. 89; State, Bibbee, v. Drew, 17 Fla. 67; State, Loo, v. Towns, 8 Ga. 860; People, Bacon, v. Cullom, 100 Ill. 472; People, Billings, v. Bisell, 19 Ill. 229, 68 Am. Dec. 591; State, Lockwood, v. Kirkwood, 14 Iowa, 162; State, Oliver, v. Warmoth, 22 La. Ann. 1, 2 Am. Rep. 712; Dennett, Petitioner, 32 Me. 508, 54 Am. Dec. 602; State v. Stone, 120 Mo. 428, 23 L. R. A. 194; State, Gledhill, v. The Governor, 25 N. J. L. 331; Mauran v. Smith, 8 R. I. 192, 5 Am. Rep. 564; Bates v. Taylor, 87 Tenn. 319, 3 L. R. A. 316; 85 Tex. 632; Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 137, 2 L. ed. 60.

The ministerial duties which it has been held in different states may be compelled by mandamus are the commissioning of a clerk of a court, the issuance of a warrant for the attorney general's salary, the auditing of an officer's claim for expenses, the commissioning of officers chosen by the legislature, the issuance of state bonds to a railroad company, the authentication of a bill in the governor's possession as a statute, the issuance of a proclamation that a bank is authorized to begin business, and such duties imposed by statute upon the governor as might have been imposed upon another officer, when ministerial. On the other hand, in a large number of other states, it has been held that a mandamus will never issue against the governor, regardless of the duty imposed upon him by the Constitution or statute. In those cases it was considered to be against public policy and political necessity, and to be immaterial that the duty might have been imposed upon another person; that inasmuch as it was imposed upon the governor, his performance was an executive act, under the responsibility of his executive station, and under the sanctity of his official oath. Perhaps the leading case in support of the latter contention is that of People, Sutherland, v. The Governor, 29 Mich. 320, 18 Am. Rep. 89, in which the opinion was delivered by Judge Cooley. In that case the court was asked to compel the governor to perform the duty imposed upon him by statute, of certifying as to the completion of certain work. The judge says with reference thereto: "It is not claimed on the part of the relators that this court, or any other, has jurisdiction to require and compel the performance by the governor of his political duties, or the duties devolved upon him as a component part of the legislature. It is conceded that these, under the Constitution and laws, are to be exercised ac-according to his own judgment and on his own sense of official responsibility, and that from his decision to act, or decline to act, there can be no appeal to the courts. Nor is it pretended that where any executive act whatsoever is manifestly submitted to the governor's judgment or discretion such judgment or discretion can be coerced by judicial writ. What is claimed is, that where the act is purely ministerial, and the right of the citizen to have it performed is absolute, the governor, no more than any other officer, is above the laws, and the obligation of the courts, on a proper application to require him to obey the laws, is the same that exists in any other case where an official ministerial duty is disregarded. . . . There is no very clear and palpable line of distinction between those duties of the governor which are political, and those which are to be considered ministerial merely, and, if we should undertake to draw one and to declare that in all cases falling on one side the line, the governor was subject to judicial process, and in all falling on the other, he was independent of it, we should open the doors to an endless train of litigation. . . . However desirable a power in the judiciary to interfere in such cases might seem from the standpoint of interested parties, it is manifest that harmony of action between the executive and judicial departments would be directly threatened, and that the exercise of such power could only be justified on most imperative reasons." Again he says: "When duties are imposed upon the governor, whatever be their grade, importance, or nature, we doubt the right of the courts to say that this or that duty might properly have been imposed upon a secretary of state, or a sheriff of a county, or other inferior officer, and that inasmuch as in case it had been so imposed, there would have been a judicial remedy for neglect to perform it, therefore there must be the like remedy when the governor himself is guilty of a similar neglect. The apportionment of power, authority, and duty to the governor is either made by the people in the Constitution, or by the legislature in making laws under it; and the courts, when the apportionment has been made, would be presumptuous if they should assume to declare that a particular duty assigned to the governor is not essentially executive, but is of such inferior grade and importance as properly to pertain to some inferior office, and, consequently, for the purposes of their jurisdiction, the courts may treat it precisely as if an inferior officer had been required to perform it. To do this would be, not only to question the wisdom of the Constitution or the law, but also to assert a right to make the governor the passive instrument of the judiciary in executing its mandates within the sphere of his own duties. Were the courts to go so far, they would break away from those checks and balances of government which were meant to be checks of co-operation, and not of antagonism or mastery, and would concentrate in their own hands something at least of the power which the people, either directly or by the action of their representatives, decided to intrust to the other departments of the government."

In this state we have not found, nor has our attention been called to, any controlling authority upon the question. Under our Constitution the right of sovereignty rests in the people of the state, who, from time to time, delegate their power to rule to a government chosen by themselves, consisting of three departments, known as the executive, legislative, and judicial. In England the power of the King to govern was modified from time to time by various grants from him, and by Magna Charta under which the lawmaking power finally devolved upon Parliament, and the judicial power upon the courts created by law. This division of power was followed in the formation of our American governments. In our own state the common law was continued in force, except in so far as it has been altered by the Constitution or the legislature.

Under our Constitution the executive power of the state answers to that of the King, and devolves upon the governor during the term for which he is elected. The legislative power is vested in the senate and assembly, which take the place of Parliament, and the judicial power in the courts established in accordance with the provisions of the Constitution. The three great branches of government are separate and distinct, but are co equal and co-ordinate; their powers have been carefully apportioned; one makes the laws, another construes and adjudges as to the rights of persons to life, liberty, and property thereunder, and the third executes the laws enacted and the judgments decreed. While each department, in its sphere, is in a sense independent, each operates as a check or restraint upon the other. The acts of the legislature have to be presented to the executive for his approval. The courts may then construe the acts and determine their validity under the Constitution; and the executive may, in criminal cases, modify the actions of the courts by the interposition of his pardoning power. But in every case in which one department controls, modifies, or influences the action of another, it acts strictly within its own sphere, thus giving no occasion for conflict, and thus preserving the purpose of the original scheme of a division of power among the three co-ordinate branches of government, each operating as a restraint upon the other, but still in harmony.

As we have seen, the power of the King has been divided,—a portion delegated to Parliament and another portion to the judiciary,—but except as delegated to the legislative and judicial branches of the government, his common-law powers remain unchanged; and in our government have been transmitted to the executive.

Under the common law a writ of mandamus issued in the King's name to inferior courts, officers, corporations, or persons, requiring them to do a particular thing specified. It being issued in the King's name, did not run to himself, to Parliament, nor to the judiciary, except such inferior courts as the higher courts had the power to review. Under our Code the writ issues out of the court as an order of the court; but we have attempted by no provision of the statute to change the force and effect of the common law writ, nor its object and purpose. It therefore follows that the writ never issues to the executive or legislative branches of the government, nor to the judicial branch having general and final jurisdiction.

Again, it is the well-settled practice of the court not to determine abstract questions not involved in the litigation; or in regard to which it has no power to enforce its judgments and decrees.

The only way in which a mandamus can be enforced is by the commitment of the party who refuses to obey its commands as for a contempt. But the courts have no power to commit the governor for a contempt. They have no power over his person. He may be impeached, but there is no other way in which he may be deprived of his executive office. It is said, however, that it is not to be supposed that the governor will refuse obedience to the law; but the application in this case for the mandamus shows that he already has refused to do the act sought to be compelled by this writ.

But again, it is contended that in this case the executive is one of a board of officers, and that the board may be compelled to act by mandamus. Conceding him to be one of a board of public officers, the duty is one that devolves upon him by virtue of his office. If the courts have not power over his person to enforce its decrees in one case, they have not in the other.

We have already referred to the discussion of Judge Cooley in the Sutherland Case, with reference to the grade of duties imposed upon the executive, including ministerial acts, together with those involving executive judgment and discretion; and without repeating his argument here, it seems to us that his reasoning is unanswerable and his conclusions correct.

While we are of the opinion that a mandamus will not issue to the governor to compel performance of an act by him, we see no reason for its not running, during the recess of the legislature, to the lieutenant governor and speaker of the assembly. During the session of the legislature, they, as members thereof, are not subject to arrest; and it may be that the courts, during that time, would not have the power to enforce their mandates against them; but, after the adjournment of the legislature, and the time has elapsed, given by the statute in which they are exempted, we think their obedience to the writ might be compelled by the courts. True, under the provisions of the Constitution, they in turn may succeed to executive power, upon the happening of certain events; but until they respectively become vested with the powers of the governor, they form no part of the co ordinate branches of the government, except, as we have already stated, when the legislature is in session.

There is another reason which must control our action in this case. As we have seen, the alternative writ of mandamus was issued during the administration of Governor Morton, when Saxton was lieutenant governor and Fish was speaker. The special term denied the writ, but, upon appeal, the appellate division reversed the order of the special term, and ordered the writ to issue to the governor, lieutenant governor and speaker then in office, who were the successors of those in office at the time the alternative writ was issued. This was done without notice to the new officials, and without bringing them in or making them parties to the proceeding. The act charged against the former officials was a misdemeanor, and punishable as such, and they were liable individually in damages to the party aggrieved. The delinquency charged is personal, and does not involve a charge against the state. It is not a claim prosecuted against the state in which it alone is interested, as where a mandamus is issued to a treasurer or controller of the state, to compel the payment of a claim against it, which is litigated by the officer for and in behalf of the state in which the courts have permitted the mandamus to issue to the successor in office. In cases in which the delinquency charge is personal, the petition for a writ of mandamus abates upon the death, resignation, or termination of office of the official charged, unless it is preserved by statute. Warner Valley Stock Co. v. Smith, 165 U. S. 28, 81, 41 L. ed. 621, 622, and cases there cited.

Under the provisions of our Code of Civil Procedure, § 755, a special proceeding does not abate by any event, if the right to the relief sought in such proceeding survives or continues; but this provision only applies to cases where the party dies after this act takes effect. There has been no death of a party in this case. Certain of the parties proceeded against have gone out of office, and it may therefore be doubted whether this section keeps the proceeding alive. But assuming for the purpose of this case that it does, and that the relator still has the right to prosecute his proceeding for his restoration, against whom must such proceeding continue? It cannot be continued against the old officers, for they no longer have power to restore him. It must, of necessity, therefore, be prosecuted against the new officers, for they alone have the power to reinstate him. It may be that the provisions of the Code fail to point out the precise practice that should be adopted by the relator in this case. But there is no apparent reason why the provisions of the Code controlling actions and special proceedings against county, town, and municipal officers, should not apply as well to state officers. The practice therein provided for is simple, and affords ample protection to all parties. Section 1930 provides: "In such an action or special proceeding, the court must, in a proper case, substitute a successor in office, in place of a person made a party in his official capacity, who has died or ceased to hold office; but such a successor shall not be substituted as a defendant, without his consent, unless at least fourteen days' notice of the application for the substitution, has been personally served upon him." As we have seen, no substitution has been made in this case.

The order of the Appellate Division should be reversed, and that of the Special Term affirmed, with costs.

Gray, Bartlett, and Martin, JJ., concur.

Vann, J., concurring:

I am of the opinion that a writ of mandamus cannot be issued against either the governor or lieutenant governor, because the imprisonment of either, which might follow a failure to obey the writ, would disturb the constitutional balance of power between the three great departments of government. As to the governor this is obvious, but the same reason applies to the lieutenant governor also, because at any moment by the death, resignation, inability, or absence of the governor the powers and duties of the office devolve upon the lieutenant governor. Whatever would interfere with his freedom of action when it became his duty to act as governor would interfere with the executive office itself, and might leave the state with no executive head able to act at a time of the greatest need. But while the Constitution as well as the courtesy due from one department of government to another, forbid the courts to command the governor to do this, or to refrain from doing that, it is still their duty to announce the law, but, under the circumstances, to withhold the command and leave the responsibility of complying with the law, as laid down by the courts, with the chief magistrate. It seems to me, therefore, that we should decide the appeal upon its merits, subject to the limitation suggested as to the form of the judgment to be pronounced.

Upon examining the record I think the relator was removed in violation of chapter 716 of the Laws of 1894, for the reasons given by the appellate division in its opinion (24 App. Div. 568).

The judgment appealed from should therefore be so modified as to simply adjudge that the relator was improperly removed and that he is entitled to immediate reinstatement without costs to either party as against the other.

O'Brien, J., dissenting:

The decision in this case, as expressed in the prevailing opinion, practically abrogates the statute which exempts veteran soldiers in the civil service from removal without legal cause. The defendants are the trustees of the state capitol under § 2 of chapter 227 of the Laws of 1893, and the superintendent of public buildings appointed by them, who has power, subject to the control of the trustees, to appoint, remove, or suspend persons in the employ of the state who are or may be engaged on the capitol force, or in the care of any of the public buildings. By chapter 716 of the Laws of 1894, honorably discharged Union soldiers must be preferred by the trustees and superintendent in making such appointments, and it is provided that removals of such discharged soldiers, after appointment, shall be made only for incompetency. In case a veteran is removed without such cause, or for partisan or political reasons, or refused a preference in making appointments, the statute gives a right of action to him for damages as for a wrongful act; in addition to the existing right of mandamus to enforce the commands of the statute.

In January, 1887, the relator, who is a veteran of the late war, was appointed an orderly upon the capitol. He was not appointed for a definite or limited time, and, therefore, under the statute, could not be removed except for incompetency. He was removed, however, in the month of October, 1895, in defiance of the statute, without legal cause or hearing. He applied to the court for a mandamus to correct the wrong and to assert the rights secured to him by law. In his application for the writ the relator alleged upon oath the following facts: (1) That he was an honorably discharged Union soldier. (2) That he was appointed an orderly on the capitol on January 8, 1887, and continued in that position till October 2, 1895, when he was discharged, as he alleges, for partisan, political, or other reasons than those allowed by the statute. (3) That the defendants have kept the relator out of his position ever since, and have refused to reinstate him. (4) That during all the time while so employed, he faithfully discharged his duties and was not incompetent, and did nothing inconsistent with his position. (5) That he was never notified of any cause for his removal or called on to answer any charge, and none was made. The only affidavit made in opposition to this application was by the superintendent, and he failed to deny any fact which the relator had stated. The other defendants did not answer at all. Consequently, there was no issue of fact before the court, but what was equivalent to a demurrer to the facts alleged by the relator. People, Superintendents of Poor, v. St. Lawrence County Supers., etc., 103 N. Y. 541; People, Port Chester Sav. Bank, v. Cromwell, 102 N. Y. 477; Haebler v. New York Produce Exchange, 149 N. Y. 414; People, Corrigan, v. Brooklyn, 149 N. Y. 215. He was, therefore, entitled to a peremptory writ, but as he had claimed, not only to be reinstated, but damages for his removal as well, an alternative writ was awarded.

The cause was then referred and tried by a referee. The issues were matters of law, really, though it was supposed that there was some question of fact, but just what question was not very clear. The referee found the following facts: (1) That the relator was a veteran. (2) That he was employed running an elevator at the capitol from February 1, 1887, to October 2, 1895. (3) That he was then dropped from the pay roll. Therefore, every material fact in the case was not only admitted by the pleadings but found by the referee.

But the learned referee held, as a conclusion of law, that although he had been dropped from the pay roll, he had not been removed, and he dismissed the writ with costs. The appellate division has reversed this judgment and directed that the relator be reinstated, in his position, without prejudice to his right to recover damages. This seems to me to be a very just and correct decision, and it ought not to be set aside by this court on any trivial ground.

My brethren, however, think the appellate division was wrong and the referee was right. The reasoning process by which this conclusion is reached does not impress me as sound in law or correct in morals; and, since it practically abrogates the statute by denying to the relator any right which it confers, I am constrained to dissent from the judgment and from every ground upon which it is placed. In my view the reasons stated for a reversal in this court of the decision of the court below are utterly untenable, and hence a brief discussion or review of them may not be out of place here.

(1) The first proposition, though really foreign to the case, is somewhat startling. The principle that a mandamus will not lie against the governor as a member of the board of trustees of public buildings created by the statute is announced as law in this state, I think, for the first time. It is broadly asserted that the courts have no power to compel the governor, when acting as a member of this board in appointing or discharging the necessary help in and about the capitol, to obey the statute. It is admitted that every member of the board is bound to obey it; but if the governor neglects or refuses to do his duty, or if he should disregard the statute, the courts, it is said, are powerless to protect the relator's rights by mandamus. This proposition is based upon the notion that there is something about the office of governor that places the occupant of the office for the time being above and beyond the law, or at least beyond the power of the courts to compel him by mandamus to obey the plain mandate of the statute in the appointment and removal of veteran soldiers. I take it to be an indisputable legal proposition that when the governor of this state accepts a legislative appointment as a member of a board of trustees with duties prescribed by statute, as the duties of this board clearly are, he is amenable to legal process at the suit of a private citizen, whose rights are affected by the action of the board, in the same way and to the same extent as any other member of the board. The principle has been so often asserted by the courts of the highest authority that it must disturb our confidence in the stability of law to find any doubt expressed about it.

In the famous case of Marbury v. Madison, 1 Cranch, 170, 2 L. ed. 71, Chief Justice Marshall stated the principle in a single sentence when he said: "It is not by the office of the person to whom the writ is directed, but the nature of the thing to be done that the propriety or impropriety of issuing a mandamus is to be determined." In Kendall v. United States, Stokes, 12 Pet. 595, 9 L. ed. 1209, the Attorney General of the United States, representing the government, stated the rule of law on this subject in the following language: "And, as the ordinary character of an officer's functions would not always determine the true nature of a particular duty imposed by law, he further agreed that if an executive officer, the head of a department, or even the President himself were required by law to perform an act merely ministerial, and necessary to the completion or enjoyment of the rights of individuals, he should be regarded, quoad hoc, not as an executive, but as a merely ministerial officer, and therefore liable to be directed and compelled to the performance of the act by mandamus if Congress saw fit to give the jurisdiction." The court, in its opinion in this case, said: "But it would be an alarming doctrine that Congress cannot impose upon any executive officer any duty they may think proper which is not repugnant to any rights secured and protected by the Constitution; and in such cases the duty and responsibility grow out of and are subject to the control of the law, and not to the direction of the President. And this is emphatically the case where the duty enjoined is of a mere ministerial character." In Louisiana Bd. of Liquidation v. McComb, 92 U. S. 531, 28 L. ed. 623, the court awarded a mandamus against a board of which the governor of the state was a member, and, referring to the power to do that stated the rule as follows: "But it has been well settled that when a plain official duty, requiring no exercise of discretion, is to be performed, and performance is refused, any person who will sustain personal injury by such refusal may have a mandamus to compel its performance." (p. 541, 28 L. ed. 628). This rule has been strictly adhered to by that court in a great variety of cases where the writ was applied for against executive officers of the government. United States Miller, v. Black, 128 U. S. 40, 32 L. ed. 354; United States, Boynton, v. Blaine, 139 U. S. 816, 35 L. ed. 186. The power of the courts to compel ministerial officers to perform official acts upon which the rights of individuals may depend is well settled in England. In the case of Ferguson v. Kinnoull, decided in the House of Lords the distinction between a judicial and ministerial act was clearly recognized. In that case, Lord Brougham, after denying that the judicial officers of courts of general jurisdiction were answerable for acts done within the limits of their jurisdiction for errors of judgment, used the following language: "But where the law neither confers judicial power, nor any discretion at all, but requires certain things to be done, everybody, whatever be its name, and whatever other functions of a judicial or of a discretionary nature it may have, is bound to obey; and, with the exception of the legislative branches, everybody is liable for the consequences of disobedience." 9 Clark & F. 251. In State, Whiteman, v. Chase, 5 Ohio St. 535, there was an application for a mandamus against the governor, in which eminent counsel were engaged. The power of the courts in that regard was there elaborately discussed and decided. It was held that the writ would lie against him at the suit of a private individual interested in the performance of the official act. The court was unanimous, and the result was summed up in the following language, which I conceive to be applicable to the case at bar: "The constitutional provision declaring that 'the supreme executive power of this state shall be vested in the governor,' clothes the governor with important political powers, in the exercise of which he uses his own judgment or discretion, and in regard to which his determinations are conclusive. But there is nothing in the nature of the chief executive office of this state which prevents the performance of some duties merely ministerial being enjoined on the governor. While the authority of the governor is supreme in the exercise of his political and executive functions which depend on the exercise of his own judgment or discretion, the authority of the judiciary of the state is supreme in the determination or all legal questions involved in any matter judicially brought before it. Although the state cannot be sued, there is nothing in the nature of the office of governor which prevents the prosecution of a suit against the person engaged in discharging its duties. . . . However, therefore, the governor, in the exercise of the supreme executive power of the state, may, from the inherent nature of the authority in regard to many of his duties, have a discretion which places him beyond the control of the judicial power, yet, in regard to a mere ministerial duty enjoined on him by statute, which might have been devolved upon another officer of the state, and affecting any specific private right, he may be made amenable to the compulsory process of this court by mandamus. The official act of the governor in question, in regard to issuing the proclamation asked for, is a duty prescribed by statute, not necessarily connected with the supreme executive power of the state, ministerial in its nature, and a duty which might have been enjoined on some other officer."

It would be quite sufficient to rest the question, I think, on our own decisions. In People, Fonda, v. Morton, 148 N. Y. 156, we reviewed the action of this very board of trustees, and no one then doubted our power. It is said that the point was not raised in that case; but the very fact that neither court nor counsel supposed that it contained such a question, or that there was anything in this point, goes far now to prove that it is but little more than an attractive novelty. It may, I think, be safely asserted that no respectable authority can be found to sustain the proposition that the courts are without power to enforce by mandamus the performance by the governor of an official act, ministerial in character, and not resting in discretion.

That the powers and duties of the governor as a member of the board of trustees of public buildings are purely ministerial is a proposition too plain for doubt. The four individuals composing the board had each one vote, and no member had any more power than the other. They were all doing precisely the same thing,—that is to say consulting, voting, and deliberating together. It is inconceivable that anyone can suppose that three of these were acting ministerially, while the acts of the other were executive. But here again it may be necessary to cite authorities.

In Gray v. State, Coghlen, 72 Ind. 568, it was held that a writ of mandamus will lie against the governor of the state to enforce the performance of a ministerial duty not resting in his discretion; that a ministerial act is one which a person performs in a given state of facts, in a prescribed manner, in obedience to the mandate of legal authority, without regard to, or the exercise of, his own judgment upon the propriety of the act being done.

Concerning the nature of the governor's act while serving upon such a board, the court defined it in the following very clear and concise language: "Any power or authority vested by legislation in the governor, together with other officers or persons, in which they are to have an equal voice with him, cannot be executive, as he alone is vested with the executive power of the state. Any duty which he is by law required to perform, in connection with others, in which they have an equal voice with him, can in no sense be said to be an executive duty. The governor and the other officers named in the act may well be regarded as constituting a board, organized by the legislature for the performance of certain duties, and a mandate will lie against them to enforce the performance." (Id. p. 578.)

I have said that there was no authority worthy of the name in favor of the contention that the executive of a state is beyond the power of the courts to compel the performance of an official act of a ministerial nature. I do not, of course, refer to cases which may be found where the writ was refused in the exercise of discretion. The case of State, Lou, v. Towns, 8 Ga. 370, is a leading case of that character. The court in an able opinion demonstrated its power to grant the writ against the governor, but refused to exercise the power for political reasons and as matter of discretion. The cases cited in the prevailing opinion to sustain the reversal are all cases of that character.

This court cannot deal with matters of discretion. The court below has exhausted the discretion which courts have in mandamus cases. It has exercised the discretion and granted the writ, and the only question that we can review is whether it had power in that respect. That it had, is to my mind a proposition so clear that I will forbear to discuss it further. I have called attention to a few leading cases, not desiring to enlarge the discussion by reference to numerous others of the highest authority, all holding the same way.

I am not willing to indorse the principle that the maxim which tells us that the King is the fountain of justice and mercy, and can do no wrong, has any application to the elected servants of the people of this state. It originated when Kings were supposed to rule by divine right, but anyone who believes for a moment that it implied the immunity of persons in high seats of power from obedience to the laws, has failed to read correctly the history of the people from whom the maxim has been borrowed. On the contrary, the courts of that country have for ages announced and enforced the principle that no one was so high as to be above the power of the law, or so low as to be beneath its protection. This principle has been transmitted to us, and in the administration of justice it has superseded the ancient maxim that the King can do no wrong.

Nor can I admit for a moment that the judicial power of this state is so feeble as to be unable to reach with its process, in the enforcement of its lawful judgments and decrees, every citizen within its territory, from the governor to the humblest workman, and one as well as the other. The notion that the rights of a citizen cannot be declared and enforced against a ministerial board of which the executive happens to be a member, because he may call out the military and naval forces of the state to resist the judgment of the court, is too trivial for serious consideration. It is the duty of the court to declare what the law is, without fear or favor, and let consequences take care of themselves. Courts cannot with any self-respect frame their judgments upon the view that some power may refuse to submit to the mandate of the law or may resist it. The sheriff has the power of the county behind him, and the mayor of a great city the police force, but no one ever supposed that their power to resist a mandamus was any reason for refusing it to a party otherwise entitled to it. A legal principle resting on the assumption that the executive will refuse to obey the courts, must necessarily be unsound. It implies a want of that freedom of action on the part of the judiciary which is always necessary for its efficiency. If the courts may be deterred from deciding what the law is to such cases, upon some remote possibility that the executive power will resist the execution of the judgment, it would follow that a mandamus should never go against anyone possessing the physical or political power to resist its commands, but should be confined to those who are too weak to defy it. Such vague or imaginary fears have no proper place in the discussion of questions upon which legal rights depend. I doubt very much that this state ever had an executive that would agree with my brethren with respect to this immunity from judicial authority, and it is to be hoped that it never will have. The proposition that there is or may be one man in the state so far above his fellow citizens that the courts cannot reach him, in a case like this, where there is no discretion, sounds very much like a voice from the middle ages, or the decree of the Roman senate in its declining days, when it declared the Emperor above the laws.

It is only a short time since the courts fined all the members of a board composed of all the state officers for disobeying a mandamus, and this court affirmed their action. People, Platt, v. Rice, 144 N. Y. 249. If it so happened that the governor had been a member of that board, then, according to the prevailing opinion, the courts would be powerless, since all the other members could shelter themselves behind the executive prerogatives. The court below was not able to sanction such sophistry, and I am bound to say that the rugged good sense of their decision ought to receive at least some commendation from this court.

(2) But even if the governor was beyond the power of the courts, there are still three other members of the board, constituting a working majority, that no one claims to be exempt from control by mandamus. They have the power, and it is their duty, to execute and obey the statute with respect to veterans, and to give to the relator his rights under the law. What reason can this court give for reversing the judgment as to them? Absolutely none that, in my opinion, has the slightest force or weight in law, and this can be made quite clear by a brief review of the grounds upon which the decision of the court below is to be reversed. That ground, as will be seen, consists of questions of practice, and questions of discretion, with none of which this court has anything to do. Combined in such a way as to produce what is supposed to be a legal error, it is only necessary to separate the constitutional elements upon which the decision rests in such a way that each proposition may be reviewed by itself, and on its own merits. It will then be seen how feeble the argument is upon which the relator is defeated in the assertion of his just rights under the law.

It is suggested that as three members of the present board were not parties to the original proceeding, but came into office afterwards, the writ was improperly awarded against them. There are several conclusive answers to this point. (1) A party who has proceeded by mandamus against a continuing board or public body for the assertion of a right is not compelled to revive it whenever the personnel of the board is changed by resignation or expiration of official term of the members, or any of them. The relief is to be awarded against the board as an official body, and the fact that the individuals composing it are also named is of no consequence. The proceedings do not abate upon every change of membership, but when, as in this case, there is a continuing duty, irrespective of the incumbent, the writ is properly directed to the board as then constituted, and who have the power to redress the wrong. Any other rule would be, as the courts have often said, sacrificing substance to form, so that the final process of the court was properly directed to the members of the board in office when the decision was made. People, Case, v. Collins, 19 Wend. 56; People, Shaut, v. Champion, 16 Johns. 61; People, Heiser, v. Gilon, 121 N. Y. 551; Thompson v. United States, 103 U. S. 480, 483, 26 L. ed. 521, 523; State v. Madison, 15 Wis. 90, 87; State, Bushnell, v. Gates, 23 Wis. 210, 214; High, Extr. Legal Rem. § 88. (2) If the relator in entering the judgment directed the process against the wrong persons or against persons not parties to the action, that is no ground of appeal to this court. It was simply a misuse of the writ, to be corrected by motion in the court from which the process issued. This court might as well entertain an appeal from a judgment on the ground that the execution was issued against the wrong party. It can deal only with questions of law. The writ should certainly go against either Governor Morton and his associates or Governor Black and his fellow members of the board. That is a question of practice with which this court has nothing to do. Certainly not upon an appeal from this judgment. (3) The case comes here now with the present members of the board named as defendants. It does not concern this court how they came into the case. Presumptively they came in in the proper way. They came into the case after the issues were tried and decided. For aught we can know they were substituted in open court on the consent of counsel. If their names were improperly used in the writ they could have moved to correct the papers. No one ever claimed that, or claims it now. Just how an error of law, reviewable in this court upon appeal from the judgment, can be evolved from the fact that the relator or his attorney inserted in the writ the names of the present members of the board who are in office, in place of the former members who are not in office, is quite difficult to perceive. The present members have appealed from the judgment, and if they have never in fact or in law been made parties to the record they have no right to appeal. (4) When the reasons for reversing this judgment are fairly analyzed it will be seen that they may be summed up in two propositions: (1) The governor being a member of the board and exempt from direction by mandamus the other three members are exempt also. The immunity of the governor from the duty of obedience to the law is imparted, in some incomprehensible way, to his associates, and the result is that the law is powerless to grant the relator any relief, although he has clearly shown that his rights have been disregarded. Of course, if this proposition be sound, the judicial power to compel boards or ministerial bodies to obey the law may be always paralyzed as to all such bodies in the state by making the governor a member ex officio, or otherwise. This is rather an alarming principle, and I am quite sure that it has no sanction in reason or law, and equally clear that no respectable authority can be found to sustain it. (2) The other point is that the present members of the board have not been substituted on notice. I have already answered that, but it may not be amiss to refer to it again. How do we know that they were not regularly and properly substituted? We find their names in the writ, and that is all we know, or can know, about it. An order substituting parties in an action, with or without notice, is not reviewable in this court, since it is a mere practice order, and if not, then by what process of reasoning can some real or imaginary irregularity in that respect be made a ground for reversing a judgment? If anything in that respect was done in the court below irregularly, the obvious remedy is to move to correct it in that court. It has nothing whatever to do with the legal merits of the questions decided by that court, and which alone we have the power to review. All the court below decided was that the relator, being a veteran, was removed in defiance of the statute, and was entitled to be restored to his place. It is to be regretted that this court should feel bound to reverse a judgment so obviously correct upon mere points of practice or procedure having no proper relation to the real controversy, and with which this court, in my opinion, has nothing whatever to do.

I am, therefore, in favor of affirming the judgment below.

Parker, Ch. J., agrees with Haight, J., that mandamus should not issue against the governor, but concurs with O'Brien, J., that it was properly issued against the other defendants, and advises that the order be modified accordingly, and as so modified affirmed.

NORTH CAROLINA SUPREME COURT.

GOLDSBORO WATER COMPANY, Appt.

(.....N. C.....)

1. Discrimination in rates charged to consumers by a water company is unlawful, as the business is affected with a public use.
2. A schedule of maximum rates in a contract by a city with a water company does not bind consumers to the payment of such maximum rates, if they are unreasonable.

(May 24, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendant from an order of the Superior Court for Wayne County continuing to the hearing an order restraining defendant from cutting off a supply of water to complainants for refusal to comply with certain requirements of the company. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John W. Hinsdale, for appellant:

Competition may fairly control the fixing of water rates.

Interstate Commerce Commission v. Alabama Midland R. Co. 168 U. S. 145, 42 L. ed. 414.

A water company has the right, at common law, to discriminate in its charges, provided none are unreasonable.

A water company is under no higher responsibility than a common carrier.

All the consignor can demand of the common carrier is that his goods shall be carried at a reasonable rate, not necessarily at an equal rate with all others. But when the reduced rate is either intended to or has a natural tendency to injure the plaintiff in his business and destroy the trade, then a necessary exception is engrafted on the more general rule, and the plaintiff has then the right to insist that rates to all be made the same for goods shipped "under like circumstances."

It is doubtful whether a water company is bound to serve all of its customers at uniform rates.

29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 19, says: "The acceptance by a water company of its franchise carries with it the duty of supplying all persons along the lines of its mains, without discrimination, with the commodity which it was organized to furnish. All persons are entitled to have the same service on equal terms and at uniform rates," citing—

Messrs. Allen & Dortch, for appellees:

Property used for the purpose of supplying water to a municipality and its inhabitants is used for a public purpose, or, as some of the 41 L. R. A.

authorities say, "is affected with a public interest."

Lumbard v. Stearns, 4 Cush. 62; 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 898.

Being used for a public purpose the owner cannot act capriciously or oppressively, but must supply water upon fair and reasonable terms.

It must act with equal justice to all, and for the same service give a uniform rate.

29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 19.

Being property dedicated to a public use the legislature has the right to regulate its use, and to say, within certain limitations not material here, what is a reasonable charge, and in the absence of legislative action this power belongs to the courts.

Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant corporation is the owner of a plant which supplies water to Goldsboro and its inhabitants, under a franchise granted by the city. It has no competition. The complaint alleges that, to prevent competition, the defendant reduced its rates largely to certain parties, who threatened to establish a rival company, but not only did not make a corresponding reduction to the plaintiffs and other customers, but proposes to put in meters whereby the rates to plaintiff and others will be greatly increased, and threatens to cut off the water supply of the plaintiffs if they do not pay the increased rates, which will be to their great injury; that the rates charged by the corporation are not uniform, and those charged the plaintiffs are unjust and unreasonable. The defendant denies, as a matter of fact, that the rates charged the plaintiffs are unreasonable, and contends, as a proposition of law, that the company's rates are not required to be uniform, and that it can discriminate in the rates it shall charge. It also relies upon the schedule of rates contained in the contract with the city, and avers that the charges to the plaintiffs do not exceed the rates therein permitted.

The defendant corporation operates under the franchise from the city, which permits it to lay its pipes in the public streets, and otherwise take benefit of the right of eminent domain. Besides, from the very nature of its functions, it is "affected with a public use." In Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, which was a case in regard to regulating the charges of grain elevators, it was held that in England from time immemorial, and in this country from its first colonization, it was customary to regulate ferries, common carriers, hackmen, bakers, millers, public wharfingers, auctioneers, innkeepers, and many other matters of like nature, and where the owner of property devotes it to a use in which the public has an interest, he, in effect, grants to the public an interest in such use, and must to the extent of that interest submit to be controlled by the public. Probably the most familiar instances with us are the public mills, whose tolls are fixed by statute, and railroad, telegraph, and telephone companies, for the regulation of whose conduct and charges there is a state commission, established by law. There have been reiterated decisions in the United States Supreme Court, and in the several states affirming the doctrine laid down in Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77, and as to every class of interest affected with a public use; among others, water companies. Spring Valley Waterworks v. Schottler, 110 U. S. 347, 28 L. ed. 178. The right of fixing rates is a legislative function, which the courts cannot exercise; but it is competent for the courts, certainly in the absence of legislative regulation, to protect the public against the exaction of oppressive and unreasonable charges and discrimination. "The franchise of laying pipes through city streets and selling water to the inhabitants thereof, being in the nature of a public use or natural monopoly, . . . [the company cannot act capriciously or oppressively, but must] supply water to all impartially and at reasonable rates. . . . And an injunction may be issued to prevent it from cutting off its water supply where the consumer has offered to pay a reasonable rate, and the company demands an unreasonable one." 2 Beach, Priv. Corp. § 834c; Munn v. Illinois, 94 U. S. 113, 24 L. ed. 77; Lumbar v. Stearns, 4 Cush. 60. In 29 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, 19, it is said: "The acceptance by a water company of its franchises carries with it the duty of supplying all persons along the lines of its mains, without discrimination, with the commodity which it was organized to furnish. All persons are entitled to have the same service on equal terms and at uniform rates." If this were not so, and if corporations existing by the grant of public franchises, and supplying the great conveniences and necessities of modern city life, as water, gas, electric light, street cars, and the like, could charge any rates, however unreasonable, and could at will favor certain individuals with low rates, and charge others exorbitantly high, or refuse service altogether, the business interests and the domestic comfort of every man would be at their mercy. They could kill the business of one, and make alive that of another; and, instead of being a public agency created to promote the public comfort and welfare, these corporations would be the masters of the cities they were established to serve. A few wealthy men might combine, and, by threatening to establish competition, procure very low rates, which the company might recoup by raising the price to others not financially able to resist,—the very class which most needs the protection of the law; and that very condition is averred in this complaint. The law will not and cannot tolerate discrimination in the charges of these quasi public corporations. There must be equality of rights to all, and special privileges to none; and if this is violated, or unreasonable rates are charged, the humblest citizen has the right to invoke

While the defendant cannot charge more than the rates stipulated in the ordinance granting it the franchise, because granted upon that condition, those rates are not binding upon consumers who have a right to the protection of the courts against unreasonable charges. Since the Constitution of 1868 (art. 8, § 1), if the rates had been prescribed in a charter granted by the legislature, they would be subject to revocation, and, indeed, independently of that constitutional provision. Stone v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 116 U. S. 307, 29 L. ed. 636; Pennsylvania R. Co. v. Miller, 132 U. S. 75, 33 L. ed. 267; Chicago, M. & St. P. R. Co. v. Minnesota, 134 U. S. 418, 33 L. ed. 970; Georgia R. & Bkg. Co. v. Smith, 70 Ga. 694; Winchester & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Croxton, 98 Ky. 739, 33 L. R. A. 177. Still less can these rates bind consumers if unreasonable or discriminating, since the town had authority to grant the franchise, but not to stipulate for rates binding upon the citizens. The legislature did not confer that power. The rates are binding upon the company as a maximum simply, because, acting for itself, it had the power to accept the franchise upon those conditions. Singularly enough, it appears incidentally in the evidence furnished by the defendant that, in the towns in North Carolina which do not own their waterworks, the maximum rates charged consumers are from 50 to 800 per cent more than the maximum rates charged consumers in Wilson and Asheville, the only towns which own their waterworks.

The allegations of fact that the rates are unreasonable and oppressive are denied. That they are not uniform is not denied, and the defendant contended that it had the right to discriminate, which cannot be sustained. On the final hearing, the cost and value of the property will be material in determining as to the reasonableness of the rates charged. Smythe v. Ames (known as the "Nebraska Case,") U. S. 1898, 169 U. S. 466, 42 L. ed. 819. The evidence offered on that point on the hearing below is not satisfactory, the mere amount of mortgage bonds issued on the property being no reliable guide to the courts as to the true value of the investment. It may be, as sometimes happens, that the bonds and stocks are watered. Nor is the evidence of the cost of construction and operation conclusive, as has often been held, for it may be that the work was extravagantly constructed, or is operated under inefficient management, and the public are not called on to pay interest upon such expenditures, in the shape of unreasonable or extortionate rates. Missouri P. R. Co. v. Smith, 60 Ark. 221, 5 Inters. Com. Rep 348; Chicago & G. T. R. Co. v. Wellman, 143 U. S. 339, 36 L. ed. 176; Covington & L. Turnp. Road Co. v. Sanford, 164 U. S. 578, 41 L. ed. 560.

The court below properly continued the cause to the hearing.

BINGHAM SCHOOL, Appl.,

v.

Preston Lewis GRAY et al.

(.....N. C.....)

1. A break in the operation of a school after it has been carried on for many years at a certain place by persons belonging to one family does not forfeit the right of the proper representative of the family to revive the school at the same place, as against another member of the family who has, during the cessation of the school at that place, opened a school in another part of the state which he claims to be the successor of the original school.
2. The incorporation of a school under the name of the proprietor does not confer the exclusive right to use that name for a school, or prohibit other persons bearing the same name from using it in connection with other schools which they may establish.
3. The goodwill of a school which belongs to one of the persons forming a corporation to conduct it under his name becomes the exclusive property of his estate on the expiration of the corporation.
4. The use of the name "William Bingham School," by the widow and children of William Bingham, does not give cause for complaint to one who conducts a school called the "Bingham School" in another part of the same state.

(May 17, 1896.)

APPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the Superior Court for Buncombe County in favor of defendants in a suit to enjoin the use of a name in alleged conflict with plaintiff's rights. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Merrimon & Merrimon, John W. Graham, and R. W. Bingham, for appellant:

It was perfectly competent for William Bingham, in 1872, when he withdrew from the school, to verbally turn over all interests he had in it and in the corporation to Robert Bingham and William B. Lynch.

Menendez v. Holt, 128 U. S. 514, 521, 522, 32 L. ed. 526, 527, 528.

Even if William Bingham did not verbally turn over all his interests in the school and corporation, there cannot be any doubt of the fact that he withdrew from the school in 1872, and never took any active part in it after that time, and that the school and all its corporate rights and franchises were, after that time to the present time, in the actual, open, notorious, exclusive, uninterrupted, and unequivocal possession of Robert Bingham and William B. Lynch until Lynch withdrew, and then of Robert Bingham until the present time.

There was no property belonging to the school; its value consisted in its name and its goodwill. The name belonged to the corporation and not to William Bingham, for he had voluntarily procured the legislature to confer it upon the corporation. The goodwill necessarily remained with the corporation.

NOTE.—For name as part of goodwill of business, see Vonderbank v. Schmitt (La.) 15 L. R. A. 462, and note; also Snyder Mfg. Co. v. Snyder (Ohio) 51 L. R. A. 657.

A corporation will be protected in the use of its name.

1 Thomp. Corp. § 296.

William Bingham gave all his property of every sort and description to his wife during her natural life or widowhood.

If this will conveyed any interest in the school or in the name of the school, or in the goodwill, such interest was personal property, and conferred upon the widow the absolute title.

There can be no remainder after a life estate in personal property.

If the widow had an interest, the moment Robert Bingham took exclusive possession and control a right of action accrued to her, and this right of action was barred in three years.

Whether the defendants have any interest in the school or not, considering the name and goodwill as property of the corporation, and the defendants as representing their father entitled to be considered as incorporators, still the corporation is entitled to the relief asked for in this suit.

Messrs. R. O. Burton and R. T. Gray, for appellees:

This is not a case of trademark, but of alleged unfair competition in trade or business.

In such cases the fraudulent intent must be conclusively shown. It is not enough that the public are deceived or liable to be deceived. The court must be satisfied the deception is continued and intended.

Relief in such cases is granted only where the defendant, by his marks, signs, labels, or in other ways, represents to the public that the goods sold by him are those manufactured or produced by the plaintiff, thus palming off his goods for those of a different manufacture, to the injury of the plaintiff.

Under the act of 1864, the Bingham school was either a partnership or a corporation. If a corporation, William Bingham was one of the corporators, if not the only one. He never disposed of his interest. This interest passed to his next of kin and wife. If only a partnership, the name was merely a tradename—part of the goodwill; and upon dissolution each of the parties had a right to use it. This right passed to his wife.

Mr. F. S. Blair also for appellees.

Clark, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The court below found as facts: Rev. William Bingham established a classical school at Wilmington, North Carolina, in 1793, which he subsequently removed to Chatham county, and thence to Orange county, North Carolina, where said school was conducted by him up to his death, in 1835. It was then continued by his oldest son, William J. Bingham, till 1857, when he associated with him his two sons William Bingham and Robert Bingham, till 1861, when the latter entered the Confederate army, and shared its fortunes until the end came, in 1865. In 1864, William J. Bingham, on account of ill health, gave up teaching, and his son William Bingham procured the school to be incorporated by the legislature as the "Bingham School." "William Bingham and those who may be associated with him" being named as the incorporators in said charter. In the articles of agreement made between William Bingham and William B. Lynch and Stuart White, whom he "associated with him" under the above charter provision, it is stipulated: "Nothing herein contained shall prejudice the original and ultimate right of property in the name of said school pertaining to William Bingham, as the representative of the name and reputation of the school." In 1865, Stuart White retired from the school, selling out his interest to William Bingham, and Robert Bingham assumed his place as teacher and member of the corporation. The school was removed to Mebane, North Carolina, and conducted by the two Bingham and Lynch till 1872, when William Bingham withdrew from actual participation in the school work, and died in 1873. In 1879, Lynch sold out to Robert Bingham, who conducted the school under his sole management, the widow of William Bingham conducting the boarding department, till 1891, when Robert Bingham removed the school to Asheville, North Carolina, and has conducted it there till the present time. The charter expiring, Robert Bingham had the school again incorporated by act of the legislature in 1895. On the death of William J. Bingham, in 1866, he left his school property to his two sons; and on the death of William Bingham, in 1873, he left all his property to his widow for life, and after her death to his children. Robert Bingham qualified as executor under the will of his brother, William Bingham, and settled up the estate, but did not account to the estate or the legatees thereof for any interest they might have in the goodwill or name of the Bingham School. The defendants are the widow and children of William Bingham, and are conducting a school at Mebane, North Carolina, on the site of the old school, and under the style of the "William Bingham School," and in their catalogues and advertisements claim that the school was organized in 1793, and they assert that the school is one of the rightful successors of the name and reputation of the school founded and conducted by the Bingham family since 1793, and maintain that they have the right to style themselves the "Bingham School," should they so desire.

Upon the above facts, the court below properly adjudged that "neither the plaintiff corporation nor Robert Bingham is the sole and exclusive owner of the name and reputation of the school organized by William Bingham in 1793, and conducted by that family continually till 1864; that defendants, acting under the authority of the widow and children of William Bingham, deceased, have a rightful share in the name and reputation of said school, and are of right entitled to use the name of 'William Bingham School of Orange County, North Carolina,' and to claim that their school is one of the successors of the school established in 1793;" and dissolved the restraining order which had been previously granted at the instance of the plaintiff.

As the defendants are the widow and children of William Bingham (or those acting under their authority), who are conducting the school on the old site at Mebane, we see no ground upon which the plaintiff can ask that they be prohibited from styling the school, if they wish, the "Bingham School," and most certainly no reason why the plaintiff should enjoin their using the present style, the "William Bingham School," to which the plaintiff can lay no claim, and which is sufficiently distinctive from the plaintiff's title. That the plaintiff is incorporated as the "Bingham School" does not give it the exclusive right to that name. Another corporation might be created by and operated under the same title, when not in the same locality, in the absence of proof of an intent to injure the first-named corporation, or to avail itself fraudulently of the other's good name and reputation. Where there was a Fulton National Bank in New York, and a Fulton National Bank was subsequently opened in Brooklyn, the former could not enjoin the latter. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 21 Abb. N. C. 104.

As a rule, a trademark cannot be taken in a surname, and anyone named "Bingham" could start a school called the "Bingham School," in the absence of proof of intent to injure or fraudulently attract the benefit of the good name and reputation acquired by a previously existing "Bingham School" (Brown Chemical Co. v. Meyer, 139 U. S. 540, 35 L. ed. 247; 2 Beach, 119, § 763); and certainly there could be no confusion between a Bingham School at Asheville and a school even of the identically same name at Mebane, N. C. (Investor Pub. Co. v. Dobinson, 82 Fed. Rep. 56). But in truth the doctrine of trademark can have no application, except reasoning by analogy, which is often deceptive. This is a case of the right to goodwill. The corporation running the school recognized in 1864 that the goodwill was the individual property of one incorporator, William Bingham. Being a corporation, and not a partnership, that goodwill did not pass to the other corporators. The doctrine as to the passing of goodwill to the remaining partners on the retirement of one has no application, as in Menendez v. Holt, 128 U. S. 514, 32 L. ed. 526. On the expiration of the corporation, in 1894, this goodwill was still the property of the widow of William Bingham, to whom all his property went by his will. She could use it by putting it in a new corporation, or by joining in a school without incorporating it. In like manner, in the well-known instance of the Blackwell Manufacturing Company, the right to the brand was the individual property of one of the stockholders. All the realty and buildings used in connection with the Bingham School, from its removal to Mebane, in 1864, down to the removal of Robert Bingham to Asheville, in 1891, were the property of William Bingham till his death, and then of his widow and children, except about 8 acres sold to Robert Bingham by them in 1875, with a covenant in the deed that the land so conveyed should be used solely to erect thereon a residence for himself and academic buildings (the latter to be used by the Bingham School at a reasonable rent), and for no other purposes, with provision that the grantors should have the refusal should Robert Bingham at any time desire to sell said realty.

The right of Robert Bingham to operate a "Bingham School" is because of his bearing the name, and also because of an act incorporating the school by that name. He has no title to the goodwill of the former Bingham School, and his claim that the school at Asheville is the sole successor of the Bingham School established in 1793 cannot be sustained. His claim that his school is one of the successors thereof will not be restrained because the defendants have not asked it, and perhaps, even if asked, the courts would not enjoin it, as the damage is intangible, since it could not be shown that its use at that distant locality has perceptibly damaged the goodwill of the school at Mebane, which passed to the defendants. The incorporation of the Bingham School at Asheville, North Carolina, has only the usual effect of a charter, i. e. to confer the corporate rights of perpetual succession, suing and being sued, exemption from personal liability of stockholders, and the like. It did not have the effect of creating a trademark of the Bingham name, and of conferring the exclusive right to use it, in connection with school purposes, upon that corporation, nor is it a prohibition upon all others named Bingham, whether of that family or of any other of the same name, using it in connection with any school they might establish. Such an idea was foreign to the legislative mind, and it is beyond the scope of the powers of the state legislature to establish a monopoly in the family name or to confer a patent right in its use.

As to the right to claim to be a successor of the school "established in 1793," it belongs to the defendants, to say the least, fully as much as to the plaintiff. Up to 1864 there had been unbroken succession in the school taught by the Bingham, and in that year the sole right as successor appears by the agreement among those then teaching to have devolved upon William Bingham, the husband of one of the defendants and father of the other defendants, Robert Bingham having left the school in 1861. This right exclusively in William Bingham in 1864 was recognized by Robert Bingham entering the corporation subject to that agreement. It was not sold by him as executor of William Bingham, and is not shown to have passed by sale or otherwise, in William Bingham's life, to Robert Bingham. The incorporation of 1895, as we have seen, conferred, and could confer, no such right of transfer. That act was purely for incorporation,—nothing more. If, since 1865, Robert Bingham has continuously taught in the school, and since 1872 as its head, he has the benefit of that, but that does not make him the sole heir to the name and reputation acquired from 1793 to 1872. There was a break in his own connection with the school from 1861 to 1865, and there was a decided break in the continuity of the school by the removal of it to a distant point in 1891, and he fails to show any acquisition by him of the exclusive right held by William Bingham from 1864 to his death. This presumably went to the widow of William Bingham, under his will. The break in the operation of the Bingham School at Mebane, after 1891, was not a forfeiture of the right to revive the school there as a successor of the school founded by the same family in 1793. Still less did it transfer the exclusive right to use the name of "Bingham School" upon Robert Bingham (or the corporation), operating a school at Asheville. There can be a generous rivalry between the two schools, respectively, at Asheville and at Mebane, to show, by superior teaching, which is a successor, in the truest sense, to the celebrated "Bingham School," which has been so long an honor and a service to our state. There is room for good service by both. Neither can restrain the other in the use of the name (2 High, Inj. § 1070), and each may claim a nominal successorship to the school originally founded in 1793.

No error.

STATE of North Carolina

v.

SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY et al.,
Appls.

(.....N. C.....)

1. Circumstances and conditions which surround two persons are not dissimilar so as to relieve a railroad company from the prohibition of Acts 1891, chap. 320, § 4, against discriminating in rates between persons under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, merely because one is a high official, or a larger shipper, or a politician of power, whose influence may be of service to the company, and the other is not.

2. An intention to violate the law prohibiting free transportation of favored passengers is not essential to constitute a violation of Acts 1891, chap. 320.

3. The intent with which an act is done is immaterial, when the act is denounced as unlawful by statute.

4. The clearly expressed prohibition of free transportation of favored passengers in Acts 1891, chap. 320, cannot be modified by any practical construction put upon the law by the carrier and officials who have received passes.

(Douglas, J., dissents.)

(May 24, 1898.)

A PPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the Superior Court for Wake County convicting them of unlawful discrimination in the transportation of passengers. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. F. H. Busbee for appellant.

Mr. W. C. Douglass, for the State:

The offense under § 2, Interstate Commerce Act, of giving free transportation to an individual, consists in charging, demanding, collecting, or receiving by the carrier from some other person or persons a compensation for a like service when none is contemporaneously charged or received from the person thus transported free.

Griffes v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 194.

Free transportation issued in the form of an annual pass to a person not in the regular and stated service of the carrier, nor receiving any wages or salary under a contract of employment, but requested by him as compensation for throwing in its way what business he conveniently could, is held to be illegal.

Slater v. Northern P. R. Co. 2 Inters. Com. Rep. 248; Re Boston & M. R. Co. 3 Inters. Com. Rep. 717.

When an act forbidden by law is intentionally done, the intent to do the act is the criminal intent which imparts to it the character of an offense.

Messrs. Cook & Green also for the State.

Montgomery, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant company was indicted for an unlawful discrimination in the transportation of passengers, under § 4 of chapter 320 of the Acts of 1891,—the railroad commission act. Section 4 of that act is in the following words: "That if any common carrier subject to the provisions of this act shall directly or indirectly, by any special rate, rebate, drawback, or other device, charge, demand, collect or receive from any person or persons a greater or less compensation for any service rendered or to be rendered in the transportation of passengers or property subject to the provisions of this act than it charges, demands, or collects or receives from any other person or persons for doing for him or them a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, such common carrier shall be deemed guilty of unjust discrimination, which is hereby prohibited and declared to be unlawful." Section 25 of the act is written as follows: "That nothing in this act shall prevent the carriage, storage, or handling of property free or at reduced rates for the United States, state, or municipal governments, or for charitable purposes, or to or from fairs and exhibitions for exhibition thereat, or the free carriage of destitute and homeless persons transported by charitable societies and the necessary agents employed in such transportation [or the free transportation of persons traveling in the interest of orphan asylums or any department thereof], or the issuance of mileage, excursion or commutation passenger tickets; nothing in this act shall be construed to prohibit any common carrier from giving reduced rates to ministers of religion, or to municipal governments for the transportation of indigent persons, or to inmates of national homes or state homes for disabled volunteer soldiers and of soldiers' and sailors' orphan homes, including those about to enter and those returning home after discharge, under arrangements with the boards of managers of said homes; nothing in this act shall be construed to prevent railroads from giving free carriage to their own officers and employees, or to prevent the principal officers of any railroad company or companies from exchanging passes or tickets with other railroad companies for their officers or employees."

The bill of indictment was in form as follows: "The jurors for the state upon their oath do present that on the 1st day of July, in the year of our Lord 1897, the Southern Railway Company was a corporation operating a line of railway from Goldsboro to Charlotte, in said state, and doing the business of a common carrier in the state of North Carolina subject to the provisions of chapter 320 of the Public Laws of 1891, and that the said Southern Railway Company required and received of persons traveling over its line of railway a regular first-class passenger fare of three and one quarter (3¼) cents per mile for each passenger. And the jurors aforesaid do further present that the said Southern Railway Company on the day and year aforesaid, and at and in the county aforesaid, unlawfully and wilfully did collect and receive from one H. L. Grant a less compensation for the transportation of said H. L. Grant from the city of Raleigh to the town of Goldsboro, in said state, than it collected, demanded, and received for the transportation of other passengers from the city of Raleigh to the said town of Goldsboro, for a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of passengers in its first class carriages, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions. And the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, do say that the said Southern Railway Company did then and there wilfully and unlawfully and unjustly discriminate in the collection of passenger fares in favor of the aforesaid H. L. Grant, and against other persons to whom like and contemporaneous service was rendered, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state. And the jurors aforesaid, on their oath aforesaid, do further present that on the 1st day of July, in the year of our Lord 1897, the Southern Railway Company was a corporation operating a line of railway from Goldsboro to Charlotte, in said state, and doing business of a common carrier in the state of North Carolina, subject to the provisions of chapter 320 of the Public Laws of 1891, and that said Southern Railway Company demanded and received a regular passenger fare of three and one quarter (3¼) cents a mile for passengers traveling in its first class carriages over its line of railway. And the jurors aforesaid do further present that the said Southern Railway Company on the day and year aforesaid, and at and in the county aforesaid, wilfully and unlawfully did make and give undue and unreasonable preference and advantage to one H. L. Grant, by then and there carrying the said H. L. Grant as a passenger free of charge over its line of railway from the city of Raleigh to the town of Goldsboro, contrary to the form of the statute in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the state." The jury rendered a special verdict, in which they found the following facts: "That the defendant is a corporation carrying on the business of a common carrier in the state of North Carolina, and operates a railroad, part of which line lies between the cities of Raleigh and Goldsboro, in said state; that during the year 1897 the defendant, through its vice president, issued to one Hiram L. Grant, who was a member of the general assembly of North Carolina, an annual free pass, which was accepted as valid for transportation in the state of North Carolina; that on the 1st day of July, 1897, the said Hiram L. Grant was, on the presentation of this annual pass to defendant's conductor, transported free by the defendant between the cities of Raleigh and Goldsboro, in said state; that upon the train there were persons who paid for their transportation at the rate of 8½ cents per mile for first-class passengers; that during the greater part of the year 1897 passes of substantially like character were issued to the chief executive, and to the state officers and to members of the railroad commission, as they had been for many years previously, and were accepted and used by them in the same manner as by the said Grant; that the members of the railroad commission are charged with the duties as set forth in chapter 320 of the Acts of 1891; that the officer of defendant who issued the annual pass was advised by counsel and by members of the railroad commission that he was not violating the law of the state; there was no actual intent to violate the law upon the part of the officer of defendant issuing the pass." Judgment was pronounced on the special verdict against the defendant, and the minimum penalty was imposed.

The question presented for our decision is, Does the act prohibit and make indictable the giving of free transportation to passengers by common carriers? Upon its face, clearly, it does not in all cases, because in § 25 the giving of such free transportation, or transportation at reduced rates, to certain classes of persons, therein particularly specified, is allowed; but the person who received free transportation in this case did not come within either of the exceptions of the statute. In the argument here the counsel of the defendant company contended that the defendant had not violated the provisions of the statute: First, because there was no intention on its part to violate the law; second, that the statute does not in express terms forbid the giving of free transportation to passengers, and that, if the general assembly had intended such prohibition, that body ought to have made known its purposes in clear and unmistakable language; third that the giving of free transportation to a particular person, while it charged (for like and contemporaneous service) another person the prescribed rate of fare, is not an unjust discrimination, and that thereby no injustice is done to the person who pays his fare, for he has only paid what the law declares a fair price for the service rendered; fourth, that the deadhead and the paying passenger do not necessarily stand "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions," as contemplated in the statute; and, last, that the act itself has received an almost universal and practical construction in accordance with the foregoing views, by the habit of railroad companies generally giving free passes since the enactment of the law, just as they did before, to "gentlemen long eminent in the public service, higher officers of the state, members of the legislature, members of the railroad commission," etc.

The crucial point in the case is centered around the defendant's contention and assumption that the "like and contemporaneous service" in the transportation of two individuals (one carried free, and the other for the prescribed tariff rate) is not necessarily "under substantially similar circumstances and conditions;" that is that the company can take into consideration, as to whether it will give free transportation to a passenger, the circumstances and conditions which surround two persons, and if one is a "higher official" or a large shipper, or a politician of power whose influence may be of service to the company, or one of social distinction, and the other a laborer, then the conditions and circumstances are not the same, and therefore the statute does not apply. Of course, if this contention of the defendant is sound, this case is at an end, and the free transportation of passengers is therefore in no case unlawful. So we will examine that position of the defendant, first in order: What, then, in respect to the transportation of passengers in connection with the statute, is meant by the words "substantially similar circumstances and conditions?" It cannot be doubted that if each of two persons desired to ship 1,000 pounds of freight, of like kind, over a railroad, between the same points, and at the same time, the company must render the same service at the same rate to both, whether one of the shippers was a politician with a "pull," or a "higher official," or a member of the legislature or of Congress, or a laborer. Beyond question, that would be a like and contemporaneous service in the transportation of a like kind of traffic, under "substantially similar circumstances and conditions." In our opinion, § 4 of the act in plain words prohibits the making of a greater charge against one person than against another for a like and contemporaneous service under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, applicable to the carriage of both passengers and property. The language is so clear "that he may read who runs." In contemplation of § 4 of the statute, the only possible difference between two individuals is that in relation to the size of their bodies; but this can have no bearing upon the matter of transportation, as the difference in size or weight of persons (over a certain age) has not yet been regarded, in the business "of hauling passengers," as ground for making difference in passenger rates. Boiled down, the contention of the defendant on this point is just this: If one person should be the governor of the state, a member of Congress, or of the general assembly, or a leader in what is called the business or the social world, and the other is an ordinary toiler for his bread, a case of substantially dissimilar circumstances and conditions exists, and the company may give the favored ones free transportation for their influence, and charge and receive from the other full fare, because he has no influence. Can it be supposed for a moment that the general assembly of North Carolina would enact a law—a law purporting to protect the great body of the people against inequality and unjust discrimination on the part of railroad companies—based on such class distinctions? This contention of the defendant, if it could be maintained, would simply divide the people of the state, not into the sheep and the goats, the good and the bad, and reward or punish them by giving to one and withholding from the others free passes, but into those whose influence is considered valuable to the corporation, on the one part, and the remainder of the people, on the other, and then giving to the first-named class the privilege of using the public franchise free, while it extorts from the latter the full rates allowed by law; the extortion consisting in making those least able to bear it pay the cost of transporting the well-to-do and influential. That position of the defendant cannot be maintained.

We will now consider the other positions of the defendant:

It was insisted that the company was ignorant of the provisions of the law in respect to the prohibition of the free transportation of passengers, and that it had no intention to commit the offense with which it is charged; and counsel dwelt especially upon that finding in the special verdict in which the jury said: "There was no actual intent to violate the law upon the part of the officer of defendant issuing the pass." Who was the officer of the company who issued the pass, and who put into the hands of the dead-head passenger the piece of paper which secured his free transportation, that his intention should be inquired into? Probably some local attaché. What notice does the law take of his intentions or purposes in the matter before us? The thing which was denounced by the statute, and for which the defendant is indicted, is not the act of giving the free pass,—the mere handing to the passenger the piece of paper on which was written a privilege of riding free,—but the act of transporting the favored passenger without charge or the payment of fare. The law would be violated if no pass was actually issued, if the passenger was carried free. The favored passenger might be known personally to the conductor, or be made known to him by preconceived signs, or mileage books distributed gratis or sold at reduced rates; and in other ways the law might be violated. But we leave the matter of the handing over by the officer of the free pass to the passenger, and his intention in so doing, as it has no bearing in the case; and we will take up the question of the intent of the acting, working, planning corporation in its giving the free transportation.

If there is anything well settled by the decisions of this court, it is that, wherever an act is denounced as unlawful by statute, the doing of that act constitutes the offense, and the intent with which the act is done is immaterial; and this has been settled law for a long period of time. In the case of State v. King, 86 N. O. 603, the court said: "When an act forbidden by law is intentionally done, the intent to do the act is the criminal intent which imparts to it the character of an offense; and no one who violates the law, which he is conclusively presumed to know, can be heard to say that he had no criminal intent in doing the forbidden act." In State v. McBrayer, 98 N. C. 619, it is held that when the statute plainly forbids an act to be done, and it is done by some person, the law implies conclusively the guilty intent, although the offender was honestly mistaken as to the meaning of the law he violates. In State v. Voight, 90 N. C. 741, the court said: "The criminal intent is inseparably involved in the intent to do the act which the law pronounces criminal." To the like effect are the decisions in State v. Kittelle, 110 N. C. 560, 15 L. R. A. 694; State v. Downs, 116 N. C. 1064; State v. Chisenhall, 106 N. C. 676; State v. Scoggins, 107 N. C. 959, 10 L. R. A. 542; State v. McLean, 121 N. C. 589. It is to be observed that, in the section of the act under which this defendant was indicted, neither the word "intent," nor any word synonymous with the word "intent," was used. The act simply denounced the unjust discrimination. And, besides, § 25 of the act excepts from the provisions of § 4 certain carefully specified classes of persons and such explicit enumeration of the excepted classes absolutely and necessarily excludes all other persons. It is true that in the bill of indictment the word "willfully" was used in connection with the discrimination, and it was insisted for the defendant that a vicious or covinous intent on its part was necessary to be proved. But that did not follow, even if such intent had been alleged in the indictment. It would have been surplusage. State v. Edwards, 90 N. C. 710; State v. Keen, 95 N. C. 647. "It is only where the statute makes the particular intent an essential element of the crime that it need be charged and proved." State v. Mc-

Carter, 98 N. C. 637. As to the plea of ignorance of the statute in reference to unjust discrimination between passengers, it is only necessary to cite some of the numerous decisions of this court on that point. In State v. Downs, 116 N. C. 1064, the court said: "Ignorance of the law excuses no one, and the vicarious ignorance of counsel has no greater value." State v. Boyett, 32 N. C. (10 Ired. L.) 386. The law does not encourage ignorance in either. State v. Dickens, 3 N. C. (1 Hayw.) 406. If ignorance of counsel would excuse violations of the criminal law, the more ignorant counsel could manage to be, the more valuable and sought for, in many cases, would be his advice. But, how is it possible to seriously consider that the defendant acted in this matter in ignorance of the law. It is not too much to say, in a judicial opinion, that the defendant is represented in its legal department by many of the best equipped lawyers in the country; and it would be a most violent presumption to say, or even to think, that they were not thoroughly posted as to the laws, state and Federal, concerning the interests and liabilities of their clients under this statute. Through their counsel, the defendant must have been acquainted with the act of Congress concerning interstate commerce, and the rulings of the Commission (interstate) upon the act; and that act, in § 2, is in the very words of the fourth section of the act of our general assembly (Acts 1891, chap. 320),—the law under which the defendant is indicted. The defendant could hardly be ignorant, in fact, of the decided cases reported by the Interstate Commerce Commission on the matters about which the defendant is before the court. In the case of Grieffe v. Burlington & M. River R. Co. in Nebraska, before that commission (2 Inters. Com. Com. 301) [2 Inters. Com. Rep. 194],—the report and opinion filed nearly ten years ago,—it was held, in effect, that free transportation to a passenger was in contravention of § 2 of the Act (United States) to Regulate Commerce; that section being, as we have said, identical with § 4 of the act of our general assembly of 1891. In the same volume (page 359 [2 Inters. Com. Rep. 243]) in the case of Saler v. Northern P. R. Co. it was declared that free transportation, furnished on an annual pass, to a person not embraced in one of the excepted classes, was illegal. In that case, it was further said by the Commission: "Carriers can reward persons, not in their stated and regular employment, for occasional services, or for benefits indirectly received, in other and better ways than by furnishing them with free transportation. . . . It may be said that a pass costs the carrier little or nothing, and that, when the goodwill and occasional good words of a person who is able to influence the direction of traffic can be obtained so cheaply, it is a hardship to prevent the carrier from making use of the opportunity; but the evils in the unrestricted employment of free passes by common carriers had grown so great, and had become so apparent, both to the public and to the carriers themselves, that it was deemed by Congress to be absolutely necessary to eradicate the whole system from interstate commerce, in order to put an end to the abuses which had grown beyond the limits of any other regulation or control. The law was framed, accordingly, prohibiting the giving of free transportation to passengers carried under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, as an unjust discrimination under the general terms employed; with only the exceptions made in § 22. . . ." In the Third Annual Report of the Interstate Commerce Commission (vol. 3, p. 300 [2 Inters. Com. Rep. 667] filed November 30, 1889), it is stated that "the statute [Interstate Commerce Act] undoubtedly was framed to prohibit passes or free transportation of persons, as one of the forms of unjust discrimination, favoritism, and misuse of corporate powers that had grown into an abuse of large proportions, and become demoralizing in its influence, and detrimental to railroads, both in loss of revenue and in provoking public hostility. One of the minor and meaner phases of this abuse is the distinctive preference shown in various ways by employees, both in service and civility, to holders of passes, as if discrimination by free carriage includes discrimination in treatment of passengers. It is well known that persons who were carried free were, to a large extent, precisely the persons who had no claim whatever to such favors. They were officials and others, from whom free passes might be expected to secure reciprocal favors, and men of wealth and prominence, who rode at the expense of others less able to pay, or the passes were given to influence business. In nearly all cases not specially exempted by the act, the motive in demanding or in giving them was one deserving of no favor. . . . The principle of equality under like conditions for the traveling public had been grossly violated by the railroads. Favored persons or classes of persons had been furnished free transportation at the expense of the general public by higher general charges to reimburse for gratuitous carriage." It is of interest to observe that it appears from that report that the returns of the railroad companies embraced therein show the largest number of interstate free passes issued were designated as "complimentary." The next most numerous class embraced steamship and transportation lines, officers (Federal, state, and municipal), palace car companies, and newspapers. Of state free passes, the largest number were issued to members of legislatures; drovers with "complimentaries," next; and United States, state, and municipal officers, newspapers, and shippers, next in numbers. In the investigation of this subject, as it affected the Boston & M. R. Co. (5 Inters. Com. Com. 69 [3 Inters. Com. Rep. 717], Dec. 1891), it was decided by the Commission that the giving of free passes to others than those embraced in the exceptions was illegal. The opinion of the Commission was in the following words: "The construction we give to § 2 of the Act to Regulate Commerce is that, where the service by the carrier subject to the act is 'like and contemporaneous' for different passengers, the charge to one of a greater or less compensation than to another constitutes unjust discrimination, and is unlawful, unless the charge of such greater or less compensation is allowed under the exceptions provided in § 22, and that, where the traffic is 'under substantially similar circumstances and conditions' in other respects, it is not rendered dissimilar, within the meaning of the statute, by the fact that such passengers hold unlike, or, as sometimes termed, unequal, official, social, or business positions, or belong to different classes, as they ordinarily exist in a community, or are arbitrarily created by the carrier. Under this construction of the act, the practice of the defendant in giving free transportation, such as it concedes was issued to 'gentlemen long eminent in the public service,' 'higher officers of states, and prominent officials of the United States,' 'members of legislative railroad committees,' 'persons whose goodwill is important to the corporation,' is unwarranted, unless the favored person also comes under some exception specified in § 22 of the Act to Regulate Commerce." In this matter it was that Mr. Richard Olney (afterwards attorney general under Mr. Cleveland), who represented the Boston & Maine Railroad Company, stated in his brief that Mr. Chandler, who brought the proceeding for the People, was inspired to make the charges in the complaint by "personal spite and political considerations." The report goes on, however, to say that Mr. Chandler made a reply not without interest or point. In the same decision the Commission said further: "Other utterances and decisions of the commission to the same legal effect have been made every year since its organization, and its construction of the act has been indicated by its repeated recommendations to Congress to add other classes of persons to the exceptions (as they were always regarded by the Commission) contained in § 22. We find not only these views held by the Commission from its organization, but by the Federal courts, when the question has arisen." The case of Harrey v. Louisville & N. R. Co. reported in 5 Inters. Com. Com. 153 [3 Inters. Com. Rep. 793], closes with the following declaration: "The fundamental and pervading purpose of the law is equality of treatment. It assumes that the railroads are engaged in a public service, and requires that service to be impartially rendered. It asserts the right of every citizen to use the agencies which the carrier provides on equal terms with all his fellows, and finds an invasion of that right in every unauthorized exemption from charges commonly imposed. No form of favoritism and no species of partiality seem more odious or indefensible, than that which accords to personal influence or public station privileges not enjoyed by the community at large. The free carriage of certain persons merely because they occupy official positions or have acquired some measure of distinction, offends the rudest conception of equality, and contravenes alike the policy and the provisions of the statute."

As to the last position of the defendant (that is, the alleged practical construction which the common carriers and the favored passengers have put upon the statute,—the first giving and the last receiving free transportation just as they did before the enactment of the statute, and assuming that the general community have adopted that as the proper construction of the law), we have nothing to say, except that it would seem to all reasonable minds that such a construction could not be the proper one, and that the law, as often construed by the Interstate Commerce Commission, which construction seems true to us, is a just and wholesome law. In the face of the clearly expressed provisions of the law, and in the face of the repeated constructions of that part of the Federal statutes regulating interstate commerce, which is in precisely the same words in which our statute is framed upon the point now before us, the defendant took its chances. It has, in doing so, violated the criminal law of the state and must abide the consequences, as all others ought to do who break the laws. It must be presumed that common carriers know well what they are doing in this matter. They are not, and neither do they wish to be considered, charitable institutions. They are corporations formed for profit and gain. And whenever they grant a thing of value,—free transportation to a passenger not embraced in the excepted classes specified in the act,—they must be acting, as they think, on business principles, expecting a return upon their investments. If in pursuing their business interests they violate the law, they must abide the result.

There is no error, and the judgment is affirmed.

Douglas, J., dissenting:

I feel compelled to dissent from the judgment of the court, but in doing so I wish to express my unqualified concurrence in the able opinion of Justice Montgomery, except in so far as it necessarily conflicts with what is said herein. That free transportation, under whatever device it may be given, is prohibited by the act of 1891, unless covered by the statutory exceptions, is unquestionable, and I am glad that it has now been settled by a unanimous court. Such a construction is in strict accordance with the settled rules of judicial interpretation and with the highest principles of public policy. It is currently reported that 100,000 passes were issued in the state of North Carolina within the year 1897. Of our three leading railroad systems, one reported over 15,000 passes issued, while another reported 80,000. The defendant herein, the largest system of all and having a direct pecuniary interest of vital importance before the legislature, refused to make any report, relying upon its legal exemption from compulsory self crimination. Taking the estimate of 100,000 passes as correct, as it is 397 miles from Raleigh to Murphy, on the west, and still further to Elizabeth City, on the east, it is fair to assume that each pass would represent at least 100 miles of travel, equal to $8 25 in fare. This would represent the equivalent of $825,000 a year given to somebody, but to whom we do not know, and for what purpose we need not inquire. These figures may not be correct, but they are the best obtainable under the circumstances. It is needless to suppose that transportation of such great pecuniary value would be given without some return, either present or prospective; and, in any aspect its continuance would be unjust to the public interest, and dangerous to the public welfare. Free transportation to so large an amount would necessarily place an additional burden upon the travelling public to make up the deficiency, while its irresponsible distribution would be a serious menace to public morality. So far, I fully concur in the opinion of the court; but, to convict a person charged with crime, it is requisite not only to determine that a crime is committed, but also that the defendant is guilty of the crime. The defendant here admits the free transportation, but pleads want of intent. Ordinarily the admission of the forbidden act would be conclusive evidence of guilt; as in misdemeanors at least, the intent to commit the act is the criminal intent, unless the statute itself constitutes the intent the gravamen of the offense. In this action, however, there seem to me so many peculiar circumstances that have never happened before, and may never happen again, as to take the case out of the usual rules of construction, and force us to regard it avi generis. If the act itself forbade the issuing of passes in express terms, it would be an end of the question. But it does so only by implication, as is shown in the opinion of the court. It is true, it seems to us a clear and necessary implication; but it evidently did not seem so to the higher officers of state and members of the legislature who accepted these passes. We can scarcely ask a clearer insight into the law, and a nicer sense of propriety from the soulless corporation than we do from those who make and enforce the law. This act was ratified March 5, 1891,—more than seven years ago. Since then we have had four different legislatures, three governors, and seven different railroad commissioners, as well as two complete sets of solicitors. I do not mean to impute any improper motive to these men, many of whom I personally know, and whose names and characters are too well known to need any vindication from me; but is it not possible that the defendant may have been honestly misled in issuing passes to them, from the mere fact that they would receive them? The giving of a pass is only malum prohibitum, and not malum in se, and is neither as to the one that receives it. There is nothing innately wrong in it, further than that it is prohibited by law, and may lead to dangerous abuses. Moreover, § 5 of the act under consideration provides that the railroad commissioners "shall make such just and reasonable rules and regulations as may be necessary for preventing unjust discrimination in the transportation of freight and passengers on the railroads in the state." It was the imperative duty of the commission, without any outside suggestion, to make all just rules necessary for carrying out all the provisions of the act, the proper enforcement of which was the sole object of their official existence. We have held, in State, Caldwell, v. Wilson, 121 N. C. 425, 472, that the commission is an administrative, and not a judicial court; and this view is still more strongly expressed by the Supreme Court of the United States in Rengan v. Farmers' Loan & T. Co. 154 U. S. 362, 394, 88 L. ed. 1014, 1023, 4 Inters. Com. Rep. 560, 568, where it says: "Such a commission is merely an administrative board created by the state for carrying into effect the will of the state as expressed by its legislation." It is their duty to actively enforce the law, and to prevent, and, if necessary, prosecute, all violations thereof that may come to their knowledge in any manner. They are the active instruments of its enforcement, and are not merely required to construe it upon a sworn complaint. For the purposes of their creative act they are the grand inquest of the state, and should diligently inquire, and true presentment make, of all its violations. Any other construction of their powers and duties would destroy their usefulness, and make the Commission a mere excrescence upon the judicial system of the state. As a court, their powers are very limited; but as a commission they are charged with grave and responsible duties of the greatest importance to the state, and are clothed with ample powers for their performance. While they may be compelled to appeal to the courts for the ultimate enforcement of their decisions, they possess powers beyond the jurisdiction of any court, and which, if properly exercised, may be made of inestimable value to the people. The mere fact of thorough investigation, and consequent publicity, of existing abuses, will strongly tend to their correction. The jury find in their special verdict "that the officer of defendant who issued the annual pass was advised by counsel and by members of the railroad commission that he was not violating the law of the state;" "that there was no actual intent to violate the law upon the part of the officer of defendant issuing the pass." They further find that during the year 1897 passes were issued to members of the railroad commission, which, using the plural, must mean a majority of the commission, of whom there are only three. In a case of doubt, where the act was not expressly prohibited in words by the statute, to whom better could the defendant have gone than to those charged in express terms with its enforcement? What more positive answer could it have received than the answer of a majority of the commission that it was not unlawful, coupled with the personal acceptance of a pass? I do not question the integrity of the commissioners. They were doubtless honestly mistaken,—misled, perhaps, by the universal custom throughout the United States; but so, also, may have been the defendant. Is it not fair to say that it was innocently misled? The possible results of an adverse decision to the defendant are practically beyond calculation. If it has issued 50,000 passes a year for the two years within the statute, it is not probable that over 40,000 were issued to the excepted classes, leaving at least 60,000 violations of law. This would subject it to penalties of which the minimum would be $60,000,000 and the maximum $300,000,000. It is true this may not be the result. Solicitors may not prosecute. The executive may pardon, or the legislature may condone. But with this I have nothing to do. Upon the special verdict rendered in this case, and in view of the exceptional circumstances that force themselves upon our attention, I think that the defendant should be held not guilty, purely upon the ground of intent. This would end the matter, as hereafter there would be no honest mistake. As this court has now held that free transportation outside of the excepted classes is a violation of the act, no matter under what form or device it may be given, the mere performance of the act will hereafter be deemed conclusive evidence of its guilty intent. I am aware that in arriving at my conclusions I have been forced to ignore some of the general rules of judicial construction, but under the exceptional circumstances, appealing so strongly to my judgment, I do not feel that we should permit the bar sinister of an ironclad rule of interpretation to lie in cold obstruction across the conscience of the court.

NORTH DAKOTA SUPREME COURT.

v.

G. A. GROVER et al., Respts.

(7 N. D. 460.)

1. An insolvent debtor made a deed of trust, in which his creditors joined. By the terms of the deed, the trustee was to continue the business of the debtor as long as he should deem it for the interests of the creditors so to do. The entire management and control of the business were intrusted to him. Whenever the trustee deemed it best to discontinue the business, the property was to be sold, and the claims of all the creditors signing the deed were to be paid from the proceeds; the surplus, if any, to go to the debtor. Held, that the creditors signing the deed did not thereby render themselves the real proprietors of the business, and, therefore, that they were not liable to creditors of whom the trustee had purchased goods in the prosecution of such business. The relation created by the instrument was that of trustee and beneficiary, and not that of principal and agent.

2. Ordinarily a trustee is himself personally liable on all contracts made by him as trustee.

3. In exceptional cases he may, by express contract, prevent his becoming personally responsible; charging the liability on the trust fund itself.

4. Even when this has not been done the creditor may, under peculiar circumstances, proceed against the trust property, either in the hands of the trustee, or of the beneficiary himself.

Corliss, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendants are sought to be held liable for goods sold to the trustee under an instrument creating a trust. The theory of plaintiff's counsel is that in the purchase of such goods the trustee was the mere agent of the defendants, who themselves were the real traders on whose behalf the business was being carried on. It is therefore obvious that the decision on this appeal will turn upon the construction of the writing in which such trust is expressed. G. A. Grover, a merchant doing business in this state, becoming embarrassed, transferred to Albert E. Jones, as trustee, all his property, for the benefit of his creditors, to be converted by such trustee into cash, for the purpose of paying his debts. All his creditors executed the trust instrument, they being named therein as parties. The trustee was authorized by the writing to make new purchases, and carry on the business, should he deem this course wise. It is on this portion of the instrument that plaintiff rests its claim that in making such purchases the trustee acted as agent for the creditors. This action is against such creditors, to recover the value of goods purchased of the plaintiff by the trustee in the exercise of the discretion vested in him by the trust deed to continue the business. As it is indispensable to the correct understanding of the case, we quote in full that part of the instrument which relates to the future prosecution of the business by the trustee: "The said party of the second part shall have power to continue said general merchandise business, and to sell the stock of general merchandise at private sale and in the usual course of trade, and to replenish said stock of merchandise with such articles of staple goods as may be necessary to successfully continue business; and such power shall continue so long as said party of the second part shall be of the opinion that the interests of said creditors will be best subserved by that method of executing said trust. Said parties of the third part, in consideration of said provisions herein made for the payment of their respective demands against said party of the first part, have agreed to, and do hereby, grant to him an extension of eighteen months' time, from the date hereof, within which to pay his debts; and no attempt shall be made by them, or either of them, to enforce payment of any of said debts by any legal proceedings during the period of such extension. And the said above-mentioned 'secured creditors' hereby agree, immediately upon the execution and delivery of this deed of trust, to surrender to said party of the second part all securities which they hold for their said claims; and such of said 'secured creditors' as have liens upon the real or personal property of said party of the first part by virtue of any mortgages or execution levies thereon agree to forthwith, and upon the delivery of this deed of trust, release their liens and the levies of their executions upon said property. Said party of the first part shall and will do all he reasonably can to assist said trustee in realizing the amount of said debts as fast as practicable; provided, however, that all things done by said party of the first part with reference to said business and the management thereof shall be under the supervision and direction of said trustee, and that for such services as said first party shall render with reference thereto he shall make no charge, other than for actual necessary living expenses. Said trustee shall operate and manage said business in the ordinary way of retail trade, unless and until he shall become satisfied that the interests of said creditors will be best subserved by closing out said business, and by disposing of said property, both real and personal, at forced sale. If at any time said trustee shall conclude that more money can be realized from said property, or from any portion or class thereof, by public sale, than by sales in the ordinary way of retail trade, then and in that event he is hereby authorized and empowered to, and may, close out said trust in the manner usual under the ordinary assignment for the benefit of the creditors under the laws of the state of North Dakota."

At the outset we desire to answer the argument of counsel for plaintiff, that unless this action will lie the plaintiff is without redress. We are of the contrary opinion. If the trust is valid,—and that point does not seem to be controverted,—then the trustee became personally liable on every contract made by him in the discharge of the trust. He is to-day liable to the plaintiff for the value of the very goods, the value of which it is seeking to recover in this action. In dealing with the business world, a trustee cannot escape personal liability unless he lawfully restricts his liability in the contract itself. He is not in the position of a mere agent, and therefore knowledge on the part of the creditor that the trustee is acting only as such will not enable the latter to insist that such creditor shall look to only the trust estate for his pay. It is true that the trustee may claim reimbursement from the funds in his hands for any proper expenditure made by him in the execution of the trust; and this equity is the foundation of the right of the creditor, under peculiar circumstances, to proceed directly against the trust property itself. See Hewitt v. Phelps, 105 U. S. 898, 26 L. ed. 1072; Olopton v. Gholson, 58 Miss. 466; Norton v. Phelps, 54 Miss. 471; Re Johnson, L. R. 15 Ch. Div. 548; Doues v. Gorton, L. R. 40 Ch. Div. 586; Mason v. Pomeroy, 151 Mass. 164, 167, 7 L. R. A. 771. That the trustee is himself personally liable is well settled; and the general rule is that the creditor cannot claim any lien on, or equitable right in, the trust estate, but must look entirely to the trustee and his individual property for his pay. Hewitt v.

Phelps, 105 U. S. 393, 26 L. ed. 1072; Clopton v. Gholson, 53 Miss. 466; Norton v. Phelps, 54 Miss. 471; Kedian v. Hoyt, 33 Hun, 145; New v. Nicoll, 73 N. Y. 127; Austin v. Munro, 47 N. Y. 360; People, Wallace, v. Abbott, 107 N. Y. 225; Hackman v. Maguire, 20 Mo. App. 286; Mayo v. Moritz, 151 Mass. 481; Odd Fellows Hall Assn. v. McAllister, 153 Mass. 292, 11 L. R. A. 172; Mason v. Pomeroy, 151 Mass. 164, 167, 7 L. R. A. 771; Gill v. Carmine, 55 Md. 339; Burt v. Bull [1895] 1 Q. B. 276. Of course, the parties may agree that the trustee shall not be held personally on the contract, but that only the trust estate itself shall be chargeable with the debt. In such a case, if the instrument creating the trust authorizes this to be done, or even when it does not give such authority, if the circumstances are peculiar, the trustee is not bound, but the fund is. New v. Nicoll, 73 N. Y. 127; Gill v. Carmine, 55 Md. 339, 342, 348. These considerations make it plain that plaintiff is not without remedy in case we hold that these defendants are not liable. As they have themselves consented that the property which otherwise would have gone to pay their demands should be left in the hands of the trustee for a season, subject to all the risks of trade, they cannot complain if the venture proves a failure, and, instead of resulting in an increase of their dividends, actually leads to the diminution, or even the total loss, thereof. They are not entitled to any portion of the property until all proper expenditures made by the trustee have been repaid to him. And if he should distribute the estate, leaving unpaid any of the debts incurred by him in the execution of the trust, we have no doubt that a court of chancery would subrogate the creditors to his equity, and allow them to follow, in the hands of those who had received the property, the portion of the assets which had been paid to them by the trustee. And even while the trust property is still in the hands of the trustee, those who had dealt with the trustee as such might, under special circumstances, obtain a decree impressing upon such property an equitable lien in their behalf. See cases first above cited.

We now turn to the crucial point in the case. What relation did the creditors who signed the trust deed thereafter sustain to the business carried on thereunder? Were they themselves the proprietors of such business? We think not. It is true that they had an interest therein. But such interest did not differ from the interest of any creditor in the successful prosecution of a business by his debtor. While this property was still under the control of the debtor all of these creditors were interested in its being so managed by such debtor as to produce profit. In this way the ability of the debtor to pay would be increased. But such interest would not make them liable as the proprietors of such business. Suppose these same creditors had refused to grant the debtor an extension of time except on condition of his giving them security that he would not transfer any of his property, or create any liens thereon, but would pay them from time to time the profits of his business, as dividends on their claims; and suppose that the debtor had given such security, and had been left in control of the business. Would it be seriously urged that such an arrangement had rendered the creditors liable, as principal traders, on all the contracts of such debtor made in the prosecution of such business? We believe that it would not. What was done by all the parties was substantially the same thing. Instead of taking security in the form of a bond, they took it in the form of a trust. They were no more interested in the business under the management of the trustee than they would have been had it been left in the hands of the debtor himself. Their interest was neither greater nor different. It was in all respects precisely the same. They acquired, however, by the transfer made by the trustee, an equitable interest in the property so transferred. But they held this interest not as proprietors of the business. It was merely as security for the collection of their claims. Both parties had made the trustee the proprietor, with an ultimate obligation on his part to account to the creditors first, and then to the debtor, for any surplus remaining after all claims had been extinguished. Had the debtor sold the property to the creditors in payment of their demands, and had they, as owners of such property, intrusted it to the trustee to manage in their interest, it might well be claimed that they were themselves the proprietors of the business carried on by the trustee, and liable as such, on the theory that he was a mere agent in the prosecution thereof. Such a case, however, is not before us. In the supposed case the creditors would, as proprietors of the business, be entitled to all the profits thereof, without reference to the amounts of their several claims respectively. But in this case they have no such interest in the business at all. They have only the incidental interest which all creditors have in the profitable management of the affairs of their common debtor. They are interested indirectly, as creditors, and not directly, as proprietors. As the demands of these creditors were not extinguished by the transfer to the trustee, the person who was most directly interested in the business was the debtor himself. Every dollar of profit would go to him. True, he would, because of the trust, have to turn over such profits in payment of his debts, until they had all been satisfied; but they would be turned over as his property, and he would secure the full benefit thereof, and then, after all his obligations had been discharged, every dollar of profit would flow into his own pocket. Certain it is that none of the creditors who executed this trust deed ever deemed that they would become responsible for the debts contracted by the trustee in the operation of the business, in any other sense than that their dividends might be lessened, or even destroyed, by the failure of the venture. It would astonish any creditor holding a small claim to discover that he had become liable for all the debts incurred by the trustee in carrying on the business. This, of course, should not control us. But in settling a question of this character we should have some regard to the understanding and convenience of the business world. Jurisprudence should rest, not on mere logic, but on the actual condition of men in society, and their practical relations to each other in business life. Transactions of this character are, we believe, quite common, and they are certainly very beneficial to both the debtor and his creditors. We should not, therefore, throw in the way of those who wish to enter into them such serious obstacles as will deter them from making such advantageous arrangements, unless we are compelled to do so by some settled legal principle, or some consideration of justice or policy. This argument was given much weight by Lord Cranworth in Wheatcroft v. Hickman, 9 C. B. N. S. 47,—a case which, as we shall see, is directly in point. He says at page 94: "I have on these grounds come to the conclusion that the creditors did not by executing this deed make themselves partners in the Stanton Iron Company, and I must add that a contrary decision would be much to be deprecated. Deeds of arrangement like that now before us are, I believe, of frequent occurrence; and it is impossible to imagine that creditors who execute them have any notion that by so doing they are making themselves liable as partners. This would be no reason for holding them not to be liable, if, on strict principles of mercantile law, they are so. But the very fact that such deeds are so common, and that no such liability is supposed to attach to them, affords some argument in favor of the appellant. The deed now before us was executed by above a hundred joint creditors, and a mere glance at their names is sufficient to show that there was no intention on their part of doing anything which should involve them in the obligations of a partnership. I do not rely on this, but at least it shows the general opinion of the mercantile world on the subject. I may remark that one of the creditors, I see, is the Midland Railway Company, who are creditors for a sum only of £39, and to suppose that they could imagine that they were making themselves partners is absurd."

All that the creditors intended by signing this trust deed was to consent to the continuance of the business by the trustee at his option; thus barring the right of anyone to assail the transfer as a fraud upon creditors, on the ground that it operated to hinder and delay them in the collection of their demands. In the absence of such consent by them, it is obvious that they could have attacked the deed as fraudulent. A debtor cannot divest himself of all interest in his property, and yet create a trust relating thereto, to continue indefinitely. If such a trust were valid, creditors could never reach the assigned estate, in the enforcement of their claims, unless the trustee, in the kindness of his heart, should see fit to wind up the trust and distribute the property among them. Jones v. Syer, 52 Md. 211; Acme Lumber Co. v. Hoyt & Bros. Co. 71 Miss. 106; Att v. Wm. Knabe & Co. Mfg. Co. 93 Va. 741; Webb v. Armistead, 26 Fed. Rep. 70; Renton v. Kelly, 49 Barb. 536; Farmers' & T. Bank v. Martin, 96 Tenn. 3; De Wolf v. Sprague Mfg. Co. 49 Conn. 326; American Exch. Bank v. Inloes, 7 Md. 380; Gardner v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 13 R. I. 155; Gardner v. Commercial Nat. Bank, 95 Ill. 298. But any reasonable authority given to the trustee to manage the business under the direction of the court, and subject to the right of creditors to control the discretion of the trustee, is not necessarily fraudulent as to creditors.

Robbins v. Butcher, 104 N. Y. 575; De Wolf v. Sprague Mfg. Co. 49 Conn. 326; Stoneburner v. Jeffreys, 116 N. C. 78; Ravines v. Alston, 5 Ala. 297; Woodward v. Marshall, 22 Pick. 468; De Forest v. Bacon, 2 Conn. 683; Kendall v. New England Carpet Co. 13 Conn. 383; Foster v. Saco Mfg. Co. 12 Pick. 451; Hitchcock v. Cadmus, 2 Barb. 381; Perry Ins. & T. Co. v. Foster, 58 Ala. 502, 29 Am. Rep. 779. But the provision in the deed in question was of such a character that it vested such absolute power in the trustee, as to the continuance of the business, that the deed could not have been sustained, as against the creditors of the debtor, had it not been signed by them. This undoubtedly furnishes the explanation of their joining in the execution of the instrument. They intended to estop themselves by their signatures from claiming that the transfer was fraudulent as to them, so that no creditor would be in a position more advantageous than the others, but not to become themselves the actual owners of the property, and the real proprietors of the business carried on therewith.

The precise question before us has been elaborately discussed in England, in a very celebrated case,—Wheatcroft v. Hickman. The single question there involved was whether certain creditors, who had signed a similar trust deed, had thereby become the proprietors of the business which the trustees were authorized by the terms thereof to carry on, so that debts contracted by them in the conducting of such business were debts of the creditors, on the theory that the trustees were acting in the capacity of agents for them, as real owners, and not as trustees for them, as mere beneficiaries. The substance of the trust deed in that case, so far as its provisions bore upon the question before the court, is accurately stated by Lord Wensleydale as follows: "The deed is an arrangement by the Smiths, who had become insolvent, with their creditors who subscribe the deed, for assigning all their property to trustees, in trust to convert part, not necessary to conduct the business (and leaving £4,000 for that purpose), and divide the proceeds among the creditors, and then to continue to carry on, in the name of the Stanton Iron Company, the business lately carried on by the Smiths; and, for that purpose, to manage the works as they thought fit, with various powers,—to renew leases, insure, erect buildings and machinery, appoint managers and agents, enter into and execute all contracts and instruments in carrying on the business (and that provision would certainly authorize the making or accepting bills of exchange), and to divide the net income amongst the creditors in ratable proportions,—provided that, in distributing such income, it shall be deemed and taken to be the property of the Smiths; with power for the majority in value of the joint creditors, at a meeting, to alter the trusts, and make rules as to the discontinuance of the business and the management of it; and ultimately, after paying the debts incurred in the business so carried on to divide the residue of the moneys in ratable proportions amongst the creditors, with the same provision that the moneys are to be taken to be the property of the Smiths. The creditors are to receive the provisions of the deed in full discharge of their debts. They covenant not to sue; and the deed is to be void unless executed by six sevenths of the creditors, in number and value" 9 C. B. N. S. 98. The case was tried before Jervis, Ch. J., and a verdict rendered for the defendants. Subsequently a rule to show cause why a verdict should not be entered for the plaintiff was made absolute by the common pleas (Jervis, Ch. J., and Willes and Williams, JJ.). The decision was founded upon prior decisions which the judges erroneously considered as controlling. 18 C. B. 617, 638. On appeal to the exchequer chamber the judges were equally divided; Watson, Bramwell, and Martin being in favor of reversal, and Coleridge, Erle, and Crompton, JJ., being in favor of affirmance. 3 C. B. N. S. 523. On appeal to the house of lords the judges were requested to give their opinions, and here again they were equally divided; Blackburn, Crompton, and Williams, JJ., agreeing that the defendants were liable, and Channell, B., Pollock, C. B., and Wightman, J., holding that there was no liability. The law lords (Lord Chancellor Campbell and Lords Brougham, Cranworth, Wensleydale, and Chelmsford) then proceeded to render final decision; and they were unanimous in the opinion that the judgments of the exchequer chamber and of the common pleas should be reversed. Out of nineteen judges, including the law lords, eight were in favor of the plaintiff's right to recover, and eleven were opposed to it. Of the eight who thought that the action would lie, only five placed their judgments on independent reasoning; all three of the judges in the common pleas having considered themselves bound by prior adjudications. The other five appear to have been much influenced by such adjudications, though confessedly not strictly in point. The eleven judges who were of opinion that the action would not lie discussed the question on principle, and their reasoning seems to us unanswerable. In the House of Lords there was no dissent at all. So that the decision in the case is the unanimous judgment of the highest tribunal known to English law. Were we at all in doubt as to the correct view of this matter, the opinion of such a tribunal, promulgated after such exhaustive consideration of the question by many great judges, would suffice to turn the scale. Lord Wensleydale said, at page 100 [9 C. B. N. S.]: "If a creditor were to agree with his debtor to give him time to pay his debt till he got money enough out of his trade to pay it, I think no one could reasonably contend that he thereby made him his agent to contract debts in the course of his trade; nor do I think that it would make any difference that he stipulated that the debtor would pay the debt out of the profits of the trade. The deed in this case is merely an arrangement by the Smiths to pay their debts, partly out of their existing funds, partly out of the profits of their trade; and all their effects are placed in the hands of the trustees, as middlemen between them and their creditors, to effect the object of the deed,—the payment of their debts. It is placed in the hands of the trustees, as the property of the Smiths, to be employed as the deed directs, and to be returned to them when the trusts are satisfied. I think it is impossible to say that the agreement to receive this debt so secured, partly out of their existing assets, partly out of the trade, is such a participation in profits as to constitute the relation of principal and agent between the creditor and the trustees. The trustees are certainly liable, because they actually contract by their undoubted agent; but the creditors are not, because the trustees are not their agents." Lord Cranworth said at page 91: "I do not propose to consider in detail all the provisions of the deed. I think it sufficient to state them generally. In the first place, there is an assignment by Messrs. Smith, to certain trustees, of the mines, and all the engines and machinery used for working them together with all the stock in trade, and in fact all their property, upon trust to carry on the business, and, after paying its expenses, to divide the net income ratably amongst the creditors of Messrs. Smith as often as there shall be funds in hand sufficient to pay one shilling in the pound; and, after all the creditors are satisfied, then in trust for Messrs. Smith. Up to this point, the creditors, though they executed the deed, are merely passive; and the first question is, What would have been the consequence to them of their executing the deed, if the trusts had ended there? Would they have become partners in the concern carried on by the trustees merely because they passively assented to its being carried on upon the terms that the net income, i. e. the net profits, should be applied in discharge of their demands? I think not." Channell, B., said at page 70: "I think that no new trade or concern was carried on. It seems to me that it was the old concern though carried on under the management of trustees, and under a new name; that it was to be carried on by parties in whom the Smiths, on the one hand, and the general body of creditors on the other hand, placed confidence,—that is to say, by the trustees; but that it was the business of the Smiths; that the creditors who had rights against the Smiths, which they might have enforced by legal proceedings, in effect, in consideration of the arrangement that the trade for the future should be carried on by the trustees, and not under the management of the Smiths, agreed to forego their ordinary rights as creditors against their debtors, and to receive a sum equivalent to what was the amount of their debts, when the net profits (that is, as I understand, profits made after satisfying all new debts) should enable the trustees to pay the parties of the third part such equivalent sum. The business was, I think, the business of the Smiths, carried on with a view to their ultimate benefit; and the fact that the creditors had power to put an end to the management by the trustees, and to discontinue the business, and to require the property, the capital, to be sold and divided amongst them in satisfaction or part satisfaction of moneys which, according to my understanding of the deed, and by virtue of the deed of arrangement became a charge upon the property of Messrs. Smith, does not vary the case so as to constitute the creditors of the third part partners in the business. The creditors of the third part had no power, I think by virtue of the deed, to take upon themselves, the management of the business." Pollock, C. B., said at page 84: "If a firm were in difficulties, and a person proposed to assist them by a loan of money, engaging to receive payment out of the profits only, and to make no claim in the event of there being no profits, but stipulating that one half of the profits should be applied as they arose in payment of his debt, and that he should have power to see that this was done,—would he thereby become a partner, and liable for all debts contracted subsequently to this arrangement? On this very simple state of facts there may possibly arise a difference of opinion; but I think a large majority of all lawyers and commercial men would decide at once that assistance so offered and so accepted would not make the lender of the money a partner as to third persons. . . . The effect of the deed appears to me to continue the old concern rather than to create a new one; but to put it under the management of the trustees, who are a sort of guaranty or security that the real contract shall be carried into effect; who are to protect the interests of Messrs. Smith, on the one hand, from whom all their authority emanates, and of the creditors, on the other, so that the creditors who give up their claim on the capital, provided they are paid out of the profits, shall have the profits so applied, if any there be. The debts of the creditors are not extinguished altogether; for if the concern is unprofitable, the creditors may require it to be given up, and the property to be sold and divided among them. The trustees act under a power of attorney from Messrs. Smith, and they are to continue to carry on the same business, to pay all rent and charges, but they are to apply the net income (of course, after satisfying all new creditors) in payment of the claims of the old creditors.”

The judgment of the District Court is affirmed.

All concur.

A petition for rehearing having been filed, the following response was handed down on June 8, 1898:

Counsel for appellant call our attention to a fact not referred to on the argument of this case; i. e., that the assignor himself is made a party defendant, and has demurred to the complaint. As the court below overruled the demurrer as to him also, we must, to sustain its action, hold that he, as well as his creditors, is not liable for the property sold the trustee while such trustee was administering the trust. Such is our view. The instrument created a trust which placed the control of the property and the business entirely beyond the assignor so long as the trust should continue. The trustee doubtless was accountable in equity for the faithful discharge of his duties as such trustee, and a court of equity might in a proper case interfere. But while the business was being managed by the trustee he was absolute master thereof,—as much as though he himself had a beneficial interest therein. The assignor could not dictate how the trustee should conduct it, what purchases or sales he should make, or have the slightest voice in its affairs. It was the business of the trustee, so long as the trust continued; the assignor having only an indirect interest in the successful management thereof. He was not the proprietor of the business, and the trustee was not his agent. It is always the case that the trustee has no interest in the management of the affairs confided to him by the trust instrument, and that the cestui que trust is the only person beneficially interested therein. And yet it has never been held, or even supposed, that the beneficiary is liable for debts contracted by the trustee in so handling the trust property as to create an income for such beneficiary. The assignor by the trust deed parted with the ownership of the property, and all control over the business he had been carrying on. While that instrument remained in force he was in precisely the same position, with respect to the fund and the business which the trustee was conducting therewith, as if a third person had created the trust, and had provided that, after the trustee had paid thereout certain debts of the defendant, the trustee should transfer all the property to defendant. In the supposed case he would be interested in the success of the business, and yet it would not be his business. He would have no control over it, and therefore would not be liable for debts incurred in the prosecution thereof. There is no analogy between an instrument which establishes an agency and one which creates a trust. Where an agency exists, the principal may at any moment interfere; and at all times he is, in legal contemplation, in full control of the business. Not so when a party has parted with the title to his property, and has created a trust which vests in such trustee the right to manage the business as the proprietor thereof, he being accountable to the beneficiary, not as his principal, but as a mere cestui que trust under the terms of the trust instrument. There is no hardship in the doctrine that the beneficiary is not liable in such a case. The person with whom the creditor deals (i. e. the trustee) is himself personally liable. If such creditor is unwilling to trust him, such creditor can refuse to sell him on credit. And in a proper case the creditor may resort to the trust estate itself for his pay. It would indeed be an anomaly in the law if one could be held responsible for goods that he had not purchased or agreed to pay for, and which were not sold to his agent, but were purchased by a third person to use in a business carried on by such third person; the defendant having no control thereover. We hold that the assignor himself is not liable, and therefore the judgment heretofore rendered will not be disturbed.

v.

Knudt O. ARNEGAARD et al., Respts.

(7 N. D. 475.)

1. After engagement, and on the eve of his marriage to a second wife, the prospective husband deeded to his son by a former wife his homestead. The transfer was kept secret. The deed was not recorded, and the wife was ignorant thereof. The purpose of the grantor was to prevent the homestead right of the wife in the land from vesting in her on their marriage. As an inducement to the woman to marry him, he proposed to build on the homestead a substantial dwelling. Held, that the deed was fraudulent, in law and in fact, as to her homestead right, and therefore void as to it. But the deed is not void in toto.

2. The fact that the husband could, after marriage, have destroyed her homestead right in the property by changing his place of residence is no reason for taking the case out of the rule that a secret antenuptial transfer by the husband is void as to the wife; for after marriage the husband's control over the homestead would have been, not absolute, but limited,—a husband having no power to divest the wife of her homestead right by deed or will, but only by removal from the premises. The consideration that the wife's homestead right is more fragile than that of her dower right at common law affords a strong reason why the courts should guard more jealously her interests, against the secret devices of her husband to defraud her of such right.

3. It is no answer to the charge of fraud that the transfer was only a reasonable provision for the son, as the husband, if he would, by making such a provision, strip his wife of all possible interest in his property (she having no fixed interest therein under the statute of distribution), must act openly, and inform his intended wife of such purpose before the marriage. The duty of honest disclosure of the fact to his future spouse is paramount to the duty of making provision for his offspring. The fact that the wife will receive a portion of her husband's personal estate does not render the fraudulent transfer valid, no matter how large a sum she may so receive.

4. Where a deed is delivered to a third person to be delivered to the grantee on the death of the grantor such delivery transfers the title to the grantee, subject to the life interest of the grantor in the land.

5. While an acceptance is an essential element in a delivery of a deed, yet if the grantee, after learning that a deed has been delivered to a stranger for his benefit, accepts the same, such acceptance relates back to the time of the original delivery, when the rights of third persons are not involved. When the deed is beneficial to the grantee, as when the land is given to him by the grantor, the acceptance of the grant is presumed.

6. To make the delivery of a deed to a third person, to be delivered to the grantee on the death of the grantor, sufficient to transfer the title, it must appear that he intended then and there to part with all control over the deed, and to leave it with the third person as the agent of the grantee; otherwise the instrument will be testamentary in character, and therefore void as a deed. But, when it is once established that an absolute delivery was intended, the fact that the grantor acquired possession of the deed, or that he destroyed it, is immaterial. After such delivery, he has no more connection with the title to the land than one who never owned it. Acts and declarations of the grantor subsequent to the time of the alleged delivery, in hostility to the deed, are incompetent as against the grantee. But acts and declarations in support thereof are admissible, because they are adverse to the interests of the only person who at the time has any interest in overthrowing such deed.

*Headnotes by CORLISS, Ch. J.

NOTE.—As to the antenuptial conveyance in fraud of wife's property rights, see Dudley v. Dudley (Wis.) 8 L. R. A. 814, and note. See also Stroup v. Stroup (Ind.) 27 L. R. A. 523, 41 L. R. A.

7. Evidence reviewed, and held to sustain the finding of delivery.

8. A county court, acting as a probate court, has no jurisdiction to try a question of title to property, as between the personal representative of a decedent, and a person claiming in hostility to the estate. Accordingly, held that, where a proceeding which was instituted in such court to compel the administrator to place certain lands upon the inventory resulted in a judgment that such lands did not form part of the estate, such judgment constituted no bar to an action brought to have certain deeds of such lands set aside as not having been delivered by the decedent, although the grantees in such deeds were parties to the proceeding in the county court.

9. As the county court had no jurisdiction to try the question of title, the district court obtained none by an appeal from the order of the county court.

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Traill County in favor of defendants in a proceeding brought to set aside a conveyance of real estate which was alleged to have been made in fraud of plaintiff's rights. Modified.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. J. F. Selby and Swenson & Norman, for appellant:

The deed purported to have been executed by Ole O. Arnegaard, deceased, to Knudt O. Arnegaard, was never delivered to the grantee.

One of the essential requisites of the deed, in addition to that of signing or sealing, is its delivery by the grantor and its acceptance by the grantee.

Placing a deed in the hands of a third person is not a good delivery unless the grantor parts with his dominion over the deed.

Messrs. Carmody & Leslie and Cochran & Feetham, for respondent:

The pendency of the proceeding in the county court, in which the plaintiff attempted to have the court direct that the real property in litigation in this action should be added to the inventory and distributed as a part of the estate, is conclusive of this proceeding.

Where the reason for a rule falls, the rule itself ceases.

Under our law marriage involves neither the assumption of indebtedness nor the acquisition of property. Neither the title or possession or actual fraud was shown to have existed, and some of the rulings are placed upon that ground. Kelly v. McGrath, 70 Ala. 75, 45 Am. Rep. 75; Jones v. Jones, 64 Wis. 301; Brown v. Brownson, 35 Mich. 415; Smith v. Smith, 6 N. J. Eq. 515; Green v. Green, 84 Kan. 740, 55 Am. Rep. 256; Petty v. Petty, 4 B. Mon. 215, 39 Am. Dec. 501; Jenny v. Jenny, 24 Vt. 324. But in the great majority of the cases the broad rule is enunciated that a man owes to the woman to whom he is betrothed the utmost good faith, and that he cannot, consistently with that sacred obligation, secretly divest himself of property in which she would by the marriage secure rights which would thereafter be beyond his control. On the proposition that a secret transfer of his real property is, except under special circumstances, fraudulent, as a matter of law, as to her dower right, we cite the following cases: Davis v. Davis, 5 Mo. 188; Soutine v. Perine, 5 Johns. Ch. 482, 9 Am. Dec. 318; Chandler v. Hollingsworth, 8 Del. Ch. 99; Youngs v. Carter, 50 How. Pr. 410, affirmed on appeal in 10 Hun, 194; Cranston v. Cranston, 4 Mich. 230, 66 Am. Dec. 584; Pomeroy v. Pomeroy, 54 How. Pr. 228. See Gainor v. Gainor, 26 Iowa, 337; Thayer v. Thayer, 14 Vt. 107, 39 Am. Dec. 211. Many of the cases which make an exception in favor of a reasonable provision for children treat of the transaction as fraudulent in all other cases without reference to the intention of the party who makes the transfer.

While the extension of the earlier rule to cases involving dower grew, in a measure, out of the peculiar regard which the common law paid to that right yet the foundation of these decisions is the violation of the husband's duty to act with the utmost good faith towards his prospective bride, in dealing with his property after the marriage engagement. It therefore follows that the fact that dower has been abolished in this state is not in itself decisive against the right of this plaintiff to assail as fraudulent the conveyance of the homestead to the defendant Knudt O. Arnegard. The inquiry still remains whether she, upon becoming the wife of the grantor, would have secured such an interest in the land, on which he lived and on which he continued to reside up to the time of his death, as should be protected against a secret transfer after engagement, and before marriage. If the statute did not give a surviving widow a homestead right in the land of her deceased husband which formed their homestead at the time of his death, we could not, on sound principle, hold that the secret transfer of this land would in any manner constitute a fraud upon the plaintiff. In this state dower and curtesy are abolished. Neither husband nor wife has any interest in the property of the other. Each has the absolute power of disposition, whether by transfer during life, or by will at death, subject only to the homestead right of the survivor. Were it not for such homestead right, the plaintiff would have no ground for complaint. Surely it would not be fraudulent for the husband to do secretly before marriage that which he could do either openly or secretly after marriage. Could he by deed or will divest himself of all his property after marriage without the consent of his wife, the law would not treat as fraudulent his disposition thereof before marriage, though done after engagement, and for the express purpose of preventing his prospective wife obtaining a share of his estate at the time of his death. The authorities are unanimous on this point. Small v. Small, 56 Kan. 1, 30 L. R. A. 243; Padfield v. Padfield, 78 Ill. 16; Holmes v. Holmes, 3 Paige, 363; Dunnoch v. Dunnoch, 3 Md. Ch. 140; Cameron v. Cameron, 10 Smedes & M. 894, 48 Am. Dec. 759; Lightfoot v. Colgin, 5 Munf. 42; Lines v. Lines, 142 Pa. 149; Pringle v. Pringle, 59 Pa. 281; Smith v. Hines, 10 Fla. 258; Richards v. Richards, 11 Humph. 429; Sanborn v. Goodhue, 28 N. H. 48, 59 Am. Dec. 398; Ford v. Ford, 4 Ala. 143, 146; Williams v. Williams, 40 Fed. Rep. 521; Stone v. Stone, 18 Mo. 390. Of course, the transfer must be actual, and not colorable. See Rabbitt v. Gaither, 67 Md. 94; Smith v. Smith, 22 Colo. 480, 34 L. R. A. 89.

The only ground, therefore, on which we can sustain the plaintiff's charge of legal fraud, is that she would have secured by marriage such a contingent right to a homestead interest in the land in question, had it not been deeded away before marriage, that the law will deem the disappointment, through the act of her husband, of her just expectation that she should enjoy such right, as a wrongful act on his part, which it will set aside as against those who are not innocent purchasers, to the extent necessary to protect her homestead interest. If the contingent interest were absolutely at the control of her husband, we would have no hesitation in saying that she could have no redress. Were it the law in this state that the husband, even after marriage, could divest the homestead right of the wife by transfer during his life, or by devise on his death, or by mere removal from the premises, we would be clear that the conveyance to the defendant was a perfectly legitimate transaction. The authorities are clear on this point. See cases last above cited. If, therefore, we decide against the legality of this deed in so far as it affects plaintiff's homestead interest, it must be on the ground that, although the husband can divest the wife's interest in the homestead by a bona fide change of residence, yet in the absence of such a change her homestead right is as much fixed by marriage as was the wife's right of dower at common law. So long as the premises continue to be the home of the parties, the husband is as powerless to affect his wife's right to hold them as a home after his death as he is powerless to cut off by deed or will her dower right in a state where dower still exists. Rev. Codes, §§ 8608, 8626.

We think that the fact the husband has a qualified right to defeat the wife's homestead interest does not take the case out of the category of rights which a court of equity will protect, as against a secret transfer before marriage to defeat the same. The husband may know in advance that it is his purpose to reside on that particular parcel of land for the remainder of his days. If this is his determination, it is obvious that he must know that after marriage he cannot defeat his wife's homestead right. With this thought in mind, and conscious of the fact that therefore he must make an antenuptial transfer if he would prevent the homestead interest of his prospective wife from attaching beyond his power to control it, he secretly deeds away the land without valuable consideration. How can such an act be characterized, except as a fraud? What purpose could he have had, except the wrongful one to defeat his wife's just expectations by a secret device? From the standpoint occupied by him, the case is in no manner different from what it would have been had he possessed no power, even by change of residence, to defeat the wife's homestead rights. That it was in the mind of the grantor at the time he made this transfer that his home would remain upon this land until his death, is evidenced by the fact that, as an inducement to the plaintiff to marry him, he promised to erect thereon a substantial dwelling, in place of the old building in which he was living. This structure was in fact built, and he continued to reside therein with plaintiff up to the day of his death. Not only had he decided to make that his home, but the plaintiff was fully justified in the belief, which she doubtless entertained, that this was to be their homestead, and that after his death she could continue to live there, under the law, as his widow. There was considerable disparity in their ages; he being forty-six, and she only twenty-three, at the time of their engagement and marriage. She could not have failed to anticipate that in all probability she would survive him. She must have inferred, from his promise to build a new house, in which they were to dwell, on his homestead, that he was to continue the owner of the property, and thus give to her the homestead rights of a wife and a widow. He must have known that she looked forward to the possibility of outliving him. He could not help realizing that she would infer from his promise to build a new dwelling that he would in good faith give her such a home there as the law would entitle her, as widow, to hold for life after his death. The fact that he kept from her all knowledge of this conveyance to his son, not only before marriage, but thereafter as well, is convincing proof that he well knew that she was counting on having this homestead, should she outlive him. He undoubtedly feared, and well might fear, that she would not marry him if she knew that at the end of their married life, herself perhaps a woman advanced in years, she might be turned out upon the world without a home. Considering the difference in their ages, we may well believe that it was not so much sentiment and affection, as a desire to secure for herself a home for life, that prompted her to become his wife; and he could not have failed to realize that such a motive, if not the sole, was yet the controlling, motive which influenced her course. The undisputed evidence in the case—evidence which comes from one of defendants' own witnesses (the evidence of a son of the grantor, who narrates a conversation with the father)—shows that the very purpose of making this secret conveyance was to defraud the woman he was about to marry of her homestead right. The testimony referred to is as follows:

Q. Did you at any time hear your father make any statements with reference to his sister, Mrs. Ingebretson, and her marriage?

A. Yes.

Q. In that connection did you at any time hear your father make any statements as to what provision he had made for his children prior to his marriage; and, if so, what statements, and when were they made?

A. He referred to that affair very often, occasionally when he got to talking about the disposition of the estate; and he thought it was too bad that Mr. Ingebretson didn't know enough to dispose of some of his property before he married the second wife, because, under the law, she would own the homestead, etc.; and he expressed the opinion that it was very foolish for a person to do such things, and not fix up some things when they remarried the second time."

We are not without express authority in support of our view that the case is not taken out of the rule by the fact that the right of the wife in the property would not have been entirely beyond the husband's control had the antenuptial conveyance not been made. In Thayer v. Thayer, 14 Vt. 107, 39 Am Dec. 211, it appeared that the wife's right of dower could be barred by the husband's transfer during life. At common law this, of course, was not the rule. But in that state a statute had introduced a change placing the wife's dower right at the mercy of the husband, provided he saw fit to convey the land during life. The deed was made to a child of the husband just before his death, but subsequently to the marriage. The court held that it was fraudulent and void as to the dower interest of the wife. At page 122 [14 Vt.] the court said: "The chancellor supposes that the wife and the children, both stand upon the same ground, and that neither have any such rights, in the lifetime of the ancestor, as to be the subject of fraud. But there is a manifest difference. The ancestor may, by will, exclude entirely the children from all participation in his estate; not so the wife." To same effect are Davis v. Davis, 5 Mo. 183; Smith v. Smith, 22 Colo. 490, 34 L. R. A. 89; Munick v. Beard, 85 Ky. 20. There is reasoning to be found in some of the cases, which, on a casual reading, appears to militate against the doctrine that a secret transfer is fraudulent. But, when these decisions are examined, it will be found that the law of the jurisdiction where the question arose gave the husband an unfettered control over his property, conferring upon him the right to select the time and mode of the transfer thereof, free from all claims of his wife thereon; giving her no interest therein, save as successor or distributee in case of intestacy. The opinion of Judge Brewer in Butler v. Butler, 21 Kan. 521, 30 Am. Rep. 441, proceeds on the basis of such a state of the law. Mr. Pomeroy has in mind such a condition of the law when he declares that, in view of the state of the law in some sections of this country, the old doctrine of equity jurisprudence is there obsolete. See 2 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 920, and 3 Pom. Eq. Jur. § 1118.

We now come to another branch of the question under consideration. It is urged that the transfer is valid because it is no more than a reasonable provision in favor of the husband's own child by a former marriage, and that at the time it was made the husband retained the title to 320 acres of land, and was the owner.

of personal property of the value of about $40,000. At the time of his death this personal estate was inventoried at something over $48,000. As he left no will, the widow will receive one third of this property after paying expenses of administration. But we are not to judge of the legality of this transaction by the sequel. If originally fraudulent, it cannot be validated by the fact that her husband has failed to bequeath away from her, or give away in his lifetime, his personal property. He might have done so, and, in determining whether the deed in question was valid, we must take this fact into consideration. The only ground, therefore, on which counsel for defendants can sustain the conveyance, is that it was a reasonable provision for his son, the grantee, and that a secret transfer can be made, even when it seriously affects the wife, provided the object of the husband's bounty is a child, and the gift is not extravagant, considering his estate. The husband had living, at the time he conveyed the land in question to the defendant, nine children by his former wife. Some of these were of age, and some were not. He deeded four farms of land, aggregating 550 acres, to those of his children who had attained their majority: one of these conveyances being that which is here assailed. It is established that his object was that all his children should share in this property conveyed; he trusting to the honor of the grantees to see that their younger brothers and sisters received fair treatment. In view of the number of children, and the large amount of real and personal property which he still retained, we cannot say that the provision which he made for his offspring by his former marriage was unreasonable. But it is not enough to take the sting out of a secret transfer on the eve of marriage that it was for the benefit of worthy objects of the husband's bounty, when the effect of such transfer is seriously to prejudice the rights of the prospective wife. Can the husband, who owns real and personal property, secretly deed all the land to his children, and then claim that the transaction was not a fraud upon the wife's right of dower, because the property conveyed constituted only a reasonable provision for his own progeny? In discharging his duty to his children, he must not be recreant to his equally binding duty to his future bride. He should select property in which she will have no right, and not take the only property in which the law gives her any interest. He cannot deed away the homestead, and then shelter himself under the plea that he has honestly performed a duty to his own blood. If he wishes to give his child the homestead, then he must apprise his prospective wife of the fact, and let her decide whether, under such circumstances, she desires to marry him or not. In England v. Downs, 2 Beav. 522, Lord Langdale said: "In the execution of this settlement, so far as it made provision for her children, she was performing a moral duty. In the circumstances in which she was placed, it was clearly her duty, before she placed herself and her property in the power of her second husband, to secure a provision for her children by her first husband, from whom her property was derived; but in performing a duty towards her children, she had no right to act fraudulently towards her second husband." And again he says: "It is not doubted that proof of direct misrepresentations or of wilful concealment with intent to deceive the husband, would entitle him to relief; but it is said that mere concealment is not in such a case any evidence of fraud, and that if a man, without making any inquiry as to a woman's affairs and property, thinks fit to marry her, he must take her and her property as he finds them, and has no right to complain, if, in the absence of any care on his part, she has taken care of herself and her children without his knowledge. This proposition, however, cannot be admitted as stated; and clearly a woman, in such circumstances, can only reconcile all her moral duties by making a proper settlement on herself and her children with the knowledge of her intended husband." In Williams v. Carle, 10 N. J. Eq. 543, the court said: "The counsel of the defendants further insisted that, the disposition which is alleged to have been made of the property being for the benefit of the children of the proposed marriage, the trust was a meritorious one, and such as a court of equity will not disturb. The cases of Hunt v. Matthews, 1 Vern. 408, and of King v. Cotton, 2 P. Wms. 674, were cited as sustaining the rule, that a settlement by a widow upon her children by a former marriage, even if made during the treaty for a second marriage, without the consent or knowledge of her intended husband, is valid. It was argued that a settlement for the benefit of children of the contemplated marriage is equally meritorious. But I cannot understand upon what just principle a trust in either case can be declared valid by a court of equity. In Hunt v. Matthews, the court is reported to have said, or rather thought,—for that is the word used,—that a widow might, with a good conscience, before she put herself under the power of a second husband, provide for the children she had by the first. Now there may be no difference of opinion as to the propriety of her making such a provision for her children, and in some cases she would be conscientiously and morally bound to do so; but the question remains, Could she conscientiously do it without the knowledge of her husband? Could she contract with him upon the assumption that upon its execution the property was to be his, and yet clandestinely place the property beyond his control? The settlement, though a meritorious one, would not be less a fraud upon the husband, and the court interferes with it because it is done in a manner which makes it a fraud upon his marital rights." We do not mean to say that under no circumstances could the husband or wife make a secret conveyance which would be valid. The question has always been whether the transfer was reasonable in view of all the surrounding facts. When the husband was by the marriage rendered liable for his wife's debts, there was much force in the rule which precluded the wife from making any secret antenuptial disposition of property, although her children by a former marriage were the objects of her bounty. His rights might well be deemed superior to theirs because he was, in effect, a purchaser of all her estate for a valuable consideration; i. e., the liability he incurred for her debts. But the wife's claim to dower stood upon a somewhat different footing. And the decisions are quite numerous that she cannot complain where, in good faith, only a reasonable provision is made for children, although she is ignorant of the transaction, and the effect of it is to decrease the value of the dower right she secures by the marriage. Murray v. Murray, 90 Ky. 1, 8 L. R. A. 95; Dudley v. Dudley, 76 Wis. 537, 8 L. R. A. 814; Goodman v. Malcom, 5 Kan. App. 285; Hamilton v. Smith, 57 Iowa, 15, 42 Am. Rep. 89; Alkire v. Alkire, 184 Ind. 850. See also Butler v. Butler, 21 Kan. 521, 30 Am. Rep. 441; Tucker v. Andrews, 18 Me. 124, 128; 2 Kent, Com. 175; Story, Eq. Jur. § 273; Gregory v. Winston, 23 Gratt. 102, 123; Chandler v. Hollingsworth, 8 Del. Ch. 99, 110, 113.

But these decisions are not opposed to our ruling in this case. They all recognize the principle that the effect of the transaction must not be utterly to keep from the wife all the interest in his property which would after marriage be beyond her husband's absolute control. To give his children a portion of his real property, leaving other real estate still standing in his name, is widely different from the transfer of all his lands to them, thus precluding the possibility of any dower right vesting in the wife. In the case before us the secret conveyance related to the only property in which the wife could expect to secure by her marriage any interest beyond the full control of her husband after marriage. If such a transaction can be sustained on the ground that a reasonable provision was thereby made for children, it is obvious that nothing is left in this jurisdiction of the rule so widely recognized, and founded in sound policy as well as upon principle of natural justice. Of course, the husband, acting in good faith, can, after marriage, destroy his wife's interest in the homestead, by changing his place of residence. She is bound to know that her expectation that he will not do so may be disappointed. But she certainly is justified in assuming that, if he does not in this manner divest her of her homestead interest in the land, she shall not be surprised at his death by a secret antenuptial conveyance of the homestead, made to defeat her rights. The very fact that the homestead right is less secure than that of dower at common law is of itself a strong reason why the courts should be even more watchful to protect it against destruction by the secret devices of one who is bound in morals to divulge to his betrothed any transaction which will affect her rights as his wife. We hold that the deed in question was fraudulent and void, as to plaintiff, both because the transaction was fraudulent in law, and because the purpose of the husband was secretly to deprive her of her homestead right. The conveyance will not, however, be set aside, except as to her homestead interest, unless we find that it was never in fact delivered by the grantor. That the deed is not entirely void as to the wife is too clear to admit of doubt. See Chandler v. Hollingsworth, 8 Del. Ch. 99; Dudley v. Dudley, 76 Wis. 567, 8 L. R. A. 814. In none of the cases has she been protected, except as to the right which after marriage the husband could not fully control. The husband of the plaintiff had a perfect right to prevent her succeeding to any of his real property as heir, and, in so far as the deed to the son defeats her claim upon this land as heir, it must stand, unless we find that the deed was never in fact delivered.

This brings us to the second branch of the case. The deed was not delivered by the grantor to the defendant, but was handed to a third person, on the condition that it was not to be delivered to the grantee until the grantor's death. If, however, there was in fact a delivery of the deed to such third person, it is immaterial that the ultimate delivery to the grantee was not to take place until the death of the grantor. However open to criticism from the standpoint of legal principles the doctrine may be, it is now a thoroughly established rule that, if the grantor parts with all control over the deed at the time of its delivery to the third person, the delivery is good, and the title passes to the grantee, although the delivery to him is not to take place until after the grantor's death. The transaction does not vest in the grantee a fee in possession, but only a fee in remainder after the life estate of the grantor, which by implication is carved out of the fee, has terminated. Some of the cases proceed on the theory that the fee does not pass to the grantee until the delivery of the deed to him, and that then his title relates back to the original delivery. But the better rule is that the deed is immediately operative as against the grantor, and that the condition that the delivery to the grantee shall not be made until after the grantor's death is equivalent to the reservation of a life estate in his favor in the land itself. The distinction, however, is not important for the purposes of this case. The grantor has died, and the deed has been delivered. The cases holding that a deed delivered to take effect on the death of the grantor is valid are collected by Mr. Jones in his work on Real Property. See volume 2, § 1284, and cases cited. To same effect are Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 446; Wittenbrook v. Cass, 110 Cal. 1; Baker v. Baker, 159 Ill. 894; Brown v. Westerfield, 47 Neb. 899; Denzler v. Rieckhoff, 97 Iowa, 75; Haeg v. Haeg, 53 Minn. 33.

There are authorities which uphold such transfers even though the grantor reserves a right to recall the deed at any time before his death, provided he does not do so. But we regard these adjudications as indefensible on principle. Such a transaction is nothing more than a testamentary disposition of property. Unless, therefore, we are able to discover from this record that the grantor absolutely parted with all control over the deed, and intended it to operate as a present conveyance, subject to his life interest, we must adjudge the instrument void for want of delivery. See 2 Jones, Real Prop. § 1236. The learned district judge found in favor of an actual delivery, and as he had before him the witnesses on whose testimony his finding is based, we will not disturb it unless it appears to be clearly erroneous. The deed was delivered to a Mr. Hyde. His evidence relating to the delivery is as follows:

I was formerly cashier of the Hillsboro Banking Company, of Hillsboro. I severed my connection with the Hillsboro Banking Company, and went to Fargo, in January, 1896. While cashier of the Hillsboro Banking Company, I was acquainted with Ole Arnegaard, deceased. I had known him since 1881. Exhibit A is in my handwriting. I remember the occasion of drawing that deed. It was drawn, at the request of Ole O. Arnegaard, at the date it appears to be dated at the top. It was afterwards signed and acknowledged in my presence by Mr. Arnegaard, before me as notary public, on the day that the acknowledgment appears dated. The instrument was prepared prior to the actual acknowledgment of it.

Q. On the day that you prepared this deed for Mr. Arnegaard, will you state what his instructions were to you, or what conversation was between you with reference to it?

A. We had considerable talk about this matter before I prepared the paper for him. Mr. Arnegaard came into the bank, and asked me if I would draw up some deeds for him, and I told him I would. I had been in the habit of making papers for him from time to time as he needed them, and he said that he wanted to deed this property that is mentioned in this deed to his son, and gave me the description, which I noted down on paper. The matter of consideration came up, and I advised Mr. Arnegaard to insert in the deed $1 and other valuable consideration. He told me that he preferred to have the consideration written as it appears in the deed. He said that he desired the boys to have this property, and he wished to deed it to them. In the conversation, I asked him why he didn't make a will; and he told me he didn't know anything about wills, but he did know something about deeds and mortgages, and he preferred to have it deeded. I prepared this instrument, and, I think, two others; and they were signed by him, as shown. He delivered them over to me, requesting me to take these instruments, and hold them, and, in case of his death, to put them on record, and requested me to say nothing to any parties about his having deeded this property.

When Mr. Hyde removed from Hillsboro to the city of Fargo, he failed to take with him these deeds. They were left in the bank vault at Hillsboro. It appears that thereafter the grantor called at the bank for some papers. Whether he asked for these deeds, including the deed to the defendant, or for some other papers belonging to him, is not settled by the evidence. The only witness who can testify to this fact is in doubt about it. But it is undisputed that, along with other papers of his, these deeds were handed to him, and that he kept them in his possession until his death. We do not attach much importance to this fact, considering the circumstances. Indeed, if the deeds were once delivered to Hyde for the benefit of the grantees, it was beyond the power of the grantor to divest the title of the grantees by regaining possession thereof, or even by destruction of the same. A delivery passes title, and such title is thereafter as much beyond the control of the grantor as though he had never owned the land. Connard v. Colgan, 55 Iowa, 538; Seibel v. Rapp, 85 Va. 28; Douglas v. West, 140 Ill. 455. For this reason it has been held that the declarations of the grantor subsequent to an alleged delivery are not competent to impeach it. If he has in fact transferred the title, he cannot, by his unsworn declarations made in his own interest, in effect lay the foundation for securing a restoration of the title without the act or even consent of the grantee. See Bury v. Young, 98 Cal. 448; Blight v. Schenck, 10 Pa. 285, 51 Am. Dec. 481; Squires v. Summers, 85 Ind. 253; Souterbye v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. 240. Without setting forth in detail all the evidence, we find much in the case to confirm the theory that the grantor intended to part with all control over the deed. We think that the motive which prompted the execution of these conveyances is strong evidence that he intended to divest himself of the title at once. It is apparent that his object was to prevent the interest of his second wife attaching to the land. He was, of course, wrong in supposing that any other than a homestead interest would vest in her on their marriage; but, in determining what he thought, we must treat him as a layman, and not as a skilled lawyer. He evidently believed that, if he owned this land when the second marriage took place, the plaintiff could obtain some control over his future disposition of the property. Such being his thought, and it being apparent that he wished to preclude the possibility of such control, we are impelled to the conclusion that he meant that the deed should immediately transfer his title, subject only to the condition that the enjoyment of the possession was to be postponed. We must not lose sight of the fact that the conveyance was to his own children; and courts have gone very far in sustaining such transactions,—sometimes apparently holding that in such cases no delivery is necessary. Souterbye v. Arden, 1 Johns. Ch. 240; Wallace v. Berdell, 97 N. Y. 13; 2 Jones, Real Prop. § 1277; Scrugham v. Wood, 15 Wend. 545, 30 Am. Dec. 75. That the declarations of the grantor himself, though subsequent to the alleged delivery, are competent evidence of intent in support of the deed, is well settled. Such declarations are against the interest of the only party who is interested in defeating the deed at the time they are made. The defendant was sworn as a witness in the case, and testified as follows with reference to a conversation had with his father: "He spoke to me several times. One time he spoke to me about the deeds. He told me that he had deeded the east quarter (what they usually called it) to Martin, and that he wished me to tell Martin that he expected him to come home soon and take that quarter, and he would move the schoolhouse over there and fix it up, and he could farm it. That is the only time he used the word 'deed.' He several times spoke to me about disposing of the land, and he always used the word 'papers.'" It is true that this evidence does not relate to the deed in question, but all these deeds were executed and delivered at the same time, and, if the grantor intended to deliver any of them, he intended to deliver them all. There was only a single transaction with reference to them. There is evidence equally strong, but the great length of this opinion forbids a more specific reference to it.

The question of acceptance remains. Acceptance by the grantee is an essential part of a delivery. But it is well settled that the grantee may, in case of delivery to a stranger, on subsequently learning of such delivery accept the conveyance, and such acceptance relates back to the time of such delivery. "If a deed be delivered absolutely, and beyond the grantor's control and right of dominion, for the grantee's use, to a person not at the time authorized by him to receive it, and the grantee afterwards accepts it, or authorizes the custodian to accept it, the deed is effectual from the time it was placed in the hands of such person." 2 Jones, Real Prop. § 1241. Our statute embodies this rule. Rev. Codes, § 3520. The acceptance by the grantee has been shown. But it was not necessary to prove such acceptance, the grant being beneficial to the grantee, i. e. an unconditional gift to him. The law presumes an acceptance "The fact that a conveyance is beneficial to the grantee, and imposes no burdens on him, is in numerous cases the ground for asserting the general proposition that an acceptance of such a deed may always be inferred. The rule is stated to be that if a deed is delivered to a third person for the grantee, neither the presence of the grantee, nor his previous authority, nor his subsequent express assent, is necessary to make the delivery valid. If the deed is beneficial to the grantee, his assent will be presumed, in the absence of proof of his dissent." 2 Jones, Real Prop. § 1282. It is true that there appears to be a division of authority on the point, but our statute clearly recognizes the doctrine we have stated. A delivery is declared to be good when made to a stranger, not only on showing the assent of the grantee, but also when his assent may be presumed. Rev. Codes, § 3520. There is evidence in the case from which an acceptance by the grantee during the life of the grantor may be inferred. He appears to have known of the deed, and did not refuse to accept its highly-beneficial provisions. The case of Hibberd v. Smith, 67 Cal. 547, 56 Am. Rep. 726, is not in point, for here no rights of third persons intervened between the delivery and acceptance, as in that case. The court there expressly recognized the principle of relation as between the parties, saying: "As between grantor and grantee, or those claiming under them, when the right of a third person is not involved, it may be rightly held that an acceptance or assent by the grantee to a deed delivered to a stranger for the use of the grantee, made after such tradition to a stranger, constitutes a full and complete delivery. It may be so held under the doctrine of relation. The subsequent assent or acceptance relates back to the time of such delivery to the stranger and makes such acts contemporaneous, i. e. makes such tradition to a stranger, and the subsequent assent, contemporaneous." From a careful examination of the record, we are thoroughly satisfied that there was a delivery of the deed by the grantor; and such deed must therefore stand, except in so far as it affects plaintiff's homestead right. Had the purpose of the grantor been to leave these deeds with Hyde, to take effect only on his death, the grantor reserving to himself control thereof, they would have been testamentary in character, and therefore void as deeds, for want of delivery during the grantor's life. Every fact in the case indicates that this was not his purpose. He delivered them without reserving any control thereafter. He expressly refused to make the disposition by will, though this was suggested to him by Hyde. His purpose was to divest himself of ownership before the marriage which was soon to take place, that his second wife should not acquire any interest in the land. He repeatedly said that he had deeded the land to the boys. To sustain them is to give effect to them as deeds. To refuse to sustain them is to construe them as wills, in the face of the fact that they do not purport to be testamentary in character. And, finally, to uphold them is to do that which courts have gone to great lengths to accomplish, namely, sustain a provision made by the parent in his lifetime for his children.

We have hitherto refrained from referring to a point made by counsel for defendants. In view of the disposition made of the case, we might, perhaps, ignore it; but we have decided to pass upon it, as it goes to our right to investigate at all the question of delivery. Counsel for defendants contends that all the questions here raised were settled adversely to the widow by the order of the county court of Trill county, which on appeal to the district court was affirmed. Such prior adjudication is set up in the answer, and there is evidence in the case supporting such alleged defense. It appears that in a proceeding instituted by the widow in the county court having jurisdiction of the estate of Knudt O. Arnegaard, to compel the administrator to place upon the inventory the real estate here involved, the judgment of such court was that the land did not belong to the estate of Knudt O. Arnegaard; and on appeal to the district court this judgment was affirmed. But we are clear that such adjudication can have no effect upon the question of title of one claiming in hostility to the estate. The county court has no power to try the question of title, as between the representative and persons claiming adversely to the estate. If the decedent has in fact conveyed his land before his death, that court cannot, by any order or judgment it may make, settle one way or the other the question whether the decedent owned the land at the time of his death. The fact that the grantee in such a conveyance may happen to be a person interested in the estate does not alter the rule. As to such property, he is in the same position as an entire stranger. The court in which the estates of deceased persons are administered has no jurisdiction of a proceeding to determine whether the decedent has or has not transferred the property to another. Such a controversy must be settled in the district court, and it can make no difference that the question is fully contested in the county court, for the parties cannot by consent confer jurisdiction over the subject-matter. Had the decision in the county court relied on by counsel for defendants been in favor of the widow, she could not have availed herself of it in this action, because that court had no power to determine whether the grantees in these deeds were or were not the owners of this land. And for the same reason an adverse decision can work her no prejudice. As the county court had no power to try the question of title, it follows that the district court, on appeal from the order of the county court, had no such power. The questions here discussed are all treated in Stewart v. Lohr, 1 Wash. 841, which is an express authority in support of our ruling on this branch of the case. The county court may undoubtedly determine in a tentative way what property should be placed on the inventory as the property of the decedent. But any decision made by it would be controlled by the final result of an action brought in a proper court to try the question of title. Should the administrator be ordered to place certain lands upon his inventory, and should it subsequently be decided, in a proper action, that the property in fact belonged to another, the administrator would not be chargeable therewith. The object of the proceeding to compel an administrator to place particular property upon the inventory is not to settle any question of title, as between those interested in the estate and persons who claim in hostility thereto. Nor has the county court any jurisdiction to adjudicate upon such title. We therefore hold that the judgment set forth in the answer does not constitute a former adjudication of the question of the title of this defendant to the land in controversy, or of the widow's right to a homestead.

The judgment will be modified by the District Court in accordance with the views herein expressed, the appellant recovering costs in both courts.

All concur.

MASSACHUSETTS SUPREME JUDICIAL COURT.

H. N. SLATER

v.

(170 Mass. 509.)

1. An injunction against a trespass may be granted for the inadequacy of the re-

NOTE.—Public right of access to water.

The public has no right of way across private property to reach a public body of water, although there is no other means of access. The only exception to this rule appears to have been in case of wreck. For it was held that the King has a right of way over any man's ground for his wreck, and the same privilege goes to the grantee thereof. Anonymous, 6 Mod. 149.

So, where the state has established a method of caring for wrecked property and selling it for the owner there will be reserved from a grant of land on the shore a right of way by necessity to and from the wreck for the purpose of taking away the goods. Hetfield v. Baum, 85 N. C. (13 Ired. L.) 894, 57 Am. Dec. 563.

No right for fishing.

Hall, Sea Shores, 178, says that the law will compel fishermen to take the usual and public road down to the seashore if there is one within reasonable and convenient distance, although he argues for a right to go along the coast from the end of the public road to the place where the fishery is located or to the boat.

There must be no trespass on private property in exercising the right of fishing. Coolidge v. Williams, 4 Mass. 140.

In 2 Dane, Abr. 702, it is said that a right to pass over another's land to fish can be only by usage, time out of mind, or by grant, or by way of necessity, and the case of White v. Whittier is cited as involving the question.

Fish taken in navigable water where the tide ebbs and flows cannot be carried over private land adjoining. Bickel v. Polk, 5 Harr. (Del.) 825.

By the Massachusetts colonial ordinance anyone had a right to go to a great pond on foot through uninclosed woodlands for the purpose of taking fish. But he could not trespass on corn or meadow, tillage or grass land. Barrows v. McDermott, 73 Me. 441.
41 J. R. A.

lief at law, where an action at law has been brought but the insolvency of the defendant makes it impossible to collect a judgment against him for damages.

2. The use, for more than 100 years, of a well-known and well-defined roadway from a public road to a great pond, by hunters, fishermen, picnic parties, celebrators, n

A statute attempting to give a right to cross lands to reach public waters for the purpose of fishing is an unconstitutional taking of property without compensation. New England Trout & S. Club v. Mather, 68 Vt. 338, 33 L. R. A. 569. The court says the legislature could as well pass a law that any private property might be crossed against the will of the owner for the purpose of reaching a highway by land, as to pass one that it may thus be crossed for the purpose of reaching public waters for the purpose of taking fish therefrom.

No right for general purposes.

The right of the public to navigate streams capable of navigation does not give them the right to approach the streams over the land of a riparian proprietor against his consent. The Magnolia v. Marshall, 39 Miss. 110. The court says all public rivers, whether technically navigable or navigable in fact, must remain free and open subject to the jus publicum; but the absolute right of approach on each side can only be on public and general ways; consequently, if an individual have land adjoining a river, he may reasonably refuse permission to any person to go over it to approach the river unless there be a public way over it.

In West Roxbury v. Stoddard, 7 Allen, 153, it is said that fishing, boating, etc., upon great ponds are lawful and free to all persons whose own lands adjoining them or can obtain access to them without trespassing.

And that is quoted with approval in Paine v. Woods, 103 Mass. 173; Bowell v. Doyle, 131 Mass. 474.

In Stetson v. Bangor, 60 Me. 313, where the question was as to the amount to be awarded for extending a street from high-water mark over flats to the water's edge, the court said that the stream was navigable, and that the public had a right to pass and repass upon it, but they would have no right to land and use the upland as a way or road to transport their public occasions, and by whomsoever chose, without objection and without obstruction, does not establish a way by prescription or dedication, where it does not appear that such use was not with the express or implied permission of the owners of the land.

3. Acceptance by public authorities is necessary to create a public way by dedication.

4. The right to cross the unimproved land of another person bordering on a great pond, for the purpose of cutting and carrying away ice from the pond, is not conferred by the ordinance of 1841-42, adopted by the Massachusetts Bay Colony, making it "free for any man to fish and fowl there," and to "pass and repass on foot through any man's propriety for that end, so they trespass not on any man's corn or meadow."

(March 28, 1898.)

REPORT by the Superior Court for Worcester County of exceptions by defendants to a master's report in favor of plaintiff in a suit in equity to enjoin defendants from trespassing on plaintiff's property. Exceptions overruled.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. John Sewell Gould, for defendants:

Highways are public roads which every citizen has a right to use.

Stackpole v. Healy, 16 Mass. 33, 8 Am. Dec. 121.

waterborne goods without the authority of the owner of the land.

In reaching a great pond for the purpose of cutting ice, there must be no trespassing upon the land of riparian proprietors. Brastow v. Rockport Ice Co. 77 Me. 100.

If right of way to a river is dedicated for the purpose of facilitating commerce on the river it will cease when the commerce on the river is entirely abandoned. Freedom v. Norris, 128 Ind. 377.

In Turner v. Hebron, 61 Conn. 175, the right of the public to a highway to a pond across private land was denied upon the ground that all the rights in the pond were in the owner of the land surrounding it and that the highway was not of common convenience and necessity.

If the right to erect wharves below low water mark is given to riparian owners the public have no right to use them; but their only mode of access to the water is by highways. Wetmore v. Atlantic White Lead Co. 37 Barb. 70.

Parliament may grant a right to erect a wharf at the end of a public street which will cut off the public right of access to the water. Yarmouth v. Simmonds, L. R. 10 Ch. Div. 518, 47 L. J. Ch. N. S. 702, 38 L. T. N. S. 881, 26 Week. Rep. 802.

A grant by statute to a railroad company of a right of way along the shore below high-water mark without reserving a right to the public to cross the tracks will cut off the access of the public to the water, although a street runs to high-water mark. Vancouver v. Canada P. R. Co. 23 Can. S. C. 1.

If a highway is laid out to a river the owner of the soil cannot by filling out in front of the street, obstruct the public right of way to the river. Newark Lime & C. Mfg. Co. v. Newark, 15 N. J. Eq. 64; People v. Lamber, 5 Denio, 9, 47 Am. Dec. 273; Jersey City v. Morris Canal & Bkg. Co. 12 N. J. Eq. 548; Hoboken Land & I. Co. v. Hoboken, 36 N. J. L. 540.

But in Hoboken v. Pennsylvania R. Co. 124 U. S. 656, 31 L. ed. 543, it was held that a grant by the state to a corporation for the purpose

"If a way lead to a market, and were a way for all travelers, and did communicate with a great road, etc., it is a highway; but if it lead only to a church, to a private house, or village, or to fields, there 'tis a private way. But it is a matter of fact, and much depends upon common reputation."

Austin's Case, 1 Vent. 189; Thrower's Case, 1 Vent. 208.

If the owner of the soil throws open a passage, and neither marks, by any visible distinction, that he means to preserve all his rights over it, nor excludes persons from passing through it by positive prohibition, he shall be presumed to have dedicated it to the public. Although the passage in question was originally intended only for private convenience, the public are not now to be excluded from it after being allowed to use it so long without any interruption.

Rez v. Lloyd, 1 Campb. 260; Rugby Char-ity v. Merryweather, 11 East, 375, note; Wood-ger v. Hadden, 5 Taunt. 125; Wood v. Veal, 5 Barn. & Ald. 454.

A passageway leading from a public street up to a court, which consisted of a dozen or more houses through which court there could be no passing, was held to be a public highway.

Bateman v. Bluck, 14 Eng. L. & Eq. 69.

of improving the water front would cut off the public right of access along the street which had been dedicated to the public by a riparian owner, since his right to dedicate extended only to high-water mark, and the state might cut off all rights beyond that by a grant to other persons.

There is no common right to pass over the shore between high and low water mark which belongs to a private individual for the purpose of bathing in the sea, although access to high-water mark has been rightfully obtained. Blundell v. Catterall, 5 Barn. & Ald. 268. Holroyd says for the purpose of the King's subjects getting upon the sea and upon the navigable rivers to exercise their unquestionable rights of commercial intercourse and fishing, there are, not only the ports of the Kingdom, but also public places of embarking and landing themselves and their goods.

In case there is no public road within convenient distance, it would seem better to take proper proceedings to have one laid out than to sanction a right of way over private property to reach the water.

In Knight v. Woore, 5 Dowl. P. C. 201, 8 Bing. N. C. 3, 3 Scott, 326, the jury found the existence of a right of way in favor of the inhabitants of Monmouth to pass and repass for the purpose of drawing water from the river Wye, but negatived a right to carry goods.

In Richards v. Richards, 1 Johns. V. C. (Eng.) 255, a right of way was given by act of Parliament to enable the owner of a mine to reach a canal so as to get the product of the mine to market.

And the same is true of Bishop v. North, 11 Mees & W. 418, 3 Railw. Cas. 459, 12 L. J. Exch. N. S. 362.

Any part of a highway the fee of which is in the adjoining owner may be used by the public for approaching a stream which it crosses without being liable to an action by him for trespass. Parsons v. Clark, 76 Me. 476.

H. P. F.

There may be a highway without a thoroughfare, or, in other words, a mere cul de sac may be a highway.

State v. Bartlett, cited in State v. Nudd, 23 N. H. 881; Galatian v. Gardner, 7 Johns. 106; Schate v. Pfeil, 56 Wis. 429; Saunders v. Townsend, 26 Hun. 308; Wiggins v. Tallmadge, 11 Barb. 457; Holdane v. Cold Spring, 21 N. Y. 474; People, Williams, v. Kingman, 24 N. Y. 559; Danforth v. Durell, 8 Allen, 242; Tyler v. Sturdy, 108 Mass. 196.

In Massachusetts a great pond is public property, and the public may lawfully resort thereto.

Kean v. Stetson, 5 Pick. 492.

It would be just as reasonable to declare Park street, which connects two of the principal thoroughfares of Boston, a cul de sac, as it would, under the circumstances of this case, to declare this way, which connects two equally important rural thoroughfares, a cul de sac.

Veale v. Boston, 185 Mass. 187.

The doctrine of dedication of rights for the use of the public has been recognized.

Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 432; Hobbs v. Lowell, 19 Pick. 405, 81 Am. Dec. 145; Valentine v. Boston, 22 Pick. 75, 83 Am. Dec. 711; Jennings v. Tisbury, 5 Gray, 74.

The common-law principle of dedication is made up of several distinct elements.

An intention on the part of the owner of the fee to dedicate must be shown.

State v. Trask, 6 Vt. 855, 27 Am. Dec. 554; Indianapolis & B. R. Co. v. Indianapolis, 12 Ind. 620; Godfrey v. Alton, 12 Ill. 29, 52 Am. Dec. 476; Morgan v. Chicago & A. R. Co. 96 U. S. 716, 24 L. ed. 743.

The intention to dedicate may be presumed from the owner's acquiescence in those conditions which in law are evidence of dedication.

Columbus v. Dahn, 36 Ind. 330; Smith v. State, 23 N. J. L. 712.

An acceptance by the public of the use dedicated must be shown.

Hobbs v. Lowell, 19 Pick. 405, 81 Am. Dec. 145; 2 Dill. Mun. Corp. chap. 17, cases cited in notes.

The acceptance by the public may be by use.

Hemphill v. Boston, 8 Cush. 195, 54 Am. Dec. 749; Pomfrey v. Saratoga Springs, 34 Hun. 607; Cincinnati v. White, 6 Pet. 431, 8 L. ed. 432; Guthrie v. New Haren, 31 Conn. 308; Stone v. Brooks, 85 Cal. 489; David v. New Orleans, 16 La. Ann. 404, 79 Am. Dec. 586.

The length of time user by the public continues has been held immaterial in a common-law dedication, as intention is the fundamental element in dedication, and the dedication is established when the intention is first shown to have existed.

Reg. v. Petrie, 30 Eng. L. & Eq. 207; Wyman v. State, 13 Wis. 664; Green v. Oakes, 17 Ill. 249; State v. Taff, 37 Conn. 392; Chapin v. State, 24 Conn. 236; Jarvis v. Dean, 3 Bing. 447; Rowan v. Portland, 8 B. Mon. 232.

This proposition can be true only of cases where the evidence of dedication is precise and certain, as when proved by express evidence.

Noyes v. Ward, 19 Conn. 250; Penquite v. Lawrence, 11 Ohio St. 274; Lewiston v. Proctor, 27 Ill. 414; Jackson v. Smiley, 18 Ind. 247; Dodge v. Stacy, 39 Vt. 560.

When the intention to dedicate cannot be shown by express evidence, the length of time a public user must continue, to lay the foundation for inferring the existence of a dedication or a grant, is twenty years.

Jennings v. Tisbury, 5 Gray, 74; Holt v. Sargent, 15 Gray, 97; Williams v. Cummington, 18 Pick. 312; Valentine v. Boston, 22 Pick. 75, 83 Am. Dec. 711; Com. v. Coupe, 128 Mass. 63.

When long user is relied on to prove dedication it need not be shown by whom the dedication was made.

Reg. v. Petrie, 30 Eng. L. & Eq. 207; Queen v. East Mark, 11 Q. B. 877.

The element of adverse right, where the bare fact of user for twenty years is relied on to constitute dedication, is supplied by an uninterrupted enjoyment by the public for twenty years.

Onstott v. Murray, 22 Iowa, 457; Thayer v. Boston, 19 Pick. 511, 81 Am. Dec. 157; Green v. Oakes, 17 Ill. 249; Holt v. Sargent, 15 Gray, 97; Jennings v. Tisbury, 5 Gray, 74; Valentine v. Boston, 22 Pick. 75, 83 Am. Dec. 711.

And a public use of property or rights for twenty years without interruption has been held sufficient evidence of dedication without further proof.

Barclay v. Howell, 6 Pet. 498-513, 8 L. ed. 477-483; New Orleans v. United States, 10 Pet. 718, 9 L. ed. 595; Parrish v. Stephens, 1 Or. 59; Lemon v. Hayden, 13 Wis. 167; McConnell v. Lexington, 12 Wheat. 582, 6 L. ed. 735; Waugh v. Leech, 28 Ill. 488.

This proposition rests upon the theory that a user uninterrupted and unexplained for twenty years is adverse.

Blake v. Everett, 1 Allen, 248; Leonard v. Leonard, 7 Allen, 277; Barnes v. Haynes, 13 Gray, 188, 74 Am. Dec. 629; Sargent v. Ballard, 9 Pick. 251; Samuels v. Horryscule, 104 Mass. 210; Hammond v. Zehner, 21 N. Y. 118; Perrin v. Garfield, 37 Vt. 304; Polly v. McCall, 37 Ala. 20.

And the presumption of a grant or dedication arising from twenty years uninterrupted and unexplained user by the public is imperative and conclusive.

It is not legally possible to admit that a way has been open for 100 years and more to the travel of "every citizen" (whomsoever chose), and at the same time deny or avoid the legal consequence following such user, to wit, that the way is a public way, by pleading the nature of the travel.

The phraseology "great ponds" was unknown to the law and they were not at first reserved as public property, or lying in common. Two instances of private grants are found in the Massachusetts Reports.

1 Mass. Col. Rec. 147, 211; Lewis, History of Lynn, 52; Com. v. Roxbury, 9 Gray, 451; Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Fall River, 154 Mass. 305, 13 L. R. A. 255.

In 1641 the general court of the colony of Massachusetts bay passed an ordinance to the following effect: "Every inhabitant who is an householder shall have free fishing and fowling in any great ponds, bays, coves, and rivers, so far as the sea ebbs and flows, within the precincts of the town where they dwell, unless the freemen of the same town or the general court have otherwise appropriated them."

And in 1647 another ordinance to the following effect was passed by the same body: "And for great ponds lying in common, though within the bounds of some town, it shall be free for any man to fish and fowl there, and may pass and repass on foot through any man's propriety for that end, so they trespass not upon any man's corn or meadow."

West Roxbury v. Stoddard, 7 Allen, 158.

These acts were joined together as acts in pari materia, and were published in the Body of Liberties for the instruction of the colonists as one continuous ordinance.

No similar ordinance was ever passed by the Plymouth colony, yet we find it in force throughout the whole territory of Massachusetts, including those parts which were formerly the colony of Plymouth, Nantucket, and Dukes county, and also in Maine, although none of these were under the jurisdiction of the colony of Massachusetts Bay.

Morton, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This case comes here on a report from the superior court, and the first question is whether there is jurisdiction in equity of the suit. If the result of allowing the bill to be maintained would be to transfer to the equity side of the court the trial of the question whether the defendants were guilty of trespass as alleged in the bill, and nothing more, then it is clear that, under Washburn v. Miller, 117 Mass. 376, the bill would have to be dismissed. But, previous to the filing of the bill, the plaintiff had brought an action at law; and, in addition to this the bill alleges that the defendants, on many occasions, had trespassed on the plaintiff's land, and threatened to continue such, acts regardless of the plaintiff's rights, and were insolvent, so that the plaintiff would be unable to collect from them such damages and costs as he might recover in actions at law. The master has found that the defendant John Gunn claims the right to enter on the plaintiff's premises for the purpose of obtaining access to the great pond on which they lie, in order to cut and carry away ice therefrom; that, previous to the filing of the bill, he had trespassed on the plaintiff's premises under this alleged claim of right; and that he is unable to satisfy an execution for damages. It is plain that, under such circumstances, an action at law will not afford the plaintiff adequate relief, and we think that he is entitled to maintain his bill. The ground on which equity takes jurisdiction in such a case is the inadequacy of the relief afforded by a court of law, and the principle has been applied in numerous cases. Clark v. Flint, 22 Pick. 231, 238, 38 Am. Dec. 733; Goodson v. Richardson, L. R. 9 Ch. 231; Smallman v. Onions, 3 Bro. Ch. 621; Wilson v. Hill, 46 N. J. Eq. 367; Winnepissioes Lake Co. v. Worster, 29 N. H. 433; Hicks v. Compton, 18 Cal. 206; Cottle v. Harrold, 72 Ga. 830; Musselman v. Marguis, 1 Bush, 463, 89 Am. Dec. 637; Stout v. Curry, 110 Ind. 514; Camp v. Bates, 11 Conn. 51, 27 Am. Dec. 707. The case is distinguishable from Washburn v. Miller, 117 Mass. 376. In that case it did not appear that an action at law had been brought before the filing of the bill, or that the defendant was insolvent, so that the damages which might be recovered could not be collected, or that the plaintiff would be irreparably injured unless relief in equity was granted to him.

The defendants contend that the roadway leading from the townway to the premises of the plaintiff, across the railroad, is a public way, and that they had the right to use it for the purpose of carting ice from the pond, as they were doing at the time of the trespass complained of. If it is not a public way, then they contend that inasmuch as the pond is a great pond, and cutting and carrying away ice have been recognized as a public use, they had the right, under the ordinances of 1641 and 49, to cross the unimproved land of the plaintiff for that purpose, although the defendant Gunn owned land bordering on the pond. It is not contended that the public authorities ever laid out the roadway as a public way. The contention is that it has become such by dedication or prescription. The master has found "that for more than 100 years there has been a well-known and well-defined roadway extending from the town or public way, across what is now the railroad location and railroad land, over and along the narrow neck of land in controversy, to the larger or main tract of land which with the narrow strip of land constitutes Union Point; that said roadway has been used and traveled by hunters, fishermen, picnic parties, celebrators on public occasions, and by whomsoever chose, without objection and without obstruction, until 1890, when the plaintiff erected a barrier across said road, and prevented the defendant from entering thereon." The master then stated that he did not find that this travel has been of a nature, or of an extent, or under a claim of right, which would give the public an easement by prescription over said roadway as a public way. Though stated negatively, we think that this must be regarded as in effect a finding that the public had not acquired a right of way by prescription over the roadway. The defendants argue that this conclusion is inconsistent with what is found as to the nature and extent of the use.

We do not think so. For aught that appears, the use which was made by fishermen and others of the roadway may have been with the permission, express or implied, of the successive owners of the land. There was nothing in the nature of the use described which, as matter of law, required the master to find that it was adverse and under a claim of right, or that the roadway had become a public way by dedication. Except in one deed, where it is evident from other expressions, that the word "highway" is used erroneously to describe the roadway, there is nothing in any of the deeds introduced in the plaintiffs' or defendants' chain of title which in any way tends to show an intention on the part of their predecessors in title to dedicate the roadway to the public use, or which recognizes any right therein on the part of the public. Even if the master would have been justified in finding an intention on the part of the predecessors in title of the plaintiff to dedicate the roadway to the public use, there was, so far as appears, nothing which, as matter of law, would have required him to find an acceptance on the part of the public authorities; and without that it is clear that the roadway could not become a public way by dedication. Hayden v. Stone, 112 Mass. 350; Com. v. Coupe, 123 Mass. 68; Morse v. Stocker, 1 Allen, 150.

We come, then, to the remaining question, namely, whether, under the ordinances of 1641 and 1649 and the construction which has been given to it, the defendants had a right to cross the plaintiffs' land for the purpose of cutting and carrying away ice from the pond without being deemed guilty of trespass. Various questions have arisen, and have been considered, in regard to the rights of the public and of individuals in the great ponds; but the question whether the public may cross private lands, and, if so, to what extent, for the purpose of gaining access to them, does not seem to have been passed upon, though there are various dicta in our decisions in regard to it, which tend to show that the right of access is limited to cases where it can be exercised without trespassing on the lands of others. Coolidge v. Williams, 4 Mass. 140-144; West Rox- bury v. Stoddard, 7 Allen, 158, 171; Paine v. Woods, 108 Mass. 173; Rowell v. Doyle, 131 Mass. 474.

The law relating to great ponds is peculiar to this commonwealth, and to Maine, which was formerly a part of this commonwealth. The earliest reference to great ponds is found in the "Body of Liberties," adopted in 1641, by the Massachusetts Bay Colony, and is as follows: "Every inhabitant that is an householder shall have free fishing and fowling in any great ponds, and bays, coves, and rivers so far as the sea ebbs and flows within the precincts of the town where they dwell, unless the freemen of the same town or the general court have otherwise appropriated them: provided that this shall not be extended to give leave to any man to come upon others' propriety without their leave." Body of Liberties, art. 16. This, it will be observed, gave no right to cross the land of others except by their leave. Afterwards in 1649, this was amended by a general law or ordinance so as to read as follows: "Every inhabitant who is an householder shall have free fishing and fowling in any great pond, bays, coves, and rivers, so far as the sea ebbs and flows within the precincts of the town where they dwell, unless the freemen of the same town or the general court have otherwise appropriated them: provided that no town shall appropriate to any particular person or persons any great pond containing more than 10 acres of land, and that no man shall cross upon another's propriety without their leave, otherwise than as hereafter expressed. The which clearly to determine: it is declared, that in all creeks, coves, and other places about and upon salt water where the sea ebbs and flows, the proprietor of the land adjoining shall have propriety to the low water mark, where the sea doth not ebb above 100 rods, and not more wheresoever it ebbs further: provided that such proprietor shall not by this liberty have power to stop or hinder the passage of boats or other vessels in or through any sea, creeks, or coves to other men's houses or lands. And for great ponds lying in common though within the bounds of some town it shall be free for any man to fish and fowl there, and may pass and repass on foot through any man's propriety for that end, so they trespass not upon any man's corn or meadow." Colonial Laws of Massachusetts, with Supplements 1690 to 1672, by W. H. Whitmore (p. 170). It is under the concluding sentence of this section that the defendants claim a right to cross the plaintiffs' land, provided they do no damage, and the master has found that no damage was done.

The effect of the provision which has been referred to in the Body of Liberties and in the ordinance of 1649 was to reserve the great ponds for the public use. West Roxbury v. Stoddard, 7 Allen, 158, 171; Com. v. Roxbury, 9 Gray, 451; Atty. Gen. v. Revere Copper Co. 152 Mass. 444, 9 L. R. A. 510; Watuppa Reservoir Co. v. Fall River, 147 Mass. 548, 1 L. R. A. 466. The uses which the public might make of them were not limited to those named in the ordinance or in the Body of Liberties, or to such as could be made of them at that time. The ponds, like any other property, could be applied to such uses as, from time to time, they became capable of. Though fishing and fowling only were named, the mention of them did not exclude other uses, and the permission to householders never has been construed as a prohibition to those who were not householders. But, as already observed, the manner in which those who did not own any lands on the ponds could gain access to them never has been expressly considered. It is probable, as was said in West Roxbury v. Stoddard, 7 Allen, 158, 171, "that many and perhaps most of the large ponds have some common land, or a public way of some kind, lying upon or leading to the shore by which the public has access to them." But, in the absence of such common land or public way, unless provision was made whereby those desirous of doing so could obtain some access to the ponds without being deemed guilty of trespass, the public would or might be excluded in many cases from any benefit of the public reservation. At the time when the ordinances were adopted, the territory to which they applied was almost wholly a wilderness. There naturally would be few public ways leading to great ponds. If there was any common land upon them, it might be remote and inconvenient. The population was small and scattered. Many, if not most, of the ponds would be surrounded with wild lands. No harm would be done by permitting persons to cross these lands for the purpose of gaining access to the ponds for fishing and fowling, which were the uses for which they were principally resorted to. In view of all these circumstances, it was provided by the ordinance of 1649 that any man who desired to gain access to the ponds for these purposes should be free to "pass and repass on foot through any man's property for that end, so they trespass not on any man's corn or meadow." This, we think, was intended to limit the passing and repassing to unimproved and unclosed lands lying on the ponds, and is to be construed with reference to the condition of things existing when the ordinance was adopted. It did not create a right of way over such lands on the part of the public, but relieved persons crossing them in the manner and for the purposes named from liability as trespassers, to the end that the public reservation should in no case altogether fail. If it is regarded as establishing a rule of property, the rule is not an inflexible and unvarying one, but it is to be applied with a due regard to existing conditions. As public means of access to the ponds multiply, and the land about the ponds becomes more valuable, it may well be held that a rule which was adapted to earlier and different conditions should suffer a corresponding modification in its application. In cases where there are no convenient means of access, fishermen and hunters and possibly others may still pass and repass on foot through wild lands lying upon them, for the purpose of gaining access to great ponds. But it hardly could have been intended, we think, that, as the uses of the ponds increased, the right to cross and recross the unimproved and unclosed lands lying upon them should increase also, and that such land should be liable to be subjected to a constantly increasing burden. As the ponds became more valuable for the public use, and were resorted to more by the public, means of access naturally would be provided by the public authorities, and there would be less instead of more necessity for crossing private lands. There is some analogy, perhaps, as the defendants contend, between land lying on great ponds and land bounding on the sea. But except in the case of land lying between high and low water mark, over which, at the time when private ownership was extended to low water mark, the right of fishery and of passage was expressly reserved, it never has been understood that the public were at liberty to cross private lands lying between a highway and the sea, for the purpose of gaining access to the latter. The fact that land is situated on a great pond may furnish a reason (as was said in Com. v. Alger, 7 Cush. 53, 94, 95, of land bounding on the sea) for holding that under the rule of property established by the ordinance of 1649, it is subject to be more restricted in its use than land situated elsewhere. Accordingly the legislature has provided that the fishery commissioners, in the discharge of their duties, may enter upon and pass through or over private property, and that all persons shall be allowed reasonable means of access to great ponds of more than 20 acres, for the purpose of fishing, without rendering themselves liable as trespassers. Pub. Stat. chap. 91, §§ 9, 11. If it had been understood that, under the ordinance, the public had a right of access to great ponds over private lands, this legislation would have been unnecessary, except so far as it related to the size of the ponds.

We do not think that any light on the question now under examination can be obtained by considering the rights of the public in the land lying between high and low water mark in tidal waters. At common law great ponds were unknown as such, and the ownership of land bounding on the sea extended only to ordinary high water mark. By the ordinance of 1649, private ownership was extended in the latter case to low water mark when it did not exceed 100 rods, subject to the right of passage over it and of fishing, which the public had always had. We fail to see in this, or in the fact that great ponds were named, in connection with "bays, coves, and rivers," where "the sea ebbs and flows," anything which tends to show that the right of passage on the part of the public over lands lying on great ponds is to be extended as the uses of the ponds increase or is to be enlarged beyond what reasonably may be supposed to have been contemplated in view of the conditions existing at the time of the adoption of the ordinance.

The result is that the exceptions taken by the defendants to the master's report must be overruled, and judgment must be entered for the plaintiff in the action at law, and a final decree entered in his favor in this suit, embodying the terms of the injunction heretofore issued, in accordance with the terms of the judge's report.

So ordered.

TENNESSEE SUPREME COURT.

Rankin ROBERTS et al.

v.

T. J. WINTON et al., Appts.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The law of the state in which a contract of life insurance is made by a resident thereof will control as to the rights of his creditors and beneficiaries, instead of the law of another state in which the beneficiaries reside, or of another state in which the insurance company is located and the policy payable.
2. Creditors of an insolvent have no right to the proceeds of his life insurance made payable to other persons, where he paid the premium therefor only by a worthless check, and never put into the insurance anything upon which the creditors could have had any claim.

(March 5, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendants from a decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals reversing a decree of the Chancery Court for Coffee County in their favor in a creditor's bill to reach the proceeds of a policy of insurance on the life of a deceased insolvent debtor. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Mr. B. P. Bashaw, for appellants:

By the death of George T. Winton, defendant T. J. Winton and his wife were vested with a perfect right to the proceeds of the policy, unless the right of the creditors are superior to theirs.

If the bill is maintained upon this theory, it must be under § 6097, Shannon's Code, which authorizes a creditor to file a bill in his own behalf and in behalf of other creditors, if he wishes, to set aside a fraudulent conveyance made by an insolvent debtor.

An assignment, to be subject to attack under this section, must not be of some invisible, valueless thing; it must be of some real and valuable article, and not only this, it must be absolutely subject to execution in favor of a creditor.

See Leslie v. Joyner, 2 Head, 514.

George T. Winton never paid one dollar of money in procuring the policy. The only thing he invested was his time, whatever it might have been. This was not subject to execution, nor has the law of our state yet gone so far as to authorize its appropriation to the payment of debts, as is distinctly illustrated in the last foregoing case.

George T. Winton was acting, not for himself and in his own behalf, but as agent for his parents, and for money expended, would be entitled to be reimbursed, and to no more.

Mr. F. M. Smith also for appellants:

Mr. George S. Ramsey, for appellee:

A creditor of an estate, either solvent or insolvent, without first recovering a judgment at law or proceeding against the property of the estate, and even without making the administrator a party, may file his bill in chancery for himself, or for himself and other creditors, to set aside fraudulent conveyances or other devices resorted to by the deceased for the purpose of hindering and delaying creditors, and subject the property by sale or otherwise to the satisfaction of the debt.

The right of a creditor of a deceased debtor to file a bill and subject property fraudulently conveyed does not depend on Mil. & V. Code, § 8241. Such a creditor may maintain his bill against a fraudulent vendee without a judgment against his debtor or his representative, and without joining the administrator as a party.

Spencer v. Armstrong, 12 Heisk. 707; Armstrong v. Croft, 3 Lea, 191; Pitt v. Poole, 91 Tenn. 73; Battle v. Street, 85 Tenn. 293.

There is no statute in Tennessee exempting to the father and mother the proceeds of a life insurance policy taken out by an unmarried man on his own life.

A transfer by the deceased of this insurance property which is not exempt to the father and mother is a transfer of property the creditors have a right to subject to the payment of their debts; and hence a right to attack a transfer of as fraudulent.

An assignment of a life insurance policy amounts only to a substitution for the assured, of the assignee, as a party to the policy, upon precisely the same terms and conditions as in the original policy. The assignee can only take that which the assignment gives him.

The title to the property insurance is a vested interest in the defendants (father and mother).

This executed contract was consummated in the state of Alabama on the very moment the deceased had his father and mother entered in the policy as the beneficiaries. This was an executed contract, voluntarily conveying personal property, and such a conveyance is governed by the lex loci domicilii and the lex loci contractus.

The deceased applied for the policy from the agent of the company in Alabama, the policy was there delivered, and the premiums paid.

Equitable L. Assur. Soc. v. Pettus, 140 U. S. 226, 35 L. ed. 497.

Messrs. T. C. Lind, George R. White, and James Mitchell also for appellee.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

In December, 1895, George T. Winton, then a resident of Birmingham, Alabama, took out a policy of insurance upon his life, payable to his father and mother, who lived in Coffee county, Tennessee. The policy was for $5,000, and was issued by the Mutual Benefit Life Insurance Company of Newark, New Jersey. For the first instalment premium upon the policy the assured gave his check for $38.76 to the agent of the company, and the agent advanced the amount of the check to the company. When presented to the bank, this check was not paid, and the agent retained it in his hands until after the assured's death, on the 15th of January, 1896, and the settlement by the insurance company with the payees of the policy. It was then paid to him by William R. Gunn, a brother of the assured's mother. After the assured's death, in Alabama, his remains were sent to his father, defendant T. J. Winton, in Tennessee, for burial, and at the same time the life insurance policy was delivered to him by William R. Gunn. He returned it to Gunn, to take back with him to Birmingham, where Gunn resided, in order that it might be collected for him. Gunn administered in Alabama upon the estate of the insured, and thereafter returned the policy to the father, in Tennessee; and the insurance company compromised and settled the policy with the father and mother by the payment of $2,500 to them in full of all liability thereunder. T. J. Winton, the father, paid over, of this amount, $1,000 to Gunn, partly in consideration of funeral expenses he had advanced and incurred, and upon his promise to settle for the same thereafter. Gunn paid off the check for the first premium (which was held by the agent), as he states, as a worthless claim against the insured; the payment by Gunn being, as he states, gratuitous. In regard to the form of the policy, it is only necessary to state that it was payable to T. J. and Sarah F. Winton, father and mother of the assured, George T. Winton, in case they, or either of them, survived him; if not, then to his estate; and it was payable at the office of the company, in Newark, New Jersey. The complainants are creditors of George T. Winton, the insured, who died insolvent. It is charged that Gunn, the administrator upon the insured's estate in Alabama, conspired with T. J. Winton, the father, to remove the policy to Tennessee, and thus place it, as an asset of George T. Winton's estate, beyond the jurisdiction of the courts of Alabama, and in the hands of the defendant in Tennessee, and that they, as creditors, have a right to follow the proceeds of the policy, and collect and appropriate them to their debts. The bill is filed as a general creditors' bill. An amended bill was filed, alleging that there was no administrator in Tennessee upon the insured's estate, and repeating that the administrator in Alabama had colluded with the defendants in Tennessee to remove the funds from Alabama, and beyond the jurisdiction of its courts; and it was asked that an administrator ad litem be appointed, if necessary. The bill, as thus amended, was demurred to. It was then amended the second time, by showing that John E. Patton had been appointed administrator in Tennessee, and making him a party; and the demurrer was then overruled. Defendant Winton answered; denying the equities of the bill, insisting that the contract of insurance should not be construed by the laws of Alabama, but by the laws of Tennessee or New Jersey, and denying that he was guilty of any fraud in obtaining the proceeds of the policy. The chancellor was of opinion that the answer denied the equities of the bill, and that it was not sustained by the proof, and dismissed the bill. On appeal, the court of chancery appeals reversed this decree, sustained the bill, and granted the relief prayed; and defendants have appealed to this court, and assigned errors. It is insisted that the court of chancery appeals erred in holding that the contract must be construed by the laws of Alabama, and not by the laws of New Jersey or Tennessee. It is further insisted that there was no assignment of the policy of insurance, or other assets of the insured's estate, involved, but that the policy was made payable in the first instance to the defendants; that there was no relation existing between the insured's creditors and the defendant beneficiaries that would warrant any recovery by them against defendants; that defendants having received the money in good faith, believing that they were entitled to it, their only liability, if wrongfully received, was to Gunn, who paid it to him, and the creditors' remedies were against Gunn,

and not against them; that, as a matter of fact,
the insured never paid any premium or consideration for the policy, and his creditors could not, therefore, have any interest in it or its proceeds; and, finally, that, if the creditors could recover anything, it could only be the amount paid out by the insured, and not the insurance purchased by such payment.

The first question presented and necessary to be considered is whether this contract of insurance is to be construed and governed by the laws of Alabama, New Jersey, or Tennessee, so far as the rights of the creditors of the insured and the beneficiaries under the policy are concerned. The court of chancery appeals was of opinion that the laws of Alabama, and not those of New Jersey and Tennessee, must control; and in this, we are of opinion that court is correct. Alabama was both the place where the contract was entered into, and where the insured resided at the time it was made.
The general rule is that the lex domicilii or the lex loci contractus governs and determines the validity of contracts relating to personal property. 3 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 553, 571, and notes citing authorities. Here the lex domicilii and lex loci contractus concur.

Several provisions of the Code of Alabama are cited, as determining what the law of that state is in regard to the proceeds of policies of insurance, and the rights of widows and creditors; but they refer to cases where the insurance has been effected by the wife upon the life of the husband, and not to cases like the present, where the insured has placed a policy on his own life in favor of his father and mother. We are also referred to the case of Fearn v. Ward, 65 Ala. 38. In that case Fearn had insurance payable to his infant daughter, Kate Coles Fearn; and after his death the proceeds of the policy were paid over for the infant daughter, and invested for her by her guardian. It appears that the policy was for $10,000, and that the insured had paid something less than $500 upon it in the way of premiums. It was held that, under the provisions of § 2733 of the Code of Alabama of 1876, the exemption therein provided was designed for the benefit of the wife and children, and, inasmuch as the policy was payable to and for the benefit of only one of several children, it was not protected by the statutes, and that the statute could not operate as to contracts made before its passage, and that the conveyance of the insurance was voluntary and fraudulent as to existing creditors, whether their liability was fixed or contingent. It appears that the policy was originally taken out payable to the wife and children, but subsequently that policy was canceled, and another issued to the infant, as before stated. It is presumed that this is what the court referred to as a conveyance of the insurance, as no transfer or assignment of it appears. The de-murrer to the bill having been overruled, and cause remanded, it was tried, and again appealed to the supreme court, where it is reported in 80 Ala. 555. The court thereupon reaffirmed its former holding, that the policy, being payable to one only of several children, was not protected by the exemption in the statutes. It was further held that the investment of premiums by the insured in this policy was, in effect, a gift by the father to the child, which would be void as to existing creditors of the father, and that such creditors were entitled to have their debts satisfied out of the proceeds, and were not confined merely to the premiums paid; that the proceeds of the policy constituted the property purchased, and were the subject-matter of the investment; that, the father being in debt, the premiums paid must be treated as a voluntary investment, and hence fraudulent in law as to existing creditors. The court of chancery appeals construe this holding to be, in effect, that the taking out of a policy of life insurance upon the life of any person not protected strictly by the exemptions of the statute must be treated as an investment of the insured's money, and would inure to the benefit of his estate, which a creditor, upon the death of the insured, may follow into the hands of the beneficiary named in the policy, who has received the same from the insurance company. Applying the rule to the facts of this case, the court of chancery appeals was of opinion that the creditors of the insured have the right to follow up and reclaim the $2,500 paid over to T. J. Winton, the beneficiary named in the policy, and to have it administered as a part of the estate of insured, deceased, but that inasmuch as the said T. J.

Winton had received the proceeds in good faith, and had paid part of them on just debts of the estate, to that extent he should have credit. A decree was therefore entered for the sum of $2,500, but the cause was remanded to the court below, and execution in the meantime was suspended in order that an account might be taken of the debts thus paid, and for which the defendant is to have credit; and the balance was directed to be paid into the chancery court of Coffee county, to be there administered as assets of the estate of George T. Winton, deceased, as an insolvent estate; and the costs were adjudged against the defendants, so far as accrued. Conceding that the court of chancery appeals are correct in their construction of the law applicable to the case, there is a feature of it, as developed in the record, which is necessarily fatal to the claim of complainants. They can only recover upon the theory that the insured diverted, into life insurance investment, funds which his creditors had a right to subject to their debts. It is only upon the theory that the insured had such a fund or asset liable to his creditors, and which he removed from their grasp by investing it in insurance, that they can recover. To illustrate: Suppose the insured had invested, in insurance, property which by the laws of Alabama was exempt from seizure for his debts, it cannot be that, because such funds were thus invested, nevertheless a creditor could follow the fund into the investment, and seize it, though it was made in the name and for the benefit of another. At most, it could be only a gift, by the son to the father, of funds or property exempt from the seizure by creditors of the son, or the proceeds of such funds so invested. But the present case is even stronger, inasmuch as the deceased did not invest a dollar of his funds, or any of his property, in this insurance, of any kind whatever. On the contrary, he gave his individual check to the agent, which proved entirely worthless, as he had no funds in bank to meet it. In other words, he purchased this insurance with his individual credit,—a promise to pay. But his credit and promise to pay was not an asset which a creditor could seize, any more than would have been his personal labor. Having put nothing into this insurance upon which his creditors could have had any claim when it was put in, or, rather, when the policy was issued, though nothing had been put in or paid, there is nothing which the creditor could follow up. In this view of the case, there is no possible ground upon which the complainants can recover as creditors, or have any right to follow up this policy or its proceeds; but such proceeds passed to the beneficiaries, under the terms of the policy. It is not necessary to pass upon other questions involved, as this must be controlling.

The decree of the Court of Chancery Appeals is reversed, and the complainants' bill dismissed, at their costs.

Lucy S. HINES.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. A landlord is liable for injury to his tenant from the fall of a porch which, to his knowledge at the time of the lease, had drawn away from the house, and which he attempted to repair but negligently left unsafe.
2. A landlord is liable to his tenant for such defects and dangers as are in existence when the lease is made, provided he knew of them, or ought to know of them, and provided also that the tenant does not know of them, and could not know of them,—both parties in the matter exercising reasonable care and diligence.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Davidson County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for injuries caused by the fall of a porch on leased premises through defects for which the landlord was alleged to be responsible. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion Messrs. Vertrees & Vertrees, R. T. Smith, R. McP. Smith, and E. H. East for appellant.

Messrs. Hamilton Parks and E. A. Price for appellee.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an action by a tenant against a landlord for injuries received from the defective condition of leased premises. The case has been before the court heretofore, and an opinion was rendered, reported in 96 Tenn. 148, and in 96 Tenn. 328, which states quite fully the facts and contentions as then made. At the last trial of the cause in the court below, there was a verdict for plaintiff for $2,300; and on motion for new trial, upon suggestion by the presiding judge $500 of this amount was remitted, and for the balance, $1,800 judgment was rendered; and defendant has appealed and assigned errors.

It is insisted that the court erred in following the rule laid down in Hines v. Willcox, 96 Tenn. 148, and 96 Tenn. 328, and Stenberg v. Willcox, 96 Tenn. 163, 34 L. R. A. 615, and 96 Tenn. 324, 34 L. R. A. 332, as to the relative duties and liabilities of the landlord and tenant in regard to dangerous premises; and it is earnestly insisted these cases are not a correct exposition of the law. The contention, in brief, is that in the cases referred to this court

NOTE.—The distinction emphasized in the above case between the landlord's liability for a delictum in leasing dangerous premises and his contractual liability for the defects therein has not been very plainly brought out or particularly regarded in many of the cases, but they have used general language as to the existence or nonexistence of liability in the circumstances presented. The note to this case on former appeal in 34 L. R. A. 324, points out what the annotator understood to be the distinctions between the various phases of the question presented by the prior decisions.

laid down a rule not supported by authority, devolving a duty of active diligence upon the landlord to know the condition of his property when he leases it, as to its safety; and it is insisted the true rule in ordinary cases of rental is caveat emptor, and the duty of examining the premises is upon the tenant, and, in the absence of fraud or warranty of condition by the landlord, the tenant takes the property at his own risk. It is insisted that this has been the rule recognized and followed in this state up to the cases of Hines v. Wilcox, 96 Tenn. 148, and Stenberg v. Wilcox, 96 Tenn. 163, 34 L. R. A. 615, and 96 Tenn. 328, 34 L. R. A. 833, and that the court since the 96 Tenn. case, has returned to and reaffirmed this rule, in the case of Schmalried v. White, 97 Tenn. 39, 32 L. R. A. 783. In regard to the latter case, it is only necessary to say that, in it, it is expressly stated that what was therein said was not intended to conflict with the case of Hines v. Wilcox, and that case was distinguished from the Hines v. Wilcox Case. In the case in 97 Tenn. 39, 32 L. R. A. 783, the court held that the trial judge erred in holding the landlord liable, though he may have been ignorant of any defects and conditions without fault or negligence on his part, thus making the landlord an insurer of the condition of his premises. In the Hines v. Wilcox case the landlord was not held to such strict liability, but only held liable for what he knew, or might have known by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, and then only when the tenant failed to ascertain such facts by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence on his part. There is no conflict in the two cases, so far as the real questions presented are involved. Prior to the case of Hines v. Wilcox, there are in Tennessee only three cases in which the question of the liability of the landlord to the tenant, under conditions somewhat similar to the present, are considered. The first is the case of Banks v. White, 1 Sneed, 618. In that case the leased premises became untenable during the pendency of the lease, caused by the acts of the city authorities in opening new streets, and not by any act of the landlord, or any defect in the premises themselves when they were leased; and the court held that the law does not imply any warranty as to the continuing condition of the property demised,—a rule laid down in all the cases, and questioned in none, but one wholly different from the principle involved in the present case, which relates to the condition of the premises when leased, and not to any subsequent changes, contingencies, or conditions during the lease. Another case is that of Southern Oil Works v. Bickford, 14 Lea, 659. That was a case of a suit by a landlord against a tenant for improperly using and abusing the premises during the continuance of the lease, whereby the houses were broken down. It did not involve the liability of the landlord to the tenant, arising out of the dangerous or defective condition of the premises when they were leased, in any way. In Young v. Bransford, 12 Lea, 244, in treating of liability to the public for the condition of the premises, it is stated that it is the duty of the tenant or occupier to keep the premises in repair, so far as to make them safe to the public. This, it will be seen, also relates to the continuing condition of the premises pending the lease. The same case adds: "The landlord is liable when he covenants to keep the premises in repair, or where the defect exists at the time of the lease," citing 1 Thomp. Neg. p. 317; Whart. Neg. § 817. This is the only case in our state, up to that time, prescribing the rule of liability between the landlord and tenant at the time the lease is made; and it holds the landlord liable for defects and dangerous conditions existing at that time. We are also cited to the case of Doyle v. Union P. R. Co. as being a case elaborated with great research and ability. 147 U. S. 418, 87 L. ed. 223. In that case a railroad had let to a party a house, which during the continuance of the lease was overwhelmed with a snowslide. There was no defect in the premises when let. The snowslide was the act of God, occurring afterwards, and the landlord was in no way responsible therefor. The premises were safe when leased. So that this was also a case of continuing condition, and the landlord was not held liable. The case of Viterbo v. Friedlander, 120 U. S. 712, 30 L. ed. 777, is also referred to; but that was a Louisiana case, in which the rules of the civil law were applied, and the doctrine of the common law was only incidentally mentioned, and not at all involved in the decision of the case, and not commented on or explained. In the case of Bowe v. Hunking, 135 Mass. 380, 46 Am. Rep. 471, it was laid down as a rule that, if there was a duty devolving on the landlord to inform the tenant of a defect in the premises, there would be no distinction, as a ground of liability, between an intentional and an unintentional neglect to perform it, and there could be no such duty without knowledge of the defect; but this is evidently opposed to the great weight of authority, which discriminates between the intentional and unintentional neglect to perform a duty,—the former being a fraud or tort, and the latter not. In this case it appears that a step in a stairway had been sawn out, and the landlord knew it, and tested it, and deemed it safe; but the tenant, it seems, did not know it, though he had some opportunity to ascertain it; and it was held that he could not recover because of an injury from it. This is an extreme case, which does not commend itself, by its facts or reasoning, to general approval. The defect was one which no tenant would expect, or be on the lookout for; and, while known to the landlord, it was not called to the tenant's attention, and was clearly a trap which the tenant did not see, and could not anticipate, or discover with any reasonable care. The case of Edwards v. New York & H. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 245, 50 Am. Rep. 659, is also referred to with approval, and from it is cited an extract as follows: "It is a universal rule to which no exception can be found in any case now regarded as authority, that upon the demise of real estate there is no implied warranty that the property is fit for occupation, or suitable for the use or purpose for which it is hired." This evidently has reference alone to the liabilities arising out of the contractual relation between the landlord and tenant. The same case on page 249, recognizes a distinct ground of liability, resting upon the delictum of the landlord, and not on contract. It says: "If he [the landlord] demises premises, knowing that they are dangerous and unfit for the use for which they are hired, and fails to disclose their condition, he is guilty of negligence, which will in many cases impose responsibility upon him." And again (same page): "The responsibility of the landlord is the same in all cases. If guilty of negligence or other delictum which leads directly to the accident and wrong complained of, he is liable; if not so guilty, no liability attaches to him. If he lets a building for a warehouse, knowing that it is so weak and imperfectly constructed that the floors will break down from the weight necessary to be placed upon them, his negligence imposes liability upon him for injury to the person or property of anyone who may lawfully be upon the premises using them for the purposes for which they were demised." The case of Jaffe v. Harteau, 56 N. Y. 398, 15 Am. Rep. 433, is also cited, and in that case it is held without any mature consideration, that in the absence of fraud or warranty the landlord is not liable for the present or future condition of leased premises; but the case evidently considers only the liabilities arising out of the contractual relation of the parties, and does not refer to such liabilities as arise out of the delictum of the landlord. And the same may be said of Keates v. Cadogan, 10 C. B. 591, and Robbins v. Jones, 15 C. B. N. S. 240, referred to, which simply state the rights arising out of the contractual relation, and do not consider the matter from the standpoint of delictum on the part of the landlord. But in the case of Jaffe v. Harteau, the court is evidently influenced, if not controlled, by the fact that the defendant did not know, or have any reason to suspect, that the premises were dangerous; thus impliedly recognizing the doctrine of some care upon the part of the landlord, and relieving him because he did not know, or have reason to suspect.

It may be conceded that no ground of liability arises out of the contract between the landlord and tenant, in the absence of fraud or warranty, but a great number of cases in which the question has been considered hold that there is an independent ground of liability, arising out of the delictum or wrong of the landlord in leasing premises dangerous at the time; and there is not necessarily any conflict between the two classes of cases, when properly understood. This distinction was attempted to be pointed out in Hines v. Wilcox, 96 Tenn. 332-334, and cases were cited. There is also a distinction drawn in the cases between patent and hidden defects. In the former, when the landlord and tenant exercise the same care, and have equal opportunities for examination, there is no ground of liability on the part of the landlord to the tenant, inasmuch as the negligence of the landlord is neutralized in its effect by the negligence of the tenant, and the ordinary rule of contributory negligence by the injured party applies to defeat any recovery by the tenant. In regard to hidden or secret defects or dangers, the cases are uniform that if they exist, and are known to the landlord, and not disclosed to the tenant, the landlord will be liable, because such conduct amounts to a fraud. It is insisted, however, that in such cases of hidden defects there is no liability, in the absence of actual knowledge on the part of the landlord, and fraud and deceit practised by him. The case of Hines v. Wilcox, heretofore reported, goes one step further than this, and holds the landlord liable not only if he has actual knowledge, but also if, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, he could have such knowledge; and it is only upon this latter proposition that there is any difference of opinion. Hence it is strenuously insisted that no active duty devolves upon the landlord to ascertain such hidden defects and dangers; and in the absence of actual knowledge the landlord will not be liable for any damages. The logic of this position is that a landlord is under no obligation to know anything about the condition of his premises,—whether they are dangerous or safe,—whether habitable or a nuisance,—and so long as he keeps himself ignorant, either intentionally or negligently, he cannot be held liable for any damages resulting from the dangerous condition of his property when leased; but if, by accident or examination, he becomes aware that a second defect does exist, then he is liable, if he fails to disclose it. Under this ruling the landlord is placed in the better condition, the more negligent and inattentive he is, and a premium is put upon his ignorance. In the case of Hines v. Wilcox, 96 Tenn. 328, and 96 Tenn. 148, the rule was laid down that he is liable for what he knows, or by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence ought to know, about his property, provided the tenant at the same time exercises reasonable care and diligence, and the authorities were cited. It was not attempted, in the 96 Tenn. case, to lay down the degree of diligence that the landlord must exercise; the trial judge having, in his charge, relieved him from any diligence or duty whatever, and the question before the court being whether such charge was correct, as thus broadly put. It was said, however (p. 331, 96 Tenn.), that "the rule laid down does not place upon the landlord the obligation of an insurer or warrantor by contract, nor does it impose the extreme duty of constant care and inspection," but only reasonable care and diligence; and the like reasonable care and diligence are required of the tenant, thus imposing reasonable care and good faith upon both, in the absence of any contract or warranty. Several cases were cited supporting the holding as thus made, and others might have been collated from the mass of authorities upon the subject. The case of Hines v. Wilcox, has been re-reported in 34 L. R. A. 824, and extensively annotated by Mr. Henry P. Farnham. The learned annotator states that the case is a new departure in the law of landlord and tenant, and he has industriously collated authorities to sustain his assertion, and has commented upon some of the authorities cited; leaving, however, the great bulk of the cases cited in Hines v. Wilcox without comment. The annotation is valuable as a brief upon the liability of the landlord to the tenant arising out of the contractual relation, but it is to be regretted that the learned annotator did not also collate the authorities bearing upon the true question presented in the Hines v. Wilcox case, of delictum on the part of the landlord in leasing dangerous premises, and did not comment more fully upon the numerous authorities imposing upon the landlord some obligation to know the condition of his premises when leased. Quite a complete and discriminating review of the authorities up to the date of 1849 is found in the case of Lowell v. Spaulding, [4 Cush. 277], 50 Am. Dec. 776-783. See especially, this feature, treated at page 780 with citations.

The ground of liability upon the part of a landlord when he demises dangerous property has nothing special to do with the relation of landlord and tenant. It is the ordinary case of liability for personal misfeasance, which runs through all the relations of individuals to each other. As is substantially said by Ruger, Ch. J., in Edwards v. New York & H. R. Co. 98 N. Y. 256 50 Am. Rep. 659 (dissenting opinion): "This liability does not rest upon the theory of an express contract between the owner and the person receiving the injuries, but is predicated upon the obligation which the law imposes on all to so keep and use their property that others using or entering upon it by their invitation shall not be injured by its improper condition or unfitness, and its inadequacy for the purposes to which it has been devoted." And as is stated in Coven v. Sunderland, 145 Mass. 368, quoted in Hines v. Willcox, there is an exception to the general rule of caveat emptor, as between lessor and lessee, "arising from the duty which the lessor owes to the lessee. This duty does not originate directly from the contract, but from the relation of the parties, and is imposed by law." It is not upon the ground of an insurer or warrantor of condition under his lease contract, but on the ground of the obligation implied by law not to expose the tenant or the public to danger which he knows, or in good faith should know, and which the tenant does not know, and cannot ascertain by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence. "In cases where lessors have been held liable for such injuries to the lessees, the liability is founded in negligence. . . . The action of tort has for its foundation the negligence of the defendant, and this means more than a mere breach of promise. . . . There must be some breach of duty distinct from breach of contract," etc. Tuttle v. George H. Gilbert Mfg. Co. 145 Mass. 174, 175. In Kern v. Myll, 80 Mich. 580, 8 L. R. A. 682, it is said, in a suit between tenant and landlord: "The cause . . . [of action] does not rest upon any covenant, express or implied, of the landlord to repair the premises nor that they were habitable at the time the lease was made; nor does it rest necessarily upon the relation of landlord and tenant. . . . But the cause of action is based upon the maxim that every person must so use his own premises as not to injure others, either in person or property." The declaration showed a nuisance when the premises were leased, known to defendant and concealed from plaintiff, calculated to injure his health.

On the former trial of this cause a few cases were cited upon the point of liability of the landlord where he knows, or by using reasonable care and diligence ought to know, of the danger or nuisance, but it was not attempted to cite them all. The following were cited in 96 Tenn. 385, 34 L. R. A. 884; Martin v. Richards, 155 Mass. 381; State, Basho, v. Boyce, 73 Md. 469;

Carson v. Godley, 26 Pa. 111, 67 Am. Dec. 404; Coke v. Gutkess, 80 Ky. 598, 44 Am. Rep. 499; Lindsey v. Leighton, 150 Mass. 288; Moynihan v. Allyn, 163 Mass. 272; Pingrey, Real Prop. § 592. We add others, but by no means all that may be cited: Albert v. State, Ryan, 66 Md. 325; Timlin v. Standard Oil Co. 126 N. Y. 514; Wood, Land. & T. p. 855; Coven v. Sunderland, 145 Mass. 368; Minor v. Sharon, 112 Mass. 477, 37 Am. Rep. 122; Butler v. Cushing, 48 Hun, 617, mem.; Cutter v. Hamlen, 147 Mass. 471, 1 L. R. A. 429; Booth v. Merriam, 155 Mass. 521; Oxford v. Leathe, 165 Mass. 265; Willcox v. Zane, 167 Mass. 306; Lynch v. Swinn, 167 Mass. 510; Lenz v. Aldrich, 6 App. Div. 178; Matthews v. De Groff, 13 App. Div. 356; O'Dwyer v. O'Brien, 13 App. Div. 570.

In Albert v. State, Ryan, 66 Md. 325, a wharf was rented and it was said: "If defendant knew, or by exercise of reasonable diligence could have known, of its unsafe condition, and that the accident happened in consequence of such condition, the plaintiff was entitled to recover." The true doctrine is well stated in Timlin v. Standard Oil Co. 126 N. Y. 514. The law "does not impose [upon the landlord] the duty of constant care and inspection of premises. . . . It imposes upon him the duty of reasonable care to inform himself of the condition of property which he proposes to let, and if at the leasing he knew, or if, in the exercise of reasonable care, he would become informed of the fact that the property has upon it a nuisance dangerous to the public or to an adjoining owner, it imposes upon the owner and proposed lessor the duty to abate it before he leases such property, and if he do not, it leaves him with a liability to respond in damages to anyone injured in consequence of, and by the nuisance." And again it is said (p. 525, 126 N. Y.): "If he were in truth ignorant, and yet, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, he would have known of its existence, there is no principle which can exempt him from responsibility, any more than if he created the nuisance himself." In Wunder v. McLean, 134 Pa. 384, the matter is presented in a shape that shows the sound reason and good sense of the rule that the landlord is liable if the premises are dangerous when he leases; and the tenant, if they become dangerous when he has them leased. It is laid down that the landlord is liable if the premises are a nuisance when leased, and he cannot escape liability by leasing the property to a tenant, and putting him in possession. To the same effect are Knauss v. Brua, 107 Pa. 85; Fow v. Roberts, 108 Pa. 489; Leonard v. Storer [115 Mass. 86], 15 Am. Rep. 76, 79, note; Ingwersen v. Rankin [47 N. J. L. 18], 54 Am. Rep. 109; Tomle v. Hampton, 129 Ill. 879; Kern v. Myll, 80 Mich. 525, 8 L. R. A. 682; Riley v. Simpson, 83 Cal. 217, 7 L. R. A. 622; Nugent v. Boston, C. & M. R. Co. 80 Me 63; Lowell v. Spaulding [4 Cush. 277], 50 Am. Dec. 780, notes. In Cutter v. Hamlen, 147 Mass. 475, 1 L. R. A. 429, the court held that when the landlord knew the drains were defective, and also that diphtheria had been in the house, the jury would have been warranted in finding that the landlord knew, or ought to have known, as a prudent man, that this was dangerous. In Lindsey v. Leighton, 150 Mass. 288, the court was asked to charge that it must be known that the defendant had knowledge of the defect, or they could not hold him. The trial judge refused, and on appeal the supreme court said this refusal was correct; that it was not necessary to show that defendant had actual knowledge of the defect; his duty was that of due care, and ignorance of the defect was no defense; citing Gill v. Middleton, 105 Mass. 477, 7 Am. Rep. 548; Readman v. Conway, 126 Mass. 874; Looney v. McLean, 129 Mass. 38, 37 Am. Rep. 295; Watkins v. Goodall, 138 Mass. 538. This was a case of defect in steps leading to a tenement occupied by plaintiff. There was evidence that defendant's attention had been called to the defect, and he had frequently passed over the steps. In Martin v. Richards, 155 Mass. 386, the court held that if the condition of the vault in 1886 was dangerous, and defendant's attention was called to it, and he undertook to remedy it, and used means which were ineffectual to remedy it, and which he knew, or ought to have known, were ineffectual, he cannot escape liability by employing a servant to do the work, and escape the consequences of the servant's neglect to do the work properly. The knowledge of the servant must be imputed to the master; citing Baldwin v. Casella, L. R. 7 Exch. 325; Gladman v. Johnson, 36 L. J. C. P. N. S. 158; Applebee v. Percy, 43 L. J. C. P. N. S. 385. In Moynihan v. Allyn, 162 Mass. 272, it was held that a minor could not recover because the defect was in existence when the premises were let. The defect was in a platform common to several tenants, but the controlling feature was that its condition could have been ascertained by reasonable examination by the tenant. The court held that defendant's duty was to keep the platform in as good condition as when leased, and to inform the tenant of any hidden defects which could not be discovered by reasonable diligence. In Booth v. Merriam, 155 Mass. 522, it is said: If there is a concealed defect that renders the premises dangerous, which the tenant cannot discover by the exercise of reasonable diligence, of which the landlord has, or ought to have, knowledge, it is the landlord's duty to disclose it, and he is liable for any injury which results from his concealment of it." It is also said in the case that there was nothing to show that defendant had actual knowledge of the danger, or was culpably responsible for it, and that it was such as would have been easily discernible. In Oxford v. Leathe, 165 Mass. 255, the landlord was held liable for the condition of a platform used to go into a place of public amusement, on the ground that he must have contemplated that the public would go on it; and the liability is stated to be just the same as if the premises are let with a nuisance upon them; citing many familiar cases. In Witcox v. Zane, 167 Mass. 806, a nurse of the tenant was injured by the defective condition of roof used by all the tenants in the building to hang out clothes, and other purposes. There was no evidence that plaintiff did not exercise due care. There was evidence that the plank which broke was badly decayed, crossgrained, and knotty, and no repairs had been made on the roof for years. The plaintiff testified that he had never noticed the defect. It was held that she had no such duty to observe the condition of the roof, as to safety, as the landlord had. In Lynch v. Swan, 167 Mass. 510, there was an injury upon a common stairway used by several tenants. The court says that there was some evidence that the step was not strong enough, and the question was whether or not the landlord knew this, or ought to have known it. It was not so apparent that plaintiff could be held to take the risk. The court says: "The question is this: Was there evidence for the jury that the landlord ought to have known it, or would have known it if he had exercised reasonable care?" And again the court emphasizes what the landlord knew, or ought to have known, as the controlling feature in the case. In Matthews v. De Groff, 18 App. Div. 356, it was held to be the duty of a landlord to keep in repair a coal hole or chute in the sidewalk in front of premises which he leased, and that he must from time to time examine and see its condition, even though the same tenant held over from time to time; and it is put on the ground that it is the duty of the landlord to examine and ascertain the condition of the property when he leases it, and the holding over from term to term was, in effect, a new lease each term. This proceeds upon the idea that the landlord owes a duty to the public to have his premises safe when he leases them, even though the obligation is on the tenant to make repairs during the lease. In O'Dwyer v. O'Brien, 13 App. Div. 570, it was held that the landlord would be liable for the defective repairing of a plank walk on the premises used by plaintiff, but for the fact that the tenant could and did see the defect and danger, and was thus guilty of such contributory negligence as would defeat her recovery. In State, Bashie, v. Boyce, 78 Md. 469, it was held that the owner of a wharf was not liable for injuries sustained, by an employee of a lessee, from a rotten plank, unless it appears that the owner knew, or by reasonable care and diligence could have known, the unsafe condition of the wharf when he leased it. See also Metzger v. Schultz, 16 Ind. App. 454.

It was not held in Hines v. Wilcox that a landlord is liable for a defect which occurs, or a danger that arises, after the lease has been made, and while the tenant is in possession. For these defects and dangers the tenant not only has no recourse against the landlord, but he is, on the contrary, liable himself to third persons who may be injured. But the landlord is liable for such defects and dangers as are in existence when the lease is made, provided he knew of them, or ought to know of them, and provided, also, that the tenant does not know of them, and could not know of them; both parties in the matter exercising reasonable care and diligence. Several distinctions are attempted to be drawn, but, so far as they affect the question of the duty of the landlord to know the condition of his premises, there is no ground for any difference in its application. It is said that many of the cases in which the expression "ought to know" is used in regard to the landlord are cases in which the landlord remains in possession of a portion of the premises, while other portions of the same premises are in the possession of other tenants. But the only difference between the two classes of cases appears to be this: that the liability of the landlord ordinarily ceases if he rents out the entire premises, but, when he retains part, it continues so long as he is in possession of such part used for common purposes. When the entire premises are leased, the landlord is liable if the premises are dangerous when he makes the lease, but ordinarily not longer. When he remains in possession of a portion, his liability continues so long as he remains in possession of that portion not leased. In the former cases it is his duty to know the condition when he leases; in the latter, to know the condition so long as he retains control of any part of the common property. The obligation in either case to know the condition of the property is the same; but in the former it ceases after the tenant enters; in the latter it is a continuing obligation while the landlord retains possession. It is said that some of the cases cited are cases of public property, such as docks, wharves, theaters, and other places of public resort; and it is attempted to show that these form exceptions to the general rule. Even if this were so, it could not avail in this case, as the property in this case was rented for boarding-house purposes, and so known to the landlord or his agent. But we are unable to see any ground for the application of a different rule in such cases. In the one case we have an instance of a quasi public nuisance; in the other, a case of quasi private nuisance. But the obligation not to expose the individual to danger is the same as that not to expose the public to danger. It has been said that "a private nuisance . . . is anything done, . . . or omitted to be done, contrary to a legal duty," from which an injury results to another. 16 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, pp. 929, 930. And there is no difference in principle between condition which is called a "private" and one called a "public" nuisance. One is where the danger is to the individual; the other, when it is to a number of individuals, or the entire public.

So far as there is any obligation on the landlord to know the condition of his property, it does not matter whether the dangers and defects are patent or secret, unless, indeed, there is some more stringent duty in the latter case, inasmuch as it may be presumed that, as to patent dangers, they will most probably be seen by the tenant. If he has the opportunity of examination. But to hold that the rule of caveat emptor applies to all cases of rental when there is no warranty is to ignore the large mass of cases which hold the landlord liable (1) if he is guilty of fraud or deceit; (2) if he leases premises which are dangerous when leased. The result of this doctrine, if carried out, is that, if a tenant has no opportunity to examine the premises, he must nevertheless take them at his own risk. If, for instance, a landlord leases premises in a distant city, which the tenant does not see, and has no opportunity to examine,—under the rule of caveat emptor,—if the tenant enters without an opportunity for examination, and is injured by the dangerous and defective condition of the premises, the landlord is not liable. Such doctrine is not based on any sound reason, and the true rule is that the rule of caveat emptor only applies so far as the rights of the parties rest on contract, or when the tenant has an opportunity to examine the premises, and the defect is so obvious, and the danger is so apparent, that he can see it by using ordinary care and diligence. It is argued with much earnestness and ability that, in order to make the rule operative, it must be held that the landlord is required to exercise a greater degree of diligence and care than the tenant. But this position is not, we think, well taken. The degree of care and diligence required of each is the same; that is, reasonable care and diligence, such as a reasonably prudent person would exercise if surrounded by the same or similar circumstances. From the very nature of the case, the same degree of care and diligence exercised by each would in many, if not all, cases, enable the landlord to know more than the tenant. The former owns the property; has daily access to it, and an opportunity to know its condition; and his attention was or may have been called to defects by previous tenants. The tenant sees the property but once, perhaps, and that in a more or less hurried manner. Not being familiar with the premises, he cannot by such inspection know as much of the property as the landlord does. Again, each may see the same defect, and the danger arising out of such defect may not be apparent at a glance or a single examination, such as the tenant can make; and he may well presume that, if dangerous, the landlord would not let it, nor would previous tenants have occupied it. The landlord, however, may have had his attention called to the defect by prior tenants, and he may have observed them time and again. In such case it would be obligatory upon him to ascertain the cause and extent of the defect, and whether dangerous or not. The opportunities and means of information of the landlord are necessarily greater than those of the tenant, when both exercise the same degree of care and diligence. This idea is forcibly illustrated in the present case, where a defect was clearly apparent, but the cause of it, and the danger arising out of it, were not. The tenant, looking at the opening between the porch and wall, would not discover its cause upon a single examination; and he might well presume that it only amounted to a matter of some discomfort and inconvenience, from falling rains and snows. But the landlord's attention had been called to it more than once by a former tenant, and he had been notified of the danger. Under such circumstances, it was incumbent on him to have examined into the extent and cause of the defect, and the proof is clear that the danger would have appeared to any workman or other person who might investigate the cause of the defect. It is said this rule of reasonable diligence on the part of both landlord and tenant destroys itself; for, if the danger is apparent, either party may see, and the negligence of the landlord being neutralized by that of the tenant, there can be no recovery. Even if this were so, it is no more than the application of a similar doctrine in many other relations of life,—as, for instance, when the negligence of the master is neutralized by the contributing negligence of the servant, so as to prevent the latter from recovering when he would be otherwise entitled to recover. So, also, in case of railroad or other accidents and injuries, a party injured has the right to recover because of the negligence of the railroad or other party, but he may lose this right because his own negligence has contributed to, and is the direct cause of, the injury; and the same rule applies in other relations. It is evident, however, that this rule of counterbalancing negligence can only apply to cases where the tenant has the opportunity to see, examine, and ascertain, not only the defects, but also the dangers, equally with the landlord. The trial judge, in his charge, followed substantially the rules laid down in Hines v. Wilcox and Stenberg v. Wilcox, reported in 96 Tenn., and, upon a re-examination of these cases after the ablest arguments and most severe criticism, the majority of the court does not see that the principles there laid down, when properly understood and applied, are wrong. Judges Beard and McAllister do not concur in the rules there laid down.

In the case now on trial there are other features that are equally conclusive of the plaintiff's right to recover. There is evidence in the record tending to show that the defendant actually knew the dangerous condition of the porch when the lease was made; also, that he had his attention called to such dangerous condition after the lease was made, and promised and undertook to make it safe, and sent a carpenter to make the necessary repairs, and that after they were made the tenants were assured the premises were safe. It is true, there is some conflict on both these points as to what repairs were promised, and what were made; but there is evidence from which the jury would be warranted in holding as they did, and in concluding that the undertaking and effort of the landlord were not merely to shut out the snow and rain, by tacking a little tin over the opening, but to make the porch safe and secure; and the evidence is quite clear that any ordinary carpenter or workman, in attempting to make any repairs, could not but see the dangerous conditions existing. Upon this point, see the cases of Wertheimer v. Saunders, 95 Wis. 573, 37 L. R. A. 146; Martin v. Richards, 155 Mass. 386, and cases there cited.

We are of opinion that there was evidence to warrant the jury in believing that the premises in this case were in dangerous condition when they were let; that while the defect was, to some extent, patent, the danger was not so apparent that the plaintiff, in the exercise of ordinary care and diligence, could have known of it; that there was an obligation upon the landlord to make such examination of the premises as a reasonably prudent man would do, in order to ascertain their condition, and especially under the circumstances of this case; that there is no evidence of any attention or care or diligence on the part of the landlord whatever, his theory being that he was under no obligation to exercise any; that the attention of the landlord and his agent was called to the condition of the porch both before and after the lease, and the defect was of such character as would have led a reasonably prudent man to have seen the danger when he attempted to repair it, and that it was negligence not to make it safe after undertaking to work on it; and that there is liability on the part of the landlord to the tenant, arising out of these facts and conditions, for which he is liable.

And the judgment of the court below is affirmed, with costs.

STATE of Tennessee, ex rel. Grace BETH-ELL, Pfiff in Err.,

v.

W. C. KILVINGTON.

(.....Tenn.....)

1. The power conferred upon county judges by Acts 1891, chap. 195, to cause children to be brought before them and commit them to the industrial school at Nashville if they come within any of the descriptions therein set out, contemplates a proceeding in open court, and a proper investigation upon which to base a committal, and an arbitrary committal by the county judge upon his personal knowledge of the facts without such a proceeding is irregular.
2. The court will not on habeas corpus proceedings instituted by a parent to test the detention of a child in a public institution inquire into the regularity, legality, or sufficiency of the proceedings before the judge or magistrate which resulted in the committal, where the detention is manifestly for the welfare of the child.
3. The provision of Acts 1891, chap. 195, § 6, that no child under eight shall be committed to the industrial school at Nashville, was made to protect the institution, and it cannot be enforced for the purpose of releasing from the institution and restoring to improper hands a child whose welfare would not be subserved by such release, and whose age is uncertain under the proof.

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Davidson County to review an order dismissing a petition for a writ of habeas corpus to procure the release of Lyndall Williams from the Tennessee Industrial School. Affirmed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Merritt & Brien and J. W. Moore for plaintiff in error.

Messrs. E. A. Price, Champion, Head, & Brown, and J. A. Ryan for defendant in error.

Wilkes, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is a habeas corpus proceeding to test the detention in the Tennessee Industrial School at Nashville, Tennessee, of Lyndall Williams, a female about seven years of age at the time she was placed in said institution. The relator in the case is the mother of Lyndall Williams, and claims the right to recover the child, and its custody by virtue of the parental relation to her. It appears that her father is dead. The defendant Tennessee Industrial School was originally founded by the benefaction of E. W. Cole, one of the most public-spirited and charitable men Tennessee has ever produced. After its foundation it was taken.

in charge by the state, and is now being operated as a state institution under a board of directors consisting of the governor and other state officials of the executive department, and a number of gentlemen of the highest character and standing, residing in different portions of the state. The defendant W. C. Kilvington is the superintendent, and has immediate charge of the institution. The state contributes liberally to its support, year after year, and reports of the operations are made to the general assembly at its stated sessions, and that body exercises a supervisory jurisdiction over it. There have been committed to the care of the institution since its opening 1,408 persons, boys and girls, white and black. Of this number 821 have been discharged, and 647 are now in the institution. They are instructed in the trades as well as in the common branches of education. It is not a penal, nor altogether a reformatory, institution, but is rather a place of refuge and school for homeless, penniless children, where they may be received and cared for, taught the different grades of a common-school education, and trained in useful trades and branches of industry. The objects and purposes of the institution are best illustrated by the provisions of the acts of the general assembly, the latest being Acts 1891, chap. 195; Shannon's Code, §§ 4418-4433. The act is entitled and provides as follows, among other things:

"An Act for the Benefit and Protection of Orphan, Helpless, Wayward, and Abandoned Children.

"Sec. 1. Be it enacted by the general assembly of the state of Tennessee, that any judge or chairman of a county court in this state may cause to be brought before the court any child between the age of eight and eighteen years that comes within any of the following descriptions, to wit: (1) That is begging to receive alms, whether openly or under pretense of selling or offering for sale anything; but not when the selling is bona fide and not a pretense or cover for begging or receiving alms. (2) That is found wandering, and not having any home or settled place of abode. (3) That has no proper or sufficient guardianship to care for its physical, moral, and mental welfare, to at least such a degree as will probably save the child from pauperism, lewdness, and crime. (4) That is found destitute, either being an orphan, or having a parent or parents undergoing imprisonment or confined in a lunatic asylum, or where both parents are habitual drunkards, or where the only living parent is an habitual drunkard, and any child of such parent is not properly supported and controlled. (5) That frequents the company of lewd, wanton, or lascivious persons in speech or behavior, or notorious resorts of bad character. (6) That is found wandering in streets, alleys, or public places, with no means of support. (7) That has been abandoned in any way by parent or parents, or guardian, and has no means of support, and with idle habits; and if it shall appear to the satisfaction of the said county court that it would be manifestly for the interest of said child that it be committed to the Tennessee Industrial School, the court will so order and send the child to said school, to be held by it under the charter and by-laws of said school.

"Sec. 2. Be it further enacted, that said industrial school may receive any child placed in its care and keeping by its parent or parents without the authority of any court; and said school may keep and care for said child until it is twenty-one years of age, unless sooner taken away by the request of its parent or parents, and released under the authority and by-laws of said school.

"Sec. 3. Be it further enacted, that the parent or parents may, and guardians other than parents must, invoke the authority of the county court when they desire to commit any child to said school, on the ground that said parent or parents, or guardians, or those having the child in charge are unable to control the child; and this is hereby made a ground for committing a child to said school, provided, it appear to the satisfaction of the court or officer before whom said child is brought for commitment that the commitment would probably be for the child's interest and welfare. But said industrial school shall not receive any child under this or the preceding section until its parent or parents, or guardians or persons having the child in charge, shall satisfactorily agree with the officers of said school to supply sufficient funds for the maintenance of the child therein during its stay, and shall further agree to abide by all the rules, by-laws, and requirements of said industrial school.

"Sec. 4. Be it further enacted, that no child shall be committed to said school or received or retained therein on any ground other than the one single ground that the interest and welfare of the child will be thereby probably promoted.

"Sec. 5. Be it further enacted, that from the time of the lawful reception of any child into the school, and during its stay, the school shall have exclusive care, custody, and control of said child until it shall be discharged therefrom.

"Sec. 6. Be it further enacted, that no child under eight or over sixteen years of age, in case of females, and under eight and over eighteen in case of males, shall be committed to said school.

"Sec. 7. Be it further enacted, that whenever any child shall be committed to said school as aforesaid, the effect of that commitment shall be to commit the child until he or she is twenty-one years of age, unless sooner discharged by the officers of said school pursuant to its by-laws, who shall have authority to sooner discharge any child from the school, whenever, in their judgment, it shall be for the interest of the child to do so.

"Sec. 8. Be it further enacted, that the officers and managers of said school shall receive and take into it all children committed thereto by competent authority as aforesaid, and shall cause all children in such school to be instructed in such branches of useful knowledge as may be suited to their years and capacities, and shall cause the girls to be especially taught domestic vocations, such as sewing, mending, knitting, and housekeeping in all its departments. The boys shall be taught such useful trades as the board may direct, and all children in said school shall be taught according to the course of the common public schools in this state.

"Sec. 9. Be it further enacted, that any commitment under the provision of this act shall be full, sufficient, and competent authority to the officers and agents of said school for the detention and keeping of any child therein."

Hon. Jno. C. Ferris, judge of the county court of Davidson county, caused this child to be taken from the custody of her grandmother, and committed her to the institution, under the following paper:

Office of Judge of the County Court, Davidson Co.

Nashville, Tenn., July 26, 1897.

Mr. W. C. Kilvington, Supt. Tennessee Industrial School.

Dear Sir: Please receive Lyndall Williams within the school, as the law directs. The charges against her are these: . . . Jao. C. Ferris, County Judge.

It is admitted by the defendant that the committal was informal, and summary, and without the issuance of any warrant or any formal investigation. The county judge, who was examined as a witness, states that he based his action principally upon facts known to himself and upon information derived from others. Clearly, the act of the legislature contemplates a proceeding in open court, and a proper investigation upon which to base any committal, and the action of the county judge in this case, though shown by the records to have been prompted by the best of motives, was irregular and not according to law. A child cannot arbitrarily be taken from its parents, or custodians selected by its parents; and, if proper application had been made for the release of the child before she reached the institution, it would have been granted. Here we have a case, however, where a child of tender years is an inmate of a state institution having for its purpose the charitable ends set forth in the act regulating it, and sought to be taken therefrom by its mother. It is held in People, Roidy, v. New York Juvenile Asylum, 12 Abb. Pr. 92, that when a child has been committed to a public institution as prescribed by statute, the court will not, on proceedings by habeas corpus, instituted by the parent to recover the child, inquire into the regularity, legality, or sufficiency of the proceedings before the magistrate which resulted in such committal. Church, Habeas Corpus, § 442. The writ of habeas corpus is intended to procure and preserve the personal liberty of the citizen, and not to enforce a parent's right to property either in the person or services of the child. Lea v. White, 4 Sneed, 73, 67 Am. Dec. 599. The court will not, in such cases, be controlled alone by the wishes of the child, nor by the ties of the parental relation, but will hold the welfare of the child superior to both the wishes of the child and the affections of such parents as cannot show themselves qualified to properly care for, educate, and train them. State, Paine, v. Paine, 4 Humph. 528; Church Habeas Corpus, §§ 441 41 L. R. A.

et seq.; Ward v. Roper, 7 Humph. 111. Due regard must in every instance be paid to the rights of parents and of the child, but this rule must be enforced and construed when the child is brought into court in the interest and for the benefit of the child; and when the detention is manifestly for the welfare of the child it will be allowed and required to remain in the institution. Ballenger v. McLain, 54 Ga. 159; People, Van Heck, v. New York Catholic Protectory, 38 Hun. 127; Com. Barnes, v. St. John's Orphan Asylum, 9 Phila. 579; Farnham v. Pierce, 141 Mass. 203, 55 Am. Rep. 452; Re Ferrier, 103 Ill. 367, 42 Am. Rep. 10; Milwaukee Industrial School v. Milwaukee County Supers. 40 Wis. 828, 23 Am. Rep. 703; Ex parte Crouse, 4 Whart. 9.

In these cases it is said, in substance, such statutes are not penal, and the commitment is not in the nature of punishment. Such an institution is a house of refuge; a school, not a prison. The object is the upbuilding of the inmate by industrial training, by education, and instilling principles of morality and religion, and above all by separating them from the corrupting influences of improper associates. In this case it clearly appears that the mother and grandmother of this girl are both of ill repute, that they are now living in disreputable localities, and the girl, if restored to them, or either of them, will be subjected to and surrounded by evil associates, and corrupting influences. Ordinarily, the parent is entitled to the custody, companionship, and care of the child, and should not be deprived thereof except by due process of law. It is a natural right but not an inalienable one. The parents are trusted with the custody of the child upon the idea that under the instincts of parental devotion it is best for the child. But when it clearly appears that it is not for the welfare of the state or the child that it should be taken from such an institution, the court will not so direct, but will leave the child where its safety, purity, and well-being require; and this without regard to the informalities of its commitment, the court, for the time being, acting as its custodian. The right of the parent is sufficiently guarded by permitting the parent on habeas corpus proceedings to inquire into the propriety or necessity of the detention, and to have the custody restored upon a proper showing that he or she is competent, and a proper person, to have charge of the child. In such case the custody of the child will not be denied them. It is said that under § 6 of the act regulating the school no child under eight years of age shall be committed to it, and it is insisted for this reason that the child must be discharged. The original act of 1885 fixed the limit at six years, and not eight, as fixed by the act of 1891. In both acts we think the limitation was provided to protect the institution, and we cannot enforce it so as to release from the institution, and restore to improper hands, a child whose welfare would not be subserved by such release, and whose age is, to say the least, uncertain under the proof. The court below, after hearing the proof, refused to deliver up the child to the custody of its mother or grandmother, and remanded her to the institution with liberty to the mother to visit her on Wednesday of each week, and under the record as we find it we think this was proper, and we affirm the order and judgment of the court below, dismissing the petition at petitioner's cost.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Frank SCHAEFER

v.

City of FOND DU LAC.

(.....Wis.....)

The street-railway company in the defendant city so constructed and maintained its railway track on one of the streets of such city as to render such street defective and dangerous for public travel. While such condition existed Ellhu Colman, with knowledge of the facts, purchased the railway track and left the same in possession of the railway company under an option to purchase the property, but without any agreement binding the railway company to remedy the defective condition of the street. While such condition of things existed, the plaintiff lawfully traveling on such street at the point of danger, without fault on his part, was injured by reason of such condition. Plaintiff thereafter gave due notice of his injury to the defendant city, and thereafter prosecuted an action against the railway company to judgment, for his damages. The company, pending the suit, notified the defendant herein of the action, in order that it might defend the same. After exhausting all legal remedies against such company, plaintiff sued the defendant city, setting up the proceedings in the first suit and the fact of failure to collect the damages from the railway company after exhausting all legal remedies to that end. In the second suit it was claimed that the defendant city was bound by the judgment in the first suit, as to the defective condition of the street, the happening of the accident, and the amount of damages. Defendant pleaded and insisted, among other things, that Ellhu Colman was primarily liable for the damages, and that the exhaustion of all legal remedies against him was a condition precedent to the right of plaintiff to proceed against the defendant city. Plaintiff recovered judgment, but for a less sum than in the first suit, the court holding that Colman was not primarily liable and that defendant was not bound by the former proceedings. On appeals by both parties.—Held:

(a) That Colman, and the railway company as well, were primarily liable to plaintiff, and that the exhaustion of all legal remedies as to both was a condition precedent to the right of plaintiff to proceed against the city under the charter thereof, which provides that in such cases the city shall not be liable till all legal remedies shall have been exhausted to collect the damages from the person or corporation whose wrong or neglect produced or caused the defective condition of the street.

(b) That the right to recover of the city is a creature of the statute, hence the legislature may grant the right, take it away, or make the exercise of it contingent upon the performance of such conditions as in its wisdom may be deemed best, and without any warrant for holding that the law in that regard is unreasonable. Such legislation being in derogation of the common law, should be construed most favorably to the public corporation, and not the claimant for damages.

(c) If property, when in such defective condition as to be dangerous to persons lawfully in the vicinity thereof, be purchased by a person with knowledge of the facts, who leases it to another, especially if the lease does not contain a clause requiring the lessee to remedy the defects, and a person so lawfully in the vicinity of such danger, but having no connection whatever with such lessee, be injured thereby, such lessor is liable to such injured party; he cannot escape liability from the mere fact of the lease to, or possession by, such other person.

(d) The doctrine that where a person against whom suit is brought to recover damages is entitled to indemnity from another, in case of being compelled to pay such damages, such other is bound by the judgment against such person if he be notified of the pendency of the suit and has an opportunity to defend against the same, does not apply to the facts of this case. The judgment against the indemnitee in such a case is binding on the indemnitor, but if the latter be first sued the judgment in a subsequent suit by the same plaintiff against the indemnitee will not affect the plaintiff as to any question litigated in such first suit.

CROSS-APPEALS from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Fond du Lac County in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to recover damages for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a defective street; the defendant appealing from so much of the judgment as held it liable for any damages, and plaintiff appealing from so much as refused to allow the amount of its claim. Reversed on defendant's appeal.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action to recover compensation for personal injuries alleged to have been caused by a defective street in the city of Fond du Lac. The date of the injury was June 25, 1895. The defective character of the street grew out of the manner in which the street-car track was originally constructed, and was maintained, in the street in question. The Fond du Lac Light, Power, & Railway Company constructed the track, owned it till the 28th day of December, 1895, and operated the railway up to and inclusive of the time of the injury. Suit was first brought against the company, and such proceedings were had therein that all the facts requisite to a recovery were found in the plaintiff's favor. The damages were assessed at $2,063.21. Judgment was entered accordingly, on which execution was duly issued and returned unsatisfied. After the action was brought against the railway company, it notified the city of Fond du Lac of the pendency of the action in order that the city might defend the same. After the return of the execution aforesaid, this suit was commenced. The complaint contained appropriate allegations to make a cause of action, including appropriate allegations to show that plaintiff had exhausted his legal remedy against the railway company, which was claimed to be the person primarily liable for the injury. The amount recovered in the first case was duly set forth in the complaint. The defendant answered, taking issue on the allegations in regard to the sufficiency of the street, the cause of the injury, and the amount of the damages. It also contained allegations to the effect that Elihu Colman was the owner of the road at the time of the accident, and a person primarily liable for the injury, and that no effort had been made to collect of him. On the trial there was evidence tending to prove the allegations of the complaint in respect to the defective condition of the street, the injury, the damages, the action against the street-railway company as the party primarily liable, and the amount recovered on such action. Proof was made also of the other allegations of the complaint, requisite to entitle plaintiff, prima facie, to recover. The evidence showed that plaintiff was endeavoring to drive his team across the track, he standing on a high load of lumber; that he had a stake in a fixed position, where he could take hold of it to steady himself; that when his wagon struck the defects in the street he was suddenly jerked and compelled to take hold of the stake, which broke, and he was precipitated to the ground, causing the injuries complained of. The evidence tended to show that the defective condition of the street existed on the 28th day of December, 1894, and continuously thereafter up to the time of the accident; that on the day named the street-railway track, as it lay in the street, and the road-bed, and some other property of the company, was duly conveyed by sheriff's deed to Elihu Colman, but that there was a verbal understanding between him and the street-railway company that it was to have the property back upon complying with certain conditions of purchase; that it continued to operate the road after the sale to Colman, till after the happening of the injury to plaintiff, under an option to purchase the property; that the option was never accepted, and that Colman finally took up the track. On the evidence the defendant moved the court for a verdict in its favor, which was denied, and the ruling duly excepted to. A special verdict was thereupon ordered on defendant's motion. The jury found that June 25, 1895, at the time the plaintiff was injured, Main street, where the injury occurred, was in an unsafe condition for travel; that plaintiff was thrown from his wagon and injured in consequence of such defective condition of the street; that the city had notice of such defective condition of the street for a sufficient length of time, by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence, to have discovered and remedied the defects; that the plaintiff was free from contributory negligence; that he was damaged to the extent of $800; that notice of the injury was given to the proper officers of the defendant as required by law. The jury also found, by order of the court, that the defective condition of the street was not caused by, nor did it arise from, any wrong, default, or negligence of Elihu Colman. Defendant's counsel moved the court to set the verdict aside and grant a new trial, which was denied. Plaintiff moved the court for judgment for the amount due upon the judgment in the first action, which was denied. Judgment was thereupon perfected for $800 and costs. Both parties appealed.

Messrs. Edward W. Phelps and Maurice McKenna, for plaintiff:

Respondent was guilty of such contributory negligence as to defeat his action.

Parish v. Eden, 62 Wis. 272.

Where the negligence is clearly defined and palpable, such that no verdict of a jury could make it otherwise, it should be decided by the judge as a question of law.

2 Thomp. Neg. § 1674; Rudolph v. Fuchs, 44 How. Pr. 155; Houff v. Fulton, 29 Wis. 296, 9 Am. Rep. 568; Fernandes v. Sacramento City R. Co. 52 Cal. 45.

Cases where the question of negligence could be withdrawn from the jury are comparatively rare.

Detroit & M. R. Co. v. Van Steinburg, 17 Mich. 99; Rudolph v. Fuchs, 44 How. Pr. 155; Sioux City & P. R. Co. v. Stout, 17 Wall. 657, 21 L. ed. 745.

But the courts have, therefore, developed a stronger tendency, in recent times, toward withdrawing such questions from juries.

The conduct of plaintiff seems to be analogous to the case where a person had knowledge of a defect in a sidewalk, and there was another walk which might have been taken with safety. In such cases it has been held there could be recovery.

Parkhill v. Brighton, 61 Iowa, 108.

Plaintiff's right to recover, in any event, is purely a statutory one. At common law, there is no liability for a defective highway on the part of a municipality; such liability exists only by statute.

Stilling v. Thorp, 54 Wis. 528, 41 Am. Rep. 60.

A legislative act making a private owner who is a wrongdoer, primarily liable, is valid.

The general principles of law, requiring one party to defend an action brought by another, or be concluded by the judgment, can, in no rational manner, be applied to the defendant city in the case at bar, so as to make it concluded, as to the amount of damages recovered in plaintiff's action against said street-railway company.

The city is no longer regarded as a mere guarantor of any damages that may be recovered against the principal wrongdoer.

Mr. Edward S. Bragg, for defendant:

Had the action been decided upon the issues made in the pleadings in favor of the defendant railway company, and a judgment entered thereon in favor of such defendant, it could have been used and pleaded as a bar to this action by the plaintiff against the city as secondarily liable.

Hill v. Bain, 15 R. I. 75.

By reason of its enforced liability to protect and care for its streets, particularly against a franchise granted by it to a third party, to use its streets in the construction of a railway, the city ultimately made a guarantor for the payment of all damages which are sustained by reason of any defect in the streets occasioned by the party to whom it has surrendered partial control of the streets.

McFarlane v. Milwaukee, 51 Wis. 691.

Its liability, under such quasi guaranty, is only that it shall have had notice of the accident, as required by law, and notice, either in fact or presumptive, of the existence of the defect, the result of the action of its creature, to whom the franchise was extended.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

At the outset, the question of the liability of Elihu Colman is of paramount importance. It stands without question on the record that he was the owner of the street-car track at the time of the injury complained of, and had been such for several months prior thereto; that the defective condition of the street existed when he purchased the property; that he then knew the facts; that the railway company occupied and used the property the same after such purchase as before, but pursuant to an option to buy it back, the particulars of which option were not testified to. The learned circuit judge decided, as a matter of law, on such facts, that Colman was not liable for the injury to plaintiff, because the defects in the street were not caused by, nor did they arise from or were they produced by, him. That reasoning hardly meets the facts of this case fully. It leaves out the element that Colman continued the defective condition of the street by allowing the railway company to hold under him without any covenant on its part to remedy such condition. With the added element, the decision has some support by some things said in Fellows v. Gilhuber, 82 Wis. 689, 17 L. R. A. 577, where the awning in front of an hotel was thrown down, partly through defects existing in one of the supporting posts, whereby a guest at the hotel, standing on the walk, was injured, the hotel being in possession of a lessee, and the defect existing with knowledge of the landlord when the lease was made. It was held that the lessor was not liable, but the decision was put on the ground that there was an agreement in the lease which obligated the lessee to repair. Upon that theory the decision is in accord with much authority in this country and England, but it must be said there is much authority of a very respectable character against it. Whatever is said in the opinion, however, that may be read to support the proposition that the rule that a landlord who leases dangerous premises, knowing, or with means of knowledge, of such dangers, without any covenant to repair on the part of the lessee, is not liable to the tenant or subtenant holding under the first lessee, or any person having business connection with the property, under the tenant, injured by such dangers, applies to cases arising between the landlord and a mere stranger lawfully in the vicinity thereof, and injured thereby, must be considered as obiter, and the decision read as applying only to the facts of the particular case.

The law is firmly established by the great weight of authority, that as between the owner of leased property and a mere stranger, the owner is liable for an injury to the latter, caused by a dangerous defect in the property existing at the time of the lease, unless protected by a covenant binding the lessee to remedy such defects; and there is much authority that he is liable anyway, that is, that he cannot shift the liability for known existing dangers onto the lessee by a covenant to repair. But there is no necessity for discussing the conflict in that regard, in this case, for there is nothing in the record to indicate that the railway company was under any obligation to Colman to repair the defects in the street caused by the railway track. So far as appears from the evidence, the company continued in possession of the property, without any agreement other than a mere option to purchase.

Authorities which apply to the facts unfavorably to plaintiff are very numerous, and without substantial conflict. We will cite but a few of them. In Conhocton Stone Road v. Buffalo, N. Y. & E. R. Co. 51 N. Y. 578, 10 Am. Rep. 646, defendant demised premises, in a dangerous condition, and was held not liable for want of notice of the defects at the time of the demise, or thereafter, prior to the injury. In Ahern v. Steele, 115 N. Y. 208, 5 L. R. A. 449, defendants became the owners of a defective pier, subject to an outstanding lease which contained no covenant to repair. The defects antedated the lease. They were created and existed before the property came to the defendants. The court held that defendants were not liable for the injury caused by such defects, though solely on the ground of want of notice. To the same effect are Irvine v. Wood, 51 N. Y. 224, 10 Am. Rep. 603, and Swords v. Edgar, 59 N. Y. 28, 17 Am. Rep. 295. In Albert v. State, Ryan, 66 Md. 325, 59 Am. Rep. 159, the following instruction given in the trial court was approved, the action being to recover damages sustained by a minor through the death of his parents, caused by a defective wharf occupied by the defendant's tenant: "If . . . [the jury] find that the defendant was the owner of the wharf, and that he rented it out to a tenant, and at the time of the renting the wharf was unsafe, and defendant knew, or by the exercise of reasonable diligence could have known, of its unsafe condition, . . . the plaintiff was entitled to recover." To the same effect are Knauss v. Brua, 107 Pa. 85; Cunningham v. Cambridge Sav. Bank, 138 Mass. 480; Dalay v. Savage, 145 Mass. 38; Nugent v. Boston, O. & M. R. Co. 80 Me. 62.

The rule appears to be very firmly established as above indicated, that under circumstances such as mentioned in the foregoing authorities, there being no covenant to repair or remedy defects, on the part of the tenant, the liability of the owner for injuries thereby received turns on knowledge, or reasonable means of knowledge, of the existence of the defects on the part of such owner. Probably no case can be found that more nearly touches this at every point than Dalay v. Savage, 145 Mass. 38. There the defendant purchased premises abutting on a public way, having a defective coal hole in the sidewalk appurtenant to the premises, which caused the injury. Defendant had a right to the possession, but instead of asserting it, left the person in possession who was there at the time of the purchase, as a tenant at will, without any agreement to repair the coal hole. It was held that the defendant was liable.

Further citations appear to be unnecessary. The rule on which they proceed is quite elementary, and may be stated thus: If a person purchases premises which are in a defective condition, with knowledge, or reasonable means of knowledge, of the defects, and then leases the same to another, or allows such other to hold possession of such premises under such conditions as to indicate permission to continue the defects, and a third person having no connection with such other, without fault on his part, is injured by reason of such defects while rightfully in the vicinity of the danger, such purchaser is liable to respond in damages to such third person for such injury.

Applying the foregoing to this case, it must be held that Colman, by reason of his ownership of the property and knowledge of its dangerous condition when he purchased it, and up to the time of the injury complained of, was liable to the plaintiff. His allowing the railway company to remain in possession, especially without any agreement on its part to repair the street, did not operate to relieve him from responsibility. As said in Dalay v. Savage, 145 Mass. 38, that the railway company was also liable, is no defense for Colman, who held the title and was the actual owner of the property.

There is nothing in the foregoing inconsistent with what was decided in Fellows v. Gilhuber, 82 Wis. 689, 17 L. R. A. 577, or Dowling v. Nuebling, 97 Wis. 850. In the latter case 41 L. R. A.

the contest was between the landlord and his tenant.

What has preceded leads to a consideration of whether Colman was a party "primarily liable" within the meaning of the charter of the defendant city, which provides that, "in case of injury or damage by reason of insufficient, defective, or dangerous conditions of streets, not included in sidewalks, produced or caused by the wrong, neglect of duty, default, or negligence of any person or corporation, such person or corporation shall be primarily liable for damages for such injury in a suit for the recovery thereof by the person sustaining such damages, and the city shall not be liable therefor until all legal remedies shall have been exhausted to collect such damages from such person or corporation." The words "primarily liable" have a very definite and certain meaning. The section in which they are used does not create the liability, nor is there any statute liability on the subject. Toutloff v. Green Bay, 91 Wis. 490; Cooper v. Waterloo, 88 Wis. 433. They refer to the common-law liability that exists against the wrongdoer and renders him liable to the injured person, and over to the city in case of a recovery against it on the statutory liability, hence the words obviously include all persons liable at common law for the wrong. They would include persons made liable by statute as well, if any such existed. It is argued that such construction of the statute throws much embarrassment in the way of recovering from municipal corporations in such cases as this, because it requires great caution in order to bring into the first controversy all persons liable for the injury, other than the city, who are so circumstanced as to be liable to indemnify it. That is hardly a sufficient reason for adopting a different construction, even if the language were of doubtful meaning. There is no liability on the part of the municipal corporation at all, independent of the statute. The law creating the right being in derogation of the common law, is to be strictly construed in favor of the public corporation, not in favor of the claimant for damages. The section under consideration, while it regulates the remedy, bears on the right as well, hence comes within the rule stated. Taken in connection with the statute creating the municipal liability, it makes that contingent on a previous exhaustion of all legal remedies against the persons or corporations whose wrong, neglect of duty, default, or negligence, produced or caused the defective condition of the street. It is wholly in the power of the legislature to give the right or take it away, or make it contingent on the performance of such conditions precedent, as in the wisdom of legislative power seems best, and without any ground for contending that the legislation in that regard is unreasonable.

It follows from the preceding, on the undisputed evidence in the case, that plaintiff ought not to have recovered, because of failure to prove performance of the condition precedent, requiring plaintiff to exhaust all legal remedies against the persons primarily liable, before proceeding against the city. That condition was properly pleaded and insisted upon at the trial.

It is contended that the verdict was contrary to the evidence on the subject of contributory negligence. Any discussion of that appears to be unnecessary. Suffice it to say, however, that a consideration of the evidence preserved in the record, leads to the conclusion that the question was properly submitted to the jury.

It is further contended on plaintiff's appeal, that the court erred in not limiting the defendant, in making its defense, on the theory that the recovery against the railway company was conclusive on the city as to the injury, the cause of it, the amount of damages, and notice to the city. That was pressed on the attention of this court with much earnestness and learning by the eminent counsel who argued the plaintiff's side of the case, and many authorities were cited in support of the position, all of which have been carefully considered, and none of which, in our judgment, fit the facts before us. The doctrine that where a person is responsible over to another who is sued, either by operation of law or express contract, and such person is duly notified of the pendency of the suit and requested to take upon himself the defense of it, the judgment is conclusive against him whether he appears or not, is quite familiar. That is the doctrine which the learned counsel invoked to sustain his contention that the judgment against the railway company is binding on the defendant city. In Boston v. Worthington, 10 Gray, 496, recovery was first had of the plaintiff by the injured party; then such party sued the defendants for indemnity, they having created the danger which caused the injury. They were given notice and opportunity to defend in the first case, but declined to do so. The court held that they were bound by the judgment in such first case. In Littleton v. Richardson, 34 N. H. 179. 66 Am. Dec. 759, plaintiff town was sued by a person who was injured by obstructions placed in the highway by another. Such other had an opportunity to defend. Recovery was had of the city, whereupon it sued such other for indemnity for the loss. There was the same situation in Port Jervis v. First Nat. Bank, 96 N. Y. 550; Lowell v. Boston & L. R. Corp. 23 Pick. 24, 84 Am. Dec. 33; Robbins v. Chicago City, 4 Wall. 657, 18 L. ed. 427, and several other cases cited by counsel, and many more that might be added, in all of which it was held that the judgment in the first case was conclusive against the defendant in the second. It is clear that to make the doctrine under discussion apply, the person first sued must have a right of action over against another for indemnity in case of loss. The conclusive character of the first judgment is only where the person first sued himself becomes a plaintiff against the indemnitor, to recover over for the loss sustained by being compelled to pay in the first case. Here we are asked to apply it, not in favor of the indemnitee who has paid the loss, against the indemnitor, but against the indemnitee in favor of a person who had a right of action against both the indemnitor and the indemnitee. No precedent for that, we may safely venture to say, can be found in the books. Certainly, none was cited by counsel.

The result of the foregoing is that the trial court rightly held that the defendant was not concluded on any question in respect to its liability, by the judgment in the action against the railway company, and erred in deciding that Colman was not a party primarily liable within the meaning of the city charter. Therefore both appeals must be decided in favor of the defendant, and the judgment reversed accordingly and the cause remanded for a new trial.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

OHIO SUPREME COURT.

John W. MASON, Plff. in Err.,

v.

STATE of Ohio, ex rel., C. F. McCOY.

(58 Ohio St. 30.)

*1. The provisions of the act of April 8, 1896, entitled "An Act to Prevent Corrupt Practices at Elections" (22 Ohio Laws, 123), which direct the commencement of an action by the prosecuting attorney, at the instance of the attorney general, for the purpose of inquiring into the title to an office of a successful candidate who is charged with acts made unlawful by any law of this state, and which authorize the court, upon finding any of such charges true, to render judgment declaring the election void, the office vacant, and excluding the incumbent therefrom, are not in conflict with the Constitution, and are valid.

2. In such action neither party has a right to trial by jury.

(March 1, 1898.)

ERROR to the Circuit Court for Adams County to review a judgment ousting defendant from the office of probate judge for alleged violation of the corrupt practices act. Affirmed.

Statement by Spear, Ch. J.:

The action below was in quo warranto, brought in the circuit court by C. F. McCoy, prosecuting attorney of Adams county, at the nection herewith, see the later decision of State, Crow, v. Bland (Mo.) post, 297.

NOTE.—The above case seems to be the first decision from a court of last resort in this country on what are called corrupt practices acts. In con- 41 L. R. A.

instance of the attorney general of the state, against the plaintiff in error, John W. Mason, for the purpose of inquiring into his title to the office of probate judge of that county, upon divers charges respecting his conduct in procuring an election to said office. A number of the charges were stricken out on motion of defendant. A demurrer to the petition was heard, and overruled. An answer was filed. The cause being ready for trial, a jury was demanded by defendant, which was refused. The cause then proceeded to trial to the court. The court thereupon found as follows: "(1) The court finds that the defendant, John W. Mason, was elected to the office of probate judge for Adams county, Ohio, at the general election held in the said county on the 3d day of November, 1896, and duly commissioned, and is now in possession of said office, exercising the duties and functions pertaining thereto, and is receiving the fees and emoluments connected therewith and belonging thereto. (2) That the relator was duly and legally instructed and required by the attorney general of the state of Ohio in accordance with the provisions of § 8 of an act entitled 'An Act to Prevent Corrupt Practices at Elections,' passed April 8, 1896 (92 Ohio Laws, 123), to institute said action, and that within ten days after the receipt of said instructions the relator brought said action in accordance with the provisions of said act. (3) That the eleventh, thirteenth, and fifteenth charges preferred against said Mason in said petition are true, and that the other charges against said Mason preferred in said petition are not true. (4) That the defendant, John W. Mason, on the 9th day of February, 1897, did intrude into and usurp, and does still usurp, the said office of probate judge of said county of Adams. And as conclusions of law from said findings of facts the court does hold that the election of the defendant to said office of probate judge of said county is void, and that he should be ousted and excluded therefrom."

The charges found to be true are as follows: "(11) That while said Mason was a candidate, as aforesaid, for said office, he, the said Mason, promised one H. W. Scott, he being then an elector in said county of Adams, that if he, the said Scott, would vote for said Mason for probate judge at said election, and use his influence with one Wm Jones to induce said Jones to vote for said Mason, he, the said Mason, would appoint said Scott one of the examiners of the treasury of said Adams county, and that such appointment would be worth $5 per day for several days to said Scott. (12) That while said Mason was a candidate, as aforesaid, for said office, he, the said Mason, promised one Robert L. Wilson, through the medium and agency of one Tabitha Lawler, a sister of said Wilson, that if he, the said Wilson, would vote for said Mason for probate judge at said election, he, the said Mason, would appoint said Wilson one of the examiners of the county treasury of said county of Adams. (13) That while said Mason was a candidate, as aforesaid, for said office, he, the said Mason, promised one A. C. Easter, a qualified elector in said county, that if he, the said Easter, would vote for said Mason for probate judge at said election, he the said Mason, would secure for said

Easter a seat in the jury of said court, which would be worth $25 to $30 to said Easter. (15) That while said Mason was a candidate, as aforesaid, for said office, he the said Mason, promised one John Troutman, a legal elector in said county, that if he, the said Troutman, would use his influence, and cause others to vote for said Mason for probate judge of said county at said election, he, the said Mason, would cause said Troutman to be placed on the juries in said probate court, which would be worth from $15 to $20 to said Troutman for each winter for three years. And said Mason further promised said Troutman that if he, said Troutman, would vote and work for said Mason for said office at said election, he, the said Mason, would allow said Troutman to rent said Mason's farm."

The court thereupon proceeded to render judgment as follows: "It is thereupon ordered, adjudged, and decreed by the court that the election of the defendant on the 3d day of November, 1896, to said office of probate judge for Adams county, Ohio, be, and the same is hereby, declared null and void, and that the defendant, John W. Mason, be, and he is hereby, ousted and entirely excluded from exercising and holding said office, and said office of probate judge of said county, is hereby declared vacant; and that the relator recover from the defendant his costs herein expended, taxed at $—, save and except the costs of witnesses subpoenaed for the exclusive purpose of proving the specifications which were stricken out by the court on motion of defendant, and which said costs should be, and hereby are, adjudged against the relator taxed at $—." To all of which the defendant excepted, and, his motion for a new trial being overruled, he brings the case here, asking a reversal.

Messrs. F. D. Bayless, A. Z. Blair, W. C. Coryell, and Bowman & Bowman, for plaintiff in error:

All legislative power in this state is vested in the general assembly by the Constitution, and any prohibition upon that power must either be found in express terms or be clearly inferable by necessary implication from the language of the instrument when fairly construed according to its manifest spirit and meaning.

Lehman v. McBride, 15 Ohio St. 573.

The power to exclude from office by legislative enactment is clearly defined by the Constitution, and from the carefully guarded grant of such power, such grant expresses the limit of that power.

The Constitution provides that the general assembly shall have power to exclude from the privilege of voting or of being eligible to office, any person convicted of bribery, perjury, or other infamous crime.

Art. 5, § 4. See also art. 2, § 5.

No clearer case for the application of the maxim Expressio unius est exclusio alterius can be conceived of.

When the Constitution defines the circumstances under which a right may be exercised or a penalty imposed, the specification is an implied prohibition against legislative interference to add to the condition, or to extend the penalty to other cases.

Cooley, Const. Lim. 4th ed. p. 78.

The act is in violation of §§ 1 and 2 of the Bill of Rights, and within the scope of the principle established in Palmer v. Tingle, 55 Ohio St. 428.

The framers of our Constitution conferred the elective franchise upon certain male citizens.

Art. 5, § 1.

By this provision, the Constitution guarantees to every such citizen, not only the right to cast his ballot at any and all elections, but guarantees that when his ballot is so cast it shall be counted, and that the result declared by such ballot shall stand, unless set aside in conformity to other provisions of the Constitution. If the legislature has no right, directly or indirectly, to deny or abridge the constitutional right of a citizen to vote or unnecessarily to impede its exercise (Monroe v. Collins, 17 Ohio St. 665, and State v. Constantine, 42 Ohio St. 487, 51 Am. Rep. 838), how can it be claimed, then, that the legislature has the right to, either directly or indirectly, deny or abridge the force and effect of his ballot when cast, or render the effect of the ballot void?

The demand of the defendant, Mason, for a trial by jury ought to have been granted.

The right of trial by jury shall be inviolate. Ohio Const. art. 1, § 5.

This provision of the Constitution guarantees the right of a trial, on issues purely of fact, arising in proceedings by information in the nature of quo warranto, as fully as it does in any other proceeding.

Mears. Keifer & Keifer, for defendant in error:

The act is not inimical to any provision of the Constitution, and it certainly is not opposed to good morals or public policy.

In New York, where the Constitution (art. 2, § 1) guarantees the right to vote for all elective officers, and where the Constitution authorizes no limitation on this right, save by the exclusion of persons convicted of bribery, larceny, or any infamous crime (art. 2, § 2), it is held that the votes of electors for a person who already holds an office are void, and that said candidate "is made ineligible to an election or appointment thereto."

Spear, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The action in the circuit court was brought under favor of the act of April 8, 1896, entitled "An Act to Prevent Corrupt Practices at Elections" (92 Ohio Laws, 123). Section 7 of that act gives the right to any elector entitled to vote at any election (save for members of Congress or the general assembly) to present in writing to the attorney general an application setting forth, among other charges, the doing by a person elected to office at such election of any act or acts declared unlawful by any law of this state for the purpose of promoting his election, and thereupon it becomes the duty of the attorney general to direct the prosecuting attorney of the proper county to bring an action to have the office declared vacant, such action to "be deemed to be and conducted according to the rules prescribed by law for an action against the usurper of an office;" and, if any of the charges are sustained, judgment shall be rendered declaring void the election, declaring such office vacant, and ousting the defendant. The petition charged, among other things, a violation by the defendant of that part of § 83 of the election law of April 18, 1892 (89 Ohio Laws, 451), which provides that, "whoever, directly or indirectly by himself or through any other person, either gives, offers, or procures or promises to procure, or endeavors to procure, any office, place, or employment to, or for any elector; or to or for any other person, in order to induce any elector to register or refrain from registering, for any election, or to vote or refrain from voting at any election, or to vote or refrain from voting at such election for any particular person or persons, or question or proposition," shall be punished by fine, or imprisonment in the penitentiary, or both. The demurrer to the petition raises the question of the constitutionality of that part of § 7 of the act of April 8, 1896, heretofore recited, and the refusal of a jury by the trial court raises the question whether or not, in such an action, the defendant is entitled to trial by jury. Other provisions of the statute are attacked as unconstitutional. But those questions are not raised by this record, and it is not necessary for us to inquire beyond the questions actually involved.

1. The constitutionality of the act. It is assailed as repugnant to the Constitution, in that it undertakes to declare a citizen ineligible to office for criminal acts of his without a conviction of such crime. Section 4 of article 5 is cited. That section provides that "the general assembly shall have power to exclude from the privilege of voting, or of being eligible to office, any person convicted of bribery, perjury, or other infamous crime." The contention is that this section is a grant of power to the general assembly; that a grant of power to deprive a citizen of part of his political rights, on conviction of certain crimes, necessarily denies the power to do so without conviction, or for different crimes; and that the case comes within the rule, as given in Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 78, "that when the Constitution defines the circumstances under which a right may be exercised or a penalty imposed, the specification is an implied prohibition against legislative interference to add to the condition, or to extend the penalty to other cases." The rule seems to have met with general acceptance. Its application in the present case would appear to depend upon whether the section quoted is a grant of power or a limitation upon power otherwise granted. To determine this, we should look at other provisions of the Constitution, to ascertain where, by its terms, power to punish crimes, to direct the conduct of elections, to prescribe qualifications for voting and for taking office, is lodged. Clearly, in the nature of things, such power cannot belong either to the executive or judicial departments. It belongs naturally to the legislative. It is a part of the legislative power, and we find that by § 5 of article 2 this power is vested in the general assembly in as ample terms as could be chosen to express it. "In creating a legislative department, and conferring upon it the legislative power, the people must be understood to have conferred the full and complete power as it rests in, and may be exercised by, the sovereign power of any country, subject only to such restrictions as they may have seen fit to impose. . . . The legislative department is not made a special agency for the exercise of specifically defined legislative powers, but is intrusted with the general authority to make laws at discretion." Cooley, Const. Lim. p. 104. And says Denio, J., in People, Wood, v. Draper, 15 N. Y. 532: "The people, in framing the Constitution, committed to the legislature the whole lawmaking power of the state, which they did not expressly withhold. Plenary power in the legislature for all purposes of civil government is the rule. A prohibition to exercise a particular power is an exception." And by Scott, J., in Lehman v. McBride, 15 Ohio St. 591, 592: "This grant of power is general in its terms, not special: it embraces all such legislative power as the people of the state could, under the Federal Constitution, confer,—the whole legislative power of the state." The limitations upon the exercise of the power thus broadly conferred, are special, and are to be found in other parts of the same instrument. . . . Therefore, when the power of the general assembly to enact such a law [the soldiers' voting act] is drawn in question, the proper inquiry is whether such an exercise of legislative power is clearly prohibited by the Constitution. The grant of power being general, the question is as to the existence of a limitation, arising from special prohibition. . . . Such prohibition must either be found in express terms, or be clearly inferable, by necessary implication, from the language of the instrument, when fairly construed according to its manifest spirit and meaning,"—citing Baker v. Cincinnati, 11 Ohio St. 542, where it is said by Gholson, J.: "It will be observed that the provision is not that the legislative power, as conferred in the Constitution, shall be vested in the general assembly, but that the legislative power of this state shall be vested. That includes all legislative power which the object and purposes of the state government may require, and we must look to other provisions of the Constitution to see how far, and to what extent, legislative discretion is qualified or restricted."—citing also, State, Evans, v. Dudley, 1 Ohio St. 437, and Cass v. Dillon, 2 Ohio St. 607. It follows from this that, without question, ample power to legislate upon all the subjects hereinbefore enumerated is conferred upon the general assembly.

The right to vote and to hold office is not of necessity connected with citizenship. Neither is it a natural right, such as the right to personal security, personal liberty, or the right to acquire and enjoy property. It is within the power of the people to give or refuse, restrict and regulate, the franchise, and, when conferred, is not a natural right, but may be taken away by the power that gave it. McCrary, Elections, §§ 3, 4. That is, the right depends upon the law of the land, and, except where restrained by the Constitution, the power of the general assembly over it is unlimited. And belonging to this general subject is the subject of elections. No subject comes more certainly within legislative power than does this. In the very nature of things it must be so. But the general duty is especially devolved on the general assembly by the Constitution. The time for the election of legislative, executive, and judicial officers having been designated, and provision having been made that all elections shall be by ballot, by § 1 of article 10 the duty is enjoined upon that body to provide by law for the election of county and township officers, and by § 27 of article 2 it is provided that "the election . . . of all officers . . . not otherwise provided for by this Constitution . . . shall be made in such manner as may be directed by law." It thus appears that the whole subject of elections, save so far as it is in distinct terms, or by clear implication, controlled by the Constitution, is devolved upon the general assembly, and that the power of that body over it is untrammelled, and that the details, as they relate to the manner or mode of holding elections, are expressly referred to legislative discretion. From a consideration of all the provisions of the Constitution referred to, we are led to the conclusion that, while the question may not be free from doubt, the better view is that § 4 of article 5 is not in itself a grant of power, but a limitation upon power otherwise generally granted; and that this conclusion is in no way affected by § 5 of article 2. That is, had these sections not been adopted, the general assembly, by force of the general grant of legislative power, could have provided a permanent disqualification from voting and from holding office for causes or offenses other than those enumerated in the sections above cited. This conclusion leads to the further conclusion that the rule given by Cooley, cited by counsel and herein-before quoted, does not control the case, but that other rules of construction, equally reasonable and equally well recognized, which are given by the same author, are more in point. One is that, "when a Constitution gives a general power, or enjoins a duty, it also gives by implication every particular power necessary for the exercise of the one or the performance of the other." And, akin to this, "where power is granted in general terms, the power is to be construed as coextensive with the terms, unless some clear restriction upon it is deducible (expressly or by implication) from the context." It would obviously follow that where, by one section, a general, unlimited power is given, and that is abridged by another section of the same instrument, the limitation is not to be held more comprehensive than its terms clearly import. And, to justify the claim that the limitation of the Constitution inhibits the attempted exercise of the power in the particular case by the general assembly, it should be shown that the objects contemplated by the constitutional provision and the statutes are substantially identical. Such, we think, is not the case here. The object of § 4 is to authorize the general assembly to award a punishment upon conviction of infamous crime, which will permanently exclude the criminal from voting and from holding office, and the effect of the statute enacted by virtue of that section is to accomplish that object. The corrupt practices act does not undertake to authorize this. It does not provide any disability as to voting, nor does it render the person offending permanently ineligible to office. Comparing the two provisions by their operation and effect, the operation and effect of the constitutional provision, carried into legislation, are to punish for infamous crime committed anywhere, at any time, with reference to any subject matter, and to permanently disqualify from voting at any election and from holding any office; while the operation and effect of the provision of the statute are simply and only to disqualify from a particular office in the interest of pure elections where the person claiming the office has violated the terms of the statute under which and by virtue of which he claims to have been elected. The statute operates upon the election and upon the office. It holds the one void and the other vacant. As a result it excludes the person from any benefit under the election which his unlawful acts have rendered of no effect, but it does not award punishment. The vice which enters into the election, and renders it void, is the misconduct in reference to that particular election of the person who claims a benefit under it. He has violated the implied interdiction of the statute by attempting to promote his election by impure and immoral acts, having a tendency to corrupt the voters, and prevent a fair and legal election. Upon every principle of justice and fairness he should be prevented from reaping an advantage from his own wrong.

A question much discussed is as to whether the statute should be treated as imposing a test of ineligibility, or as providing a method of removal. The matter may be not free from doubt. Possibly the provision involves both characteristics. But the better conclusion, we think, is that the intent of the legislature was, not to provide a method by which a person lawfully elected to an office may be removed therefrom, but rather a method by which the title of one to an office which he has obtained possession of in violation of the terms of the statute upon which his claimed right vests may be inquired into. It is, therefore, a challenge of the title to the office, resting upon charges of misconduct in procuring it, rather than a process to remove, resting upon charges of misconduct in office. Our conclusion with respect to the effect of § 4 of article 5 is that, if the framers of the Constitution had intended to deny to the general assembly the power to render void an election because of illegal acts by the successful candidate, done for the purpose of promoting his election, they would have declared that purpose in unequivocal terms, and would not have left such result to depend upon doubtful implication. We have already found that there is no clear expression of such an intent. It follows that the provisions of the corrupt practices act involved in the case before us do not contravene § 4 of article 5 of the Constitution. Nor are the provisions of the statute in conflict with either article 5 or with § 4 of article 15 of the Constitution. The former article provides who may be electors, and that electors shall be entitled to vote at all elections. Section 4 of article 15 is: "No person shall be elected or appointed to any office in this state unless he possess the qualifications of an elector." But it does not follow from this that every person who has the qualifications of an elector shall be eligible to any office in the state. The well-settled rule is that, while the legislature is without power to deny or abridge a constitutional right of a citizen to vote or to hold office, nevertheless laws to regulate the exercise of the elective franchise, if reasonable, uniform, and impartial, and calculated to facilitate the exercise of the right, are clearly within the legislative competency; and decisions to the effect that qualifications upon the right to take office, other than the one imposed by the section quoted, are constitutional, are numerous. State, Irwin, v. Crooks, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 227; State, Atty. Gen., v. Covington, 29 Ohio St. 102. At page 118 it is remarked by McIlvaine, J.: "If the framers of the Constitution had intended to take away from the legislature the power to name disqualifications for office, other than the one named in the Constitution, it would not have been left to the very doubtful implication which is claimed from the provision under consideration. The power under the general grant being ample and certain, a statute should not be declared void because in conflict with an alleged implication, unless such implication be clear and indubitable." It may be added that there are implied disqualifications. A person may not hold incompatible offices,—as an officer who presents his personal account for audit and officer who passes upon it, or sheriff and justice of the peace, or governor and member of the general assembly, or, as held in State, Louthan, v. Taylor, 12 Ohio St. 130, the office of director of county infirmary and superintendent of the infirmary. The list might be indefinitely extended. No duty enjoined upon the general assembly is higher, or of greater general interest to the commonwealth and the individual citizen, than that of securing, within constitutional limits, the full, untrammelled right of the elector to vote, to have that vote counted, and not neutralized by an illegal vote, and securing, in addition, a fair expression at the ballot box of the public voice freed from corrupting influences. And where this duty has been attempted by legislation calculated to secure these rational and desirable ends, courts will interfere with its operation only upon the clearest and most unquestioned conviction of its invalidity. A mere doubt is not sufficient. We are of opinion that the provisions of the act involved in this case are not in contravention of any section of the Constitution, at least not clearly so, and are valid.

2. The right to a jury. Our Constitution declares that the right of trial by jury shall be inviolate. This means the right as it existed in this state at the adoption of the Constitution of 1892. Not that every question of fact was to be tried by a jury; only questions of fact in certain classes of cases. The distinctions indicated by our statutes, and by practice from the organization of the state, show this. Code, §§ 263, 264; 51 Ohio Laws, 100; Rev. Stat. §§ 5180, 5181. The right applied only to common-law courts, and in actions involving life, liberty, or the right to private property. Willyard v. Hamilton, 7 Ohio, pt. 2, p. 111, 80 Am. Dec. 195. And we regard it as safe to say that there never has been a statute in Ohio authorizing a jury, nor will there be found a reported case in this state where a jury was called, or held to be proper, in a suit to determine title to an office; certainly none has been cited. We suppose the reason to be plain. A public office is a trust held for the benefit of the public. The incumbent, if he performs the duties, may be entitled to the emoluments, but he cannot have, under our governmental system, any property in the office itself. State, Atty. Gen., v. Hawkins, 44 Ohio St. 98, and see especially remarks of Minshall, J., on pages 110 and 113, 44 Ohio St., and the cases there cited. There being no property right involved in the inquiry, a jury cannot be had in an action to try title to an office. Contrary holdings have been made in other states by courts of high repute, but we think the law of Ohio is clearly as held by the circuit court. The question is not a new one in this court. In State, Atty. Gen., v. Blood (quo warranto) a demand for a jury was made March 25, 1887, and argued by eminent counsel. The demand was refused. 17 Week. L. Bull. 290. The case was then referred to a master to take testimony, but was finally dismissed by relator, and for that reason was not reported.

Other questions of procedure are argued, but we do not regard them of sufficient importance to warrant comment, except to say that we find no error.

Judgment affirmed.

MISSOURI SUPREME COURT (In Banc).

STATE of Missouri, by Edward C. CROW, upon Application of Roderick E. Rom-bauer,

v.

Charles C. BLAND.

(.....Mo.....)

1. Strict construction should be given to the corrupt practices act of 1893, which provides, not only for the forfeiture of office, but for punishment of the violations of law as felonies and misdemeanors.
2. Procuring the withdrawal of a candidate and the substitution of the name of the candidate of another party as the nominee of the former party also, although it is done by the payment of money and by giving other valuable inducements and results in procuring additional votes for the fusion candidate, does not constitute a bribery of voters within the meaning of the corrupt practices act of 1893.
3. A proceeding under the corrupt practices act of March 31, 1893, NOTE.—See preceding case of Mason v. State, McCoy, which is also a determination under a corrupt practices act.

brought by the attorney general on the initiative of the defeated candidate who, by § 10, is required to specify the charges under the act, is not a proceeding by quo warranto instituted by the attorney general ex officio, but is a special proceeding subject to the limitations and restrictions of the statute.

4. A petition in a proceeding under the corrupt practices act of March 31, 1893, by the attorney general on the application of the defeated candidate, is demurrable if it does not clearly state charges which are made actionable by the act, although it alleges that the defendant is usurping the office.
5. The expenditure to secure the nomination and election of a candidate of more money than the law permits, if it is done without his knowledge or consent, will not avoid his election under the corrupt practices act of 1893.

(Brace and Robinson, JJ., dissent.)

(May 10, 1898.)

ORIGINAL proceeding under the corrupt practices act to have defendant's election to the office of judge of the St. Louis Court of Appeals declared void because of his alleged violation of the statute in procuring the election. Judgment for defendant.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. R. L. Goode, John M. Wood, and Adiel Sherwood, for respondent, in support of demurrer:

It is necessary for the attorney general to make a case by the allegations of his information as much so as for any other pleader. Inasmuch as the attorney general has undertaken to set out the grounds of disqualification, he must set out sufficient grounds. Besides, as this is a proceeding under the statute to oust the incumbent, the causes must be stated therein, and inasmuch as the statute prescribes the mode in which this must be done and the causes therefore there can be no reference to the common law to aid in the task. Further, this is not a common-law proceeding for the reason that the attorney general cannot act of his own motion, but must await the pleasure of the defeated candidate. Hence, the information is bad because it does not allege facts which show that respondent is disqualified or that the election was not a legal election. The information is not one at common law for the additional reason that Rombauer is in as a party plaintiff under the provisions of the act.

A private relator cannot be joined in quo warranto with the attorney general.

State, Gibbs, v. Somers Point, 49 N. J. L. 515.

Specific facts and illegal acts are not alleged. Rez v. Pinney, 3 Barn. & Ad. 947, 5 Car. & P. 254; Macon v. Shaw, 16 Ga. 187; King v. Mashiter, 6 Ad. & El. 153; State, Norton, v. Lupton, 64 Mo. 415, 27 Am. Rep. 253.

No facts are stated to show election to be illegal.

Section 10, which specifies certain offenses committed thereunder, and §§ 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, and 16, which directly refer to said § 10, do not make that an offense which is alleged in the first, second, third, and fourth counts of the information. These counts do not show that voters were corrupted, or that any money, reward, or influence was promised to the voters.

In view of our other statutes punishing bribery at elections with forfeiture of office upon conviction of the offense (Rev. Stat. 1889, § 3784) with which the "corrupt practices act" is in pari materia, a prior conviction is necessary before a judgment of ouster of respondent for bribery can be entered under the latter act.

Names of illegal voters must be alleged and proved.

The second count or charge in said information fails to allege that the promise alleged to have been made to John W. North was a promise whereby any voter was corrupted or influenced to vote for respondent, and fails to state the names of the persons who thus were induced to vote for respondent by the retirement of said North from the canvass. The fact that, as a consequence of the alleged arrangement between Bland and North, the latter withdrew, which resulted in voters voting for Bland who otherwise would have voted for North, shows no corruption whatever of the voter.

State v. Miller, 132 Mo. 297; State v. Krueger, 134 Mo. 271.

The third count or charge in said information does not, if the facts alleged are true, constitute a violation of § 10 of said act, and does not state the names of the voters who thus were secured for respondent by the withdrawal of John W. North from the People's party ticket.

State v. Krueger, 134 Mo. 272; State, Atty. Gen. v. Mason, 77 Mo. 191.

The fourth count or charge in the information does not show or charge any one of the offenses created by § 10 of said act, and said count fails to state the names of the voters whose votes were corruptly secured or otherwise by respondent by the withdrawal of said North and the substitution of respondent as a candidate of the People's party.

State v. Krueger, 134 Mo. 272.

It is not a valid objection that illegal votes were received if they did not change the majority.

The sixth count or charge in said information is insufficient for the reason that said count does not allege any one of the grounds of ouster prescribed by § 10 of said act, but undertakes to enlarge the scope of said section by including moneys expended by others than the respondent, and said count or charge fails to set out the names of the persons to whom said money as alleged was unlawfully paid, the amount paid to each and when the same was paid.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

This is an original proceeding instituted in this court on the 18th of January, 1898, by the attorney general, on the application in writing of Roderick E. Rombauer, under the provisions of the act of the general assembly of Missouri, entitled "An Act to Prevent Corrupt Practices in Elections, to Limit the Expenses of Candidates, to Prescribe the Duties of Candidates and Political Committees, and Provide Penalties and Remedies for Violation of [of] This Act," approved March 31, 1893 (Acts 1893, p. 157).

The petition is as follows:

"The state of Missouri by the information of Edward C. Crow, attorney general, gives the court to understand and be informed that at the general election held in the state of Missouri, under the laws of said state, on the 6th day of November, 1896, one Charles C. Bland and Roderick E. Rombauer were respectively candidates of the Democratic and Republican parties for judge of the St. Louis court of appeals; that at said election, according to the official count, said Bland received 172,691 votes constituting the majority of all the votes cast at said election for said office; that he was thereupon declared duly elected and was properly commissioned and qualified for the term of twelve years and assumed the duties of said office and still exercises the same; that said Roderick E. Rombauer at said election received 159,168 votes, according to the official count, which number was the next highest number cast for any person for said office at said election.

"Relator charges that defendant, without any legal right or authority whatsoever, has been, since the — day of January, 1897, usurping, holding, using, and exercising the office of judge of the St. Louis court of appeals an important public office in the state of Missouri, and still does usurp, hold, use, and exercise the same within the state of Missouri, and since the day aforesaid has unlawfully claimed, received, and enjoyed the rights, fees, and emoluments belonging and appertaining to the said office.

"Relator charges that at the election held on the 6th day of November, 1896, and therefore during the canvass and after the nomination of said Charles C. Bland, that said Bland was guilty of divers violations of the act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri approved March 31, 1893, in this, to wit:

"First: That said Bland paid the sum of $1,000 to one Samuel B. Cook, with intent that the same was wholly or in part to be expended in securing the retirement from the canvass of one John W. North, the candidate for said office of a political party different from the one which nominated said Bland, and with intent that the money thus paid should be used to induce the said North and his political friends to cast their votes for him, the said Bland, for said office at said election, and that said votes were actually thus secured for said Bland, which would otherwise have been given to said North.

"Second: That at said election, to wit: after the various parties had nominated their candidates for judge of said St. Louis court of appeals, the said Bland promised to the said North, that if he, the said North, would retire from the said canvass in favor of him, the said Bland, that he, the said Bland, would use his influence to have him, the said North, appointed to the office of reporter of the St. Louis court of appeals, which office is a public office of great value, to wit: of the value of $2,000 per annum, requires skill and capacity, and should be bestowed on the most worthy and competent person, regardless of other considerations. That thereupon said North, induced by said promise, did retire from said canvass, whereby a great many votes were secured to said Bland which would otherwise have been given to said North.

"Third: That said Bland at said election, to wit: after the various parties had nominated their candidates for the office of judge of the St. Louis court of appeals, did promise one Arthur B. Rozelle, who was then and there the chairman of the state central committee of the People's party, that if he the said Rozelle would secure the withdrawal of the said John W. North's name from the ticket of the said People's party, and cause the substitution of the said Charles C. Bland's name on said ticket, in place of the name of the said John W. North, that he, the said Bland, would pay to the said Rozelle the sum of $1,000, and that thereupon the said Rozelle with his confederates did secure such withdrawal and substitution, whereby very many votes were secured for said Bland which would otherwise have been given for said North.

"Fourth: That the said Bland shortly preceding the said election did promise to and agree with one Henry W. Bond, or else had a tacit understanding with him, the said Bond, who was then and there a judge of said St. Louis court of appeals, that if he, the said Bond, would aid him in carrying out his said promise to said North, that he, the said Bond, should have the controlling voice in the selection of other officers, which might be appointed by said St. Louis court of appeals, and that by such inducement he, the said Bland, secured the promise of said Bond to vote for the election of said North for reporter, and secured the withdrawal of said North from the canvass, and the substitution of his own name in place of that of said North, whereby very many votes were secured for said Bland, which would otherwise have been given for said North.

"Fifth: That said Bland was guilty of the violation of the 7th section of said act by not filing with the secretary of state and with the recorder of deeds of the county wherein the said Bland resided, and within the time required by said act, such a sworn statement of his expenditures and promises as said act requires, to wit: A statement setting forth in detail all sums of money (except all moneys paid for actual traveling expenses, including hotel or lodging bills) contributed, disbursed, expended, or promised by him, and to the best of his knowledge and belief, by any other person or persons in his behalf, wholly or in part endeavoring to secure or in any way in connection with his nomination or election, or in connection with the election of any other persons at said election, and showing the dates when, and the persons to whom, and the purpose for which, all such moneys were paid, expended, or promised.

"Sixth: That at said election the amount expended, contributed, and incurred by said Bland for the purpose of securing his own nomination and election, and the amount expended by other person or persons, wholly or in part with his knowledge for said purpose, exceeded in the aggregate the sum of $1,792.62, which was the amount authorized to be expended by any one candidate for judge of the said St. Louis court of appeals, in furtherance of his nomination and election by the provisions of the act hereinbefore recited.

"Relator further avers that heretofore, to wit: on the 18th day of January, A. D. 1898, the above-named Roderick E. Rombauer filed with relator herein, as attorney general of the state of Missouri, complaint in writing, as required by § 10 of the act approved March 31, 1893, relating to elections and corrupt practices therein, a copy of which said complaint is hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit A'; that on the said 18th day of January, A. D. 1898, said Roderick E. Rombauer filed with relator, as attorney general of the state of Missouri, a bond to the state of Missouri in penalty of $1,000 subscribed by two or more sureties justifying as freeholders of the state in double the amount of the penalty of such bond exclusive of all liabilities and property exempt by law from levy and sale in execution, conditioned for the payment to the state of all the costs and disbursements for which it might become liable for or on account of such action, a copy of which said bond is hereto attached and marked 'Exhibit B'.

"Wherefore relator prays for judgment that the said defendant has usurped and unlawfully held, used, and exercised said office of judge of the St. Louis court of appeals and that he be ousted therefrom and that the said Roderick

E. Rombauer be adjudged entitled to the said office and that he be allowed to assume the execution of the duties of the same on taking the oath and qualifying as prescribed by law.

"Edward C. Crow, Atty. Gen. of Mo."

The respondent interposed a demurrer, general and special, containing nine grounds, but in the view we take of the case it is only necessary to refer to the general ground, "that said information does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action in this, to wit: (1) the several charges contained in the information nor any of them constitute a ground under the provisions of the act of the general assembly of the state of Missouri, approved March 31, 1893, upon which this proceeding was instituted, for ousting respondent from office."

The case was submitted on the 15th of March, 1898, upon the demurrer to the petition, after full oral argument, and upon elaborate and exhaustive briefs of counsel, whose diligence and research have greatly aided the court.

The case is one of first impression in this state, under the "corrupt practices" act.

It is patent that the proceeding is predicated upon §§ 10 and 6 of the act, which are as follows:

"Sec. 10. At any time during the term of office of any public officer elected under the laws of this state, or under the charter of any city therein, the person who received the next highest number of votes for such office at the election at which such public officer was elected, as shown by the official count, may present an application in writing, and verified by his affidavit, to the attorney general, setting forth one or more of the following charges against such public officer, to wit: That at the election at which such public officer was elected, the total amount expended, contributed, or incurred by such officer exceeded the sum allowed by § 6 of this act for such candidate, or that votes were secured by him or his agent or agents, or with his consent or connivance, or with the consent or connivance of his agent or agents, by some committee or organization, or some political party, of which party such public officer was a nominee, or by which he was supported, or the agent or agents of some such committee or organization, by paying, contributing, offering, or promising to contribute money or other valuable thing as a compensation or reward, or by some promise or influence, the giving such vote or votes, or that votes were withheld from such applicant by reason of such practices by or on behalf of such officer, agent, committee, or organization, or by reason of some act on behalf of such officer declared by this act to be unlawful; and further setting forth that the applicant desires said attorney general to bring an action to have such public office declared vacant on account of said violation of the laws concerning elections. Such application shall be accompanied by a bond to the state of Missouri in the penalty of $1,000, subscribed by two sureties, who shall justify as freeholders of the state, and in double the amount of such penalty, exclusive of all their debts and liabilities, and property exempt by law from levy and sale under execution—such bond to be conditioned for the payment to the state of all the taxable costs and disbursements for which it may become liable for or on account of such action."

"Sec. 6. No candidate for Congress or for any public office in this state, or in any county, district, or municipality thereof, which office is to be filled by popular election, shall, by himself or by or through any agent or agents, committee or organization, or any person or persons whatsoever, in the aggregate pay out or expend, or promise or agree or offer to pay, contribute, or expend any money, or other valuable thing in order to secure or aid in securing his nomination or election, or the nomination or election of any other person or persons, or both such nomination and election, to any office to be voted for at the same election, or in aid of any party or measure, in excess of a sum to be determined upon the following basis, namely: For 5,000 voters or less, $100; for each 100 voters over 5,000 and under 25,000, $2; for each 100 voters over 25,000 and under 50,000, $1; and for each 100 voters over 50,000, 50 cents—the number of voters to be ascertained by the total number of votes cast for all the candidates for such office at the last preceding regular election held to fill the same; and any payment, contribution, or expenditure, or promise, agreement, or offer to pay, contribute, or expend any money or valuable thing in excess of said sum, for such objects or purposes, is hereby declared unlawful."

It thus appears that § 10 authorizes a proceeding of this character against any officer upon any one or more of the following charges:

1. That he expended, contributed, or incurred at the election a greater amount of money than the limit fixed by § 6.

2. That votes were secured by him or his agents with his or their consent or connivance, by some committee or political party of which he was the nominee or by which he was supported or by the agents of such committee or political party, "by paying, contributing, offering, or promising to contribute money or other valuable thing as a compensation or reward, or by some promise or influence, the giving such vote or votes, or that votes were withheld from such applicant [the defeated candidate who received the next highest vote] by reason of such practices by or on behalf of such officer, agent, committee, or organization, or by reason of some act on behalf of such officer declared by this act to be unlawful."

Reduced to a minimum of verbiage the act provides (1) that if a public officer exceeds the limit of money he is authorized to expend, or (2) that if he or his agent or committee or political party procures votes for him by bribery of voters, he shall be ousted from office, and the defeated candidate, who received the next highest number of votes, shall be installed in the office.

The purpose of this proceeding is to oust defendant and to instal Roderick E. Rombauer, the applicant, in the office of judge of the St. Louis court of appeals.

The petition contains six charges against defendant, but it is admitted by informant and applicant that the fifth charge states no cause for ouster under the act, and the demurrer is therefore confessed as to that charge.

Of the remaining charges, the first, second, third, and fourth attempt to charge bribery, and the sixth that the limit of expenditure was exceeded. The demurrer challenges the sufficiency of these charges, and the question for our decision is whether the acts charged against defendant bring the case within the provisions of the corrupt practices act.

The first charge is that defendant paid Cook $1,000 with intent that it should be used wholly or in part to secure the retirement from the canvass of North, the candidate of another political party for said office, "and with intent that the money thus paid should be used to induce the said North and his political friends to cast their votes for him, the said Bland, and that said votes were actually thus secured for said Bland, which would otherwise have been given to said North."

The second charge is that Bland promised North that if he would withdraw in his favor, he, Bland, would use his influence to have him, North, appointed reporter of the St. Louis court of appeals.

The third charge is that Bland promised Rozelle, the chairman of the state central committee of the People's party, that if he, Rozelle, would secure North's withdrawal and his, Bland's, substitution, as the nominee of the People's party, he, Bland, would pay him, Rozelle, $1,000, and that Rozelle accomplished this, "whereby very many votes were secured for said Bland which would otherwise have been given for said North."

The fourth charge is that Bland agreed with Judge Bond of the St. Louis court of appeals, "or else had a tacit understanding with him," that if Bond would aid him, Bland, in carrying out his, Bland's, promise to North to make him reporter of the St. Louis court of appeals Bond might appoint the other officers of that court, in consequence of which Bond's vote was secured, North withdrew from the canvass, Bland became the nominee of the People's party, and many votes were secured for Bland which would otherwise have been given for North.

The sixth charge is that the amount expended, contributed, and incurred by Bland to secure his nomination and election, "and the amount expended by other person, or persons, wholly or in part with his knowledge for said purpose," exceeded the legal limit.

Considered in the abstract or in the concrete, the first, second, third, and fourth charges do not bring this case within any of the provisions of the act of 1893. The act prohibits "bribery of voters." The charges allege the payment of money or promise of appointment to office to secure the withdrawal of North and the substitution of Bland as the nominee of the People's party. It is not charged that the money was paid or the appointment promised to secure the vote of even North himself for Bland, nor that North actually voted for Bland. It is averred that in consequence of the substitution of Bland for North as the nominee of the People's party, votes were secured for Bland which would otherwise have been given to North. This is necessarily true, but a like result always follows whenever the same person is nominated by more than one political party. We take judicial notice of such events as constitute a part of the political history of our country and state (Homes v. Kring, 93 Mo. loc. cit. 456; 1 Greenl. Ev. 15th ed. § 6), and are therefore aware of the historical fact that in 1872, Horace Greeley was the nominee of the Democrat and Liberal-Republicans for President of the United States, while U. S. Grant was the Republican nominee, and Charles O'Connor was the Democratic nominee; and later in 1884 in our state, that Nicholas Ford was the nominee of the Fusion party, which was made up of the Republican party and of other minor political organizations. We also know that in 1896 the same persons were nominated and voted for as presidential electors for the fourth, eighth, and fourteenth districts, by the Democratic and Populist parties.

It is therefore not unusual or unprecedented that the same person may be the nominee of more than one political party at the same time. In fact it is customary for minority parties to coalesce when they can, for in no other way could they hope to cope successfully with the majority or plurality party.

The act of 1893 does not prohibit such fusions. The charges allege a fusion between the Democrats and Populists, whereby Bland became the nominee of both parties and as such received the votes of both. The fact that North withdrew in consequence of any influence does not taint the transaction with bribery, for it is not charged that the money or influence was paid or promised to secure North's vote, nor that any such inhibited means were employed by Bland or anyone for him to secure the votes of any voter. The charge is single, that in consequence of Bland's substitution for North as the regular nominee of the People's party, Bland received votes which would have otherwise been cast for North. This may be accepted as almost a truism, but it is neither illegal nor unreasonable. The payment of money to Cook to secure the withdrawal of North, the payment of money to Rozelle to procure the substitution of Bland for North as the nominee of the People's party, the promise of Bland to North to use his influence to have North appointed reporter of the St. Louis court of appeals if he would withdraw from the People's ticket, and the promise by Bland to Bond to let him have the appointment of the other officers of the court of appeals if he would aid Bland in carrying out his promise to North, constitute the gravamen and essence of the complaint against Bland, and although stated in four separate charges are in reality only the separate means alleged to have been employed to accomplish the single end of creating a fusion between the Democratic and People's party so far as the office of judge of the St. Louis court of appeals was concerned. Yet none of these acts come within the prohibitions of the act of 1893; they do not constitute bribery of voters. In this connection it is profitable to analyze the charges. The first charge alleges a payment of $1,000 to Cook to be used wholly or in part to secure North's withdrawal and with the intent that the money should be used to induce North and his friends to vote for Bland, and that votes were actually thus secured for Bland which would otherwise have been given to North. Yet there is no allegation that Cook ever paid any of the money to North or to any of his friends to secure their votes. On the contrary, it is alleged that it was the withdrawal of North which secured the votes for Bland. So this charge states no bribery of voters. The second charge likewise alleges a promise to influence the appointment of North as reporter if he would withdraw. Here again there is no allegation of bribery of voters, nor even an averment that North himself voted for Bland. The third charge states a promise to pay Rozelle $1,000 to secure Bland's substitution for North as the nominee of the People's party and an accomplishment of that end, but no allegation of bribery of a voter, nor that Rozelle himself voted for Bland. The fourth charge alleges an agreement or "tacit understanding" between Bland and Bond concerning the appointment of officers of the St. Louis court of appeals, to enable Bland to carry out his promise to North. Still there is no averment of bribery of voters.

Thus it appears that if the charges be taken as true they do not state the offense of bribery of voters, which is the prohibited act under the law of 1893.

This act is penal in its very nature and fibre. It provides for punishment as for felonies and as for misdemeanors, and also for forfeiture of office even after the incumbent has received a majority of the votes cast at the election, and has been inducted into office. The act should therefore be strictly construed, and nothing should be regarded as included in it which is not clearly and intelligently described in its very words. Rozelle v. Harmon, 108 Mo. 889, 12 L. R. A. 187; Connell v. Western U. Tel. Co. 108 Mo. 459; State, Wood, v. Smith, 114 Mo. 180; Dudley v. Western U. Tel. Co. 54 Mo. App. 391.

The history of the legislation against corrupt practices in elections confirms and emphasizes the view we have taken that fusions between political parties, or such acts as are charged in this case, are not within the scope of the act of 1893. This act was manifestly patterned after the English corrupt practices acts of 1854 (17 & 18 Vict. Pub. Gen. Stat. 1854, p. 523) and 1883 (46 & 47 Vict. Law Reports, Vol. 19, p. 243). In the English statute of 1854, there was no prohibition against inducing the withdrawal of a candidate at an election by any means that might be employed to accomplish the purpose. It was not until 1883 that procuring the withdrawal of a candidate was prohibited. Then for the first time the bans of the law were laid upon such practices. The 15th section of the English act of 1883 is as follows: "Any person who corruptly induces or procures any other person to withdraw from being a candidate at an election, in consideration of any payment or promise of payment, shall be guilty of illegal payment, and any person withdrawing, in pursuance of such inducement or procurement, shall also be guilty of illegal payment." Prior to the adoption of this regulation the English law had for years contained provisions in almost the same words as our act of 1893, against bribery of voters, and the expenditure of more money than the limit fixed by the act, besides various other provisions not included in our act, but until 1883 it had not been deemed necessary or expedient to prohibit one candidate from securing the withdrawal of an opposing candidate. We have adopted the old English law, but have not yet enacted any law similar to the section quoted of the English law of 1883, and until the legislature sees fit to enact such a law, we cannot, by construction, enlarge the provisions of the act of 1893, so as to add to the acts now prohibited other acts, such as those charged in this case.

Laws of this character have always been strictly construed. Thus, in Com., Directors of the Poor, v. Wells, 110 Pa. 463, an act prohibiting betting at an election was held not to apply to betting upon the result of a primary election held to nominate candidates for a political party.

The case of Mason v. State, lately decided by the supreme court of Ohio, but not yet officially reported, did not involve the questions now under consideration. That was a plain case of bribery of voters, and consequently has no application to this case.

The sixth charge alleges that the amount expended by Bland to secure his nomination and election, "and the amount expended by other person, or persons, wholly or in part with his knowledge for said purpose," exceeded the legal limit.

It will be observed that it is not charged that Bland himself, or any other person for him with his knowledge or consent, spent more money than the law permits. The allegation is that what he spent and what his friends spent partly with his knowledge and partly without his knowledge exceeded the legal limit. It needs no deep discernment to see that if the expenditure of money for a candidate without his knowledge or consent would work a forfeiture of his office, an officer might be ousted for acts done by others beyond his control and without his knowledge. Under such a construction of the statute no man, however honest or law-abiding, would ever have a safe tenure of office, for if he can be ousted because of the acts of others done without his knowledge, then in order to accomplish this purpose it would only be necessary for some evil-minded or designing person to spend enough money, added to the amount the officer had legitimately spent, to exceed the limit, and the innocent officer would lose the office to which the people had elected him. This is a reductio ad absurdum, but it points extremities to which we would be led if the sixth charge was held good. No man was ever punished or deprived of an office for an act he did not commit himself, or which was done without his knowledge or consent, where the integrity of the voters' will was not violated or the legality of the election itself was not questioned.

It is too plain for argument therefore that the sixth charge states no cause of action against the defendant.

It is insisted, however, that this is a proceeding by quo warranto, instituted by the attorney general ex officio, under his constitutional right, that the petition in this case is good even if all the charges be disregarded, because it alleges that defendant is usurping a public office, and that the burden of showing a right to the office in question is devolved upon the defendant.

The error in this contention consists in assuming that this is a proceeding by quo warranto, instituted by the attorney general ex officio. Proceedings by quo warranto may be instituted by the attorney general in his official capacity and of his own motion. (State v. Merry, 8 Mo. 278; State, Boyd, v. Rose, 84 Mo. 198; State, Harrison, v. Frazier, 98 Mo. 426; State, Brown, v. McMillan, 108 Mo. 153; State, Walker, v. Equitable Loan & Invest. Co. 142 Mo. 325; State, Dearing, v. Berkeley, 140 Mo. 184; State, Crow, v. Vallins, 140 Mo. 528), and it is not necessary or proper that there should be a private relator in such a proceeding. But under the act of 1893, the attorney general has no right or power, ex officio, to institute a proceeding of this character. On the contrary, he cannot institute the proceeding until the defeated candidate takes the initiative by making an application to him, and giving a bond, and the applicant has the express right under the act to be a party to the proceeding, and if the defendant is ousted, the applicant may obtain a judgment awarding the office to him. In no proper sense, therefore, can this be regarded as a proceeding by quo warranto instituted by the attorney general at his own instance, or ex officio, but it is purely a special proceeding instituted under the act of 1893, and therefore falls within all the limitations and restrictions by the statute provided. The fact that § 11 of the act provides that the action shall be deemed to be and shall be conducted according to the rules prescribed by law for an action against the usurper of an office, does not change the action from a proceeding under the statute to a common-law proceeding by quo warranto. For while we find these provisions in § 11, we also find that by § 10 the defeated candidate is required to make an application, in writing, verified by his affidavit, to the attorney general, setting forth one or more of the charges specified in that section and asking the attorney general "to bring an action to have such public office declared vacant on account of said violation of the laws concerning elections." That is, the applicant is required to specify the charge and the attorney general must (he has no discretion) bring the action to have the office declared vacant, "on account of said violation of the laws concerning elections." The attorney general is therefore limited to the charges specified by the applicant, and the office can only be declared vacant on account of "said violation." (The petition in this case complies with the statutory requirement by averring the filing of the verified charges and bond, and even makes them exhibits in the case.) Manifestly, therefore, the petition in the case must set out the charges preferred by the applicant, so that the defendant may be advised of the nature of the charges against him, and so that he may demur to them or join issue upon them. The proceeding being highly penal in its character, the petition must state, clearly, charges which are made actionable by the act. In this, and, in fact, in all cases, the petition must state a cause of action, and it is the privilege of a defendant to challenge the sufficiency of the petition by raising the questions of law, which are apparent upon the face of the petition, by a demurrer, or he may join issue as to the facts. But whether the defendant demurs or answers he can always, at any time, during the progress of the case, insist that the petition states no cause of action in law against him, for the petition is always a part of the record, and errors apparent upon the face of the record may be assailed even for the first time in this court. Courts are instituted for the enforcement of the laws, and as no litigant can confer jurisdiction over the subject-matter upon a court, even by consent, it is wholly immaterial whether the parties raise the question of jurisdiction by answer or demurrer or refuse to raise it at all. If the petition fails to charge any offense against the laws of the state, it is the province, privilege, and duty of the court to refuse to enter a judgment against the defendant. It is a solecism to say a court of law would enter a judgment punishing a defendant for doing an act that was never made unlawful by any law (Kansas v. Corrigan, 86 Mo. 100, loc. cit. 69.) In this case the defendant demurred to the petition instead of filing an answer. This was proper practice, and was conducive to a speedy determination of the question of whether the charges constitute any offense under the corrupt practice act of 1893, but, as above observed, it would have been the duty of the court to decide that question before it could render a judgment, whether the defendant raised the question in one way, or another or not at all, for courts are not mere playthings for litigants, but are created for the discharge of serious and solemn duties.

In reaching the conclusion announced in this case, we feel the importance of the questions involved. We realize that pure, fair, and honest elections, untainted by fraud and unstained by even a suspicion of wrongdoing, are the foundations upon which our institutions rest. We appreciate the especial necessity of rigidly enforcing all constitutional laws having for their object the protection of the sacred right of the electors to have their wishes faithfully recorded and strictly respected. We understand that the purpose of acts like that of 1893 is to purify elections, by guaranteeing assurance and protection to the law-abiding citizens, and by punishing with symbolic stripe and shaven head, rough fare, and hard labor, all who are so bereft of patriotism, or so impregnated with criminal selfishness, as to pollute the fountain from which spring the liberties of the people. But under the division of powers in our form of government we have no right to trench upon the prerogatives of the other co-ordinate branches of our government. We have no right to make laws. Our duty and province is ended when we construe and enforce the laws that are made by the legislature, and by as much as we should overstep the boundary lines of our powers, and attempt to invade the province of the legislature, we would be ourselves violators of the Constitution and laws we are solemnly sworn to obey. These truisms in our law are not threadbare utterances. It is as wholesome to recall them today as it ever was in our history. They are the alphabet of the language of freedom, and the ultima thule of the liberties of our people.

Our conclusion is that the charges contained in the petition do not constitute any offense against any law of our state, and do not bring this case within any of the provisions of the corrupt practices act of 1893, and that the petition be adjudged insufficient in law, and judgment entered for the defendant.

It is so ordered.

Gantt, Ch. J., Sherwood, Burgess, and Williams, JJ., concur.

Brace, J., dissents:

I cannot concur in the foregoing opinion of Judge Marshall for the reason that in my judgment an offense under the provisions of the corrupt practices act of 1893 is sufficiently charged, in the first, second, and third specifications of the petition; hence the demurrer should be overruled.

Robinson, J., concurs in my view.

Rehearing denied.

The provision of the charter of Ogden City, authorizing it to lease, convey, and dispose of property, real and personal, for its benefit, did not authorize it to lease or otherwise transfer its waterworks system, or its water right used in supplying its inhabitants with water. APPEAL by defendants from a judgment of the District Court for Weber County appointing a receiver of the defendant corporation in a suit brought to set aside a lease of waterworks to defendants and to recover possession of them. Reversed.

Statement by Zane, Ch. J.:

It appears from the record in this case that on July 16, 1884, the Ogden Waterworks Company assigned and conveyed to Ogden City, Utah, for the consideration of $74,864.50, and for the further consideration that the latter assumed all the liabilities of the former, all the water rights, rights of way, ditches, dams, flumes, reservoirs, water pipes, hydrants, and all instruments used for the purpose of diverting and distributing water owned and used by such company, and belonging to or connected with its water system; that the city of Ogden took possession of such water rights and system, and dedicated them to the use of its inhabitants, and repaired, improved, and extended the same, and established, by ordinance, water rates. It appears further that on August 6, 1889, a contract was entered into between Ogden City and one John R. Bothwell, by which the former purported to convey to the latter the right to furnish water to the city and its inhabitants, and the use of its streets for the purpose of laying water pipes for the water system described. The contract also provided: That upon the completion and operation of the system within the time designated, and in consideration of the benefits secured, the city would lease to him, for the full time that said Bothwell or assigns should furnish water through the system for municipal purposes, the water right owned by it, for an annual rent of $1. "That within one year from the date hereof, he or his assigns will have in operation a complete distributive water system, furnishing the city and her inhabitants a plentiful and ample supply of water suitable for domestic purposes, continuously, from the mountains immediately east, and, as a part of said system, will have completed on said date a conduit, commencing in Ogden cañon, at a sufficient elevation, and made of size sufficient, to convey the flow of Ogden river, and terminating at the mouth of the cañon, and from the terminus thereof a supply main or mains of sufficient diameter to convey an abundance of water for all purposes as contemplated by this contract, to the intersection of Pierce avenue and Twenty-Fifth street, and from thence the distribution shall be by first-class iron pipes, upon the streets and in the manner designated in the map hereto attached, marked 'Exhibit A,' and made a part hereof, and to be approved by the city council, and will extend the same as fast as adjoining property owners produce revenue equaling 8 per cent cost of the extensions." And it was provided that the grantee should furnish 200 gallons per day per capita, and the city was given the right at any time, at its option, to purchase the entire distributive system emanating from the mouth of the conduit, at the original cost of construction, "and may pay for the same in cash, or in 8 per cent bonds of the city, provided they be legal and valid. In case of the purchase of the distributive system as set out in § 5, then the city shall have the right, at its option, to also purchase from the said John R. Bothwell or assigns all or such portion of the water of Ogden river as she shall elect, at a price to be established by arbitration." The contract contains other provisions, which we do not deem it necessary to refer to in this statement of the case. It appears further that the rights and obligations of Bothwell under the contract were transferred to the Bear Lake & River Waterworks & Irrigation Company, defendant, and were by it transferred to the Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company; that the latter company before the commencement of this suit expended more than $267,925.80 in substituting its new system for the old one, and in extending, improving, and repairing such waterworks, and distributive system; and that it has received as much as $22,500 annually in rents for water distributed and delivered. After the corporate defendants had been in possession, under the contract mentioned, from October, 1890, the plaintiff filed its bill in chancery against the defendants on July 10, 1897, in which it set up the above facts, with others, and asked the court to find and decree the plaintiff to be the owner of the entire water system, and to require the Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company to deliver the same to the plaintiff, and to enjoin them from collecting any water rents from persons using the water through the system, and for an accounting for rents collected. The decree was asked on the ground, as alleged, that the city of Ogden did not possess the power to convey its waterworks and water system to John R. Bothwell, or any of the defendants, or to lease its water rights; that the use of its waterworks and water right had been dedicated to the public. A decree was also asked, in case the contract should be held valid, on the further ground that defendants' rights under the contract had been forfeited by a refusal or failure to comply with the contract set forth. The bill did not contain a prayer for the appointment of a receiver of the waterworks, and the property or business thereof. But on January 4, 1898, about six months after commencing the action, the plaintiff entered a motion in the case for the appointment of a receiver of the entire water system and the business, with power to take possession thereof and collect water rates, and to transact all the business thereof. A receiver was asked for on the ground that the plaintiff had an interest in the waterworks and its business, and that such interest would be in danger of being lost or greatly impaired unless a receiver should be appointed, and that the defendants were insolvent. Affidavits were read to the court, and other evidence was heard in support of the motion and against it, and insolvency of the defendants was denied. After hearing the motion upon the affidavits, and other evidence, the court granted an order or decree appointing a receiver of the entire water system and the business thereof, with directions to take possession; and the receiver having taken possession under the decree, the defendants took this appeal, which brings the decree before us for review.

Messrs. Evans & Rogers, E. G. Vaughan, and A. G. Horn for appellants.
Messrs. E. M. Allison, Jr., C. C. Richards, J. H. MacMillan, and C. C. Day, for respondent:

An order appointing a receiver is not a final judgment, from which an appeal will lie; and the appeal in this case should therefore be dismissed.

Beach, Receivers, § 736; High, Receivers, § 737.

No judgment or decree will be regarded as final within the meaning of the statutes in reference to appeals, unless all the issues of law and fact necessary to be determined were determined, and the case completely disposed of, so far as the court had power to dispose of it.

The pretended gift of the waterworks and water right by Ogden City or its officers was and is ultra vires and absolutely void.

When a municipality is vested by its charter with power to buy or construct and maintain a system of waterworks, and it accepts the charter and proceeds to exercise such power by either buying and maintaining or constructing and maintaining a system of waterworks at the expense of the citizens of the municipal ity, the waterworks so bought or constructed and maintained are clothed with a public trust, and are devoted to a public use, and are dedicated irrevocably to the public use of the inhabitants of the city.

Gray v. Oughton, 146 Ind. 285; Johnson v. San Francisco City & County Supers. Ct. 60 Cal. 578.

Zane, Ch. J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The respondent insists that the order appointing a receiver is not a final judgment, within the meaning of § 9, art. 8, of the Constitution of this state. That section declares that "from all final judgments of the district court there shall be a right of appeal to the supreme court." The Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company had been in the actual possession of the water system, and the business transferred to the receiver by the order more than seven years before the order appointing the receiver and depriving it of its possession of the property and the control of the business was made. The order determined finally the rights of the parties to the possession of the property in dispute, and the control of the business, during the pendency of the suit; and the right to collect all demands due, and to pay all liabilities incurred, was also given to the receiver during that time. When the court shall finally determine the rights of the parties with respect to the property and business, and order them turned over to the one adjudged to be entitled, the order appointing the receiver will be recognized as binding. It will not be modified, added to, or changed. Before that time the receiver may collect and add to the fund, pay out a portion of it, and he will then deliver and transmit whatever remains to the person found to be entitled. The order, when made, was final, as to the appointment of the receiver. No further action of the court was contemplated with respect to it. Errors, if any, in the order, can only be reviewed on an appeal from it. It would be idle to review such errors after the duties of the receiver shall have been terminated,—after the order shall have spent its force. Any injury to the party entitled to the benefit of the possession and the business during the litigation will have been sustained before that time, and errors, if any, in appointing the receiver, will have accomplished their effects. By it, important rights were taken from the defendant the Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company, for the injurious consequences of which, if erroneous, there can be no redress without appeal from the order. In determining whether the order is appealable, we must consider its effects upon the rights of the parties, rather than the stage of the litigation at which it was made. While some of the authorities bearing upon the question cannot be reconciled, we are disposed to follow those supporting an appeal in cases like this. They appear to be supported by the better reasons. Barry v. Briggs, 22 Mich. 201; Brown v. Ring, 77 Mich. 159; Lewis v. Campau, 14 Mich. 458, 90 Am. Dec. 245.

The appellants insist that the order appointing the receiver, appealed from, is erroneous; that the court was not authorized, under the pleadings and the evidence, to make the order. They rely upon the contract of August 6, 1889, between the city of Ogden and John R. Bothwell, and the transfers by which it came to the Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company, and the resolutions of the city council, of October 4, 1890, purporting to turn over and transfer to the Bear Lake & River Waterworks Company the Ogden City waterworks system. They insist that thereby the latter company obtained the title to the Ogden City waterworks system, and the right to furnish water to the city and its inhabitants, and the use of its streets for water pipes, and a lease for the full time that Bothwell or his assigns should furnish water through the waterworks system for municipal purposes; while the respondent claims that the waterworks system and the water, the right to which is in dispute, was dedicated to the use of the public, and that the city authorities could not transfer it to Bothwell, or to the defendants, or either or any of them, without the express authority of a legislative enactment, and that, no such authority being in existence, the transfer relied upon by the defendants was absolutely void. If the defendants are right in their contention, the plaintiff has no right to the water system or water right in dispute, or to the control of the business, and the appointment of the receiver must be held to be erroneous. On the contrary, if the plaintiff is right in its contention, or we can say from the pleadings and evidence upon which the receiver was appointed that the plaintiff is probably right in its contention, and that the property or proceeds of the business was in danger of being materially injured, or any considerable part of it was in danger of being lost, if left in the hands of the defendant, the Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company, during the pendency of this suit, we must hold that the appointment of the receiver was not erroneous.

As to the first proposition in the order we will consider them. Was the city of Ogden authorized to enter into a contract transferring its rights to the waters and system in question to the defendants, or either of them? Ogden City was a public corporation, and its authority was limited to such powers as were expressly granted by statute, and such as might be necessary to those expressly given. Undoubtedly, water distributed to a city and its inhabitants is devoted to a public use, and the entire system, whether consisting of reservoirs, conduits, pipes, or other means used to accomplish the delivery, is also dedicated to the same use. The charter of Ogden City contained a provision authorizing it to "purchase, receive, hold, sell, lease, convey, and dispose of property real and personal for the benefit of the city." No authority is expressly or by necessary implication given to convey, transfer, or lease to a private corporation, or other person, property used by the public,—dedicated to a public use. The control and management of property dedicated to the use of the people of a city is given for their benefit, not for the individual benefit of the public authorities. A public corporation is not a legal entity or person, whose interests can be considered separate and apart from its people. It is but an instrumentality created and perpetuated for their benefit. Its officers as such are nothing more than agents of the public. They must act within the scope of their authority. Their acts outside are perfectly impotent, from a legal standpoint. Their authority and control of the property and rights of the corporation used by the people are not given them for the purpose of being transferred to private corporations, or anyone else, to enable them in that way to deprive the public of its use; nor can the city authorities divest the city of its rights to it, and in that way rid themselves of the management and control of it for the city and its inhabitants. They cannot deprive the public of the benefit of property rights or powers affected with a public use by conveying or leasing it to others, unless their charter specially authorizes it, though such other corporation or person may undertake to give the public the use of it for compensation deemed reasonable. Such officers are selected by the people, to whom they are responsible, and they may be removed and superseded by others. While the use of public property is controlled and managed by public officers, whatever compensation is received goes into the public treasury; and, if the compensation exceeds the actual cost, the public gets the benefit of the surplus or net income. When property whose use is devoted to the public is conveyed or leased to private corporations, though a contract may require its use to be given to the public for a reasonable remuneration, the public, to a great extent, loses its control over it, and any net income realized goes into the hands and pockets of private parties. In fact, such parties cannot give the use of their property to the public for the actual cost of it, and the actual expense of the business, as in this case. They must have profits, and it is to the interest of such parties to make the profits or net income as large as public officials will consent to make it. The people usually get fleeced when the city places its waterworks in the hands of private parties. Public spirited men are not at all times free from the undue influence of self-interest. Their disposition to favor the public is not equal to their inclinations to favor themselves. Such are the leanings of human nature, even when engaged in public-spirited projects. A city sometimes has on hand personal and real property not devoted to the use of the public. Fire engines, horses, or other personal property, may become unsuited to the use for which they were designed, and be replaced, and cease to be used. Public buildings may become unfit for the public use, and for sufficient reasons the city may not wish to build on the same lot; and such buildings, and the lots upon which they stand, may be no longer used by the public. The city from time to time may have other classes of property that has ceased to be used, or is not used by the public. All such property of a municipal corporation, not devoted to the public use, may be sold or leased under the general authority to sell or lease, as the public welfare may demand. Such property may be converted into money or other things, and in that form devoted to the use of the public. But property devoted to a public use cannot be sold or leased without special statutory authority. It follows that the writing purporting to grant to John R. Bothwell the right of Ogden City to furnish water to it and its inhabitants, and to lease to him its water rights, as long as he or his assigns should furnish water to it, and the resolution of its city council purporting to turn over to the Bear Lake & River Waterworks Company the waterworks system of the city, were absolutely void, because made without authority of law. Huron Waterworks Co. v. Huron, 7 S. D. 9, 30 L. R. A. 818; 5 Thomp. Corp. § 5880; 5 Am. & Eng. Enc. Law, p. 1068.

It appears from the pleadings in the record that about seven years intervened after the corporate defendant took actual possession under the void grant and lease, before this suit was instituted, and that nearly all of the pipes and other parts of the water system delivered to the corporate defendants by the plaintiff had been replaced, and that the distributive system had been greatly added to and extended; that the Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company had expended more than $269,925.80 in replacing the old system, and in adding to and extending it; that the replacement of such new system at this time would cost that amount. While we are of the opinion that the attempted transfer of the old waterworks system by the plaintiff, and the leasing of its water right, were invalid, and the city of Ogden must be held to be the owner and entitled to the possession and control of the remaining portion, the possession of which it transferred to the corporate defendants, and that it is the owner and entitled to the possession and control of the water right, notwithstanding the lease to Bothwell and his assigns, we do not deem it necessary on this appeal to determine the rights and interests of the respective parties to and in so much of the present system constructed by the corporate defendants, or either of them. Such rights can be more satisfactorily determined in the light of all the evidence upon the final trial. The relative rights of the parties with respect to so much of the new system as replaced the old may be distinguished from their rights with respect to so much of the system as consists of additions to and extensions of the old. The right and interest of the plaintiff to and in that portion of the system which the Bear River Irrigation and Ogden Water-Works Company built during the time it was in possession and control is not sufficiently manifest and probable from the proof,—particularly their right and interest in and to so much of the plant and system consisting of additions and extensions. Nor was the danger of loss, removal, or material injury sufficiently established to authorize the court to take the possession of the entire water-works system and business from the defendants, and place it in the hands of a receiver. The property involved consisted of a reservoir, conduits, and water pipes buried in the ground, and fire hydrants and other instrumentalities connected with them. The defendants are not likely to lose, remove, or materially injure these; and it does not appear from the evidence that business pertaining to the waterworks has been neglected or mismanaged by the corporate defendants, or either of them.

The order of the court below appointing Thomas D. Dee receiver is reversed and the cause is remanded, with directions to order a return of the property to the Bear River Irrigation & Ogden Waterworks Company.

Costs are awarded to the appellants.

Bartch, J.: I concur in the judgment of reversal, directing the property to be returned to the defendant company.

Miner, J., concurring in part:

I concur in the opinion of the Chief Justice, in so far as it directs a reversal of the order appointing a receiver. This being an appeal from an order appointing a receiver, the question as to the validity of the writing and contract between the city of Ogden and the Bear Lake & River Waterworks Company, and of the resolution of the city council purporting to turn over to the Bear Lake & River Waterworks Company the waterworks system of the city of Ogden, are not properly before this court, upon this appeal, for determination. Upon the final hearing many questions not heretofore presented to, or passed upon by, the trial court, may arise; and until that time, in my opinion, a decision upon questions not necessary for the determination of the question at issue, or upon the merits of the case, should be withheld. At the time this court denied the application made in this case for a writ of certiorari, and permitted, without argument, an appeal to be taken from the order appointing a receiver, the case of United States v. Church of Jesus Christ of L. D. S., decided by the territorial supreme court, and reported in 5 Utah, 394, holding that an appeal would not lie from an order appointing a receiver, had not been called to the attention of this court. So far as the present case is concerned, the determination of that question is the law of this case. But whether an appeal will lie from an order appointing a receiver in all cases is a question upon which I have serious doubts, under the decisions of this court, and the authorities cited. I expressly refrain from assenting to the doctrine laid down in the opinion of the Chief Justice upon this subject.

v.

(.....Utah.....)

*1. Where the allegations of a complaint in a suit brought to determine the plaintiff's right to the use of water of a stream state, in general terms, a cause of action by alleging clearly and distinctly ownership, invasion of rights, and injury, without distinct allegations of how plaintiff became the owner of a water right, whether by appropriation, adverse user, or purchase, plaintiff's title can be shown by proof, and the allegations will be sufficient to withstand a general demurrer.

2. Where a party diverts the water of a stream, the appropriation, intention of the appropriator, use, and beneficial purpose are the tests which determine the rights acquired, and, if more water is diverted than is necessary for the beneficial purpose intended, the excess may be appropriated by a subsequent appropriator for a useful purpose.

3. Where parties have diverted the waters of a stream for domestic and irrigation purposes in larger quantities than necessary for their use, the owner of a mill may appropriate the excess for manufacturing purposes to an extent necessary for his use.

4. Where a prior appropriator of water merely changes the place of diversion without causing injury to a subsequent appropriator, the subsequent appropriator has no cause of complaint, but, if the prior and subsequent appropriators are each entitled to a certain portion of the stream, neither can change the place of diversion so as to injuriously affect the rights of the other.

5. The failure to make a finding on an issue is not a reversible error, where the finding, under the facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence, would necessarily have been prejudicial to the appellant, and the facts found are sufficient to sustain the decree.

6. In a cause in equity, when there is ample proof in the record, unassailed, to support and justify the findings and decree, it is not necessary for the appellate court to determine the competency of evidence which cannot affect the decree.

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the District Court for the Fifth District in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to quiet plaintiff's title to the use of certain water and to enjoin defendants from interfering therewith. Affirmed.

Statement by Bartch, J.:

This is a controversy over the use of the water of Salt Creek, in the town of Nephi, the plaintiff claiming the right to the use of a certain portion thereof for manufacturing purposes, and the defendant the right to divert a part of such portion, for the purposes of irrigation, before its subjection to the plaintiff's use. It appears from the testimony that in 1851 the town of Nephi was settled by nineteen families, and in the following year the water of Salt creek was diverted from its natural channel for culinary, domestic, and agricultural purposes. In 1852, one Baxter, plaintiff's predecessor in interest, built a gristmill, locating it on the stream above all the points where water had been diverted. The next year, on account of trouble with the Indians, the mill was moved into the town, and located on a ditch. In 1854, it was reconstructed, and it appears thereafter a right of way to carry water to the mill was obtained from the town, and about 1860 the mill race was moved from a ditch and connected with the stream. In this location the mill and its race have remained ever since. When the plaintiff became its owner two ditches for irrigation and culinary purposes had been taken out above the mill, but the water to supply it was permitted to flow down the stream, and, after passing through it was diverted and used for the purpose of irrigating a large body of land. In 1863 the plaintiff became the owner of the mill property and the appurtenances by purchase. He then reconstructed the mill, as it now stands, but no particular change was made in the race, which was about 4 feet 10 inches wide on the inside, and 2 feet in depth, and the water flowing therein about 18 inches deep. The inclination of the race remained the same ever since. At no time since 1863, except within the last five or six years, when the alleged wrongful diversions were made, was there more than one third of the water of the stream diverted above the mill. Up to the time of such diversions there was always more water in the stream, except during July, August, and September of each year, than was necessary to run the mill. At least 15 inches in depth of water, flowing in the race, is required to operate it at full capacity. Prior to the alleged wrongs, the owner could always run his mill to advantage, in the manufacture of flour, chop, etc., except that in some seasons, from July to October, a portion of the irrigation season, he could not run it at full head on account of scarcity of water. Before the commission of the alleged wrongs the defendant, it appears, never disputed the plaintiff's right to the water, nor refused him water for mill purposes. During the last five or six years, before the commencement of this action, however, the defendant not only refused to permit the plaintiff to use the water to which he claimed to be entitled, but asserted the right to change the place of use, and to divert such water above the mill whenever it chose to do so, although the effects of such change and diversion would be to prevent the operation of the mill to the plaintiff's injury. Respecting the taking of the water and its effect on his manufacturing business, the plaintiff testified: "They haven't taken much notice of me the last few years. They would take all the water sometimes, and sometimes they would not, just as it would suit them. The effect of this taking water, on the mill, was that it would drive customers away. I have been deprived of water to the extent that, where I used to run about a hundred bushels, the capacity of the mill in a day and a night, for these last five or six years I could not run ten. This last fall I could not grind ten." It further appears that since the commission of the acts complained of much more land has been irrigated from ditches taken out above the mill than was irrigated from the same sources before. For many years the gristmill in question was the only one in that vicinity, and it appears, after plaintiff had purchased it, in consequence of his objections to diverting water above it, a large portion thereof was turned down the stream, and, after flowing through the mill, was diverted below it, for the purposes of irrigation. The mill was built in the center of the town in 1854, and was afterwards, in 1862, rebuilt at or near the same place. It was operated regularly and profitably before the alleged wrongful diversion of the water, and the mill race has had, at all times, about the same capacity for carrying water, and no controversy arose over the plaintiff's right to the use of water for his manufacturing purposes until the defendant diverted it so as to prevent it from flowing through the mill. This suit was brought to ascertain and determine the plaintiff's right to the use of the water, to have his title thereto quieted, and to have the defendant and its agents restrained from diverting away from his mill any portion of the water to which he may be entitled. The defendant filed a demurrer to the complaint, but it was overruled, and at the trial the court by decree granted to plaintiff the relief asked. Thereupon the defendant appealed.

Messrs. F. W. Chappell and Moyle, Zane, & Costigan, for appellant:

The inhabitants of Nephi appropriated all the stream. When did plaintiff's adverse use accrue?

The use must be adverse; that is to say, inconsistent with the rights of him against whom the claim is made. There must be a clear invasion of the rights of the party against whom the claim is made; that is, an invasion of his rights which would have entitled him to an action, or which he could have prevented.

Bartch, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

It is insisted by the appellant, at the outset, that the complaint fails to state a cause of action, and that its demurrer, by which this point was raised, ought to have been sustained. The objection seems to be that it does not plead the acquisition of any right in the stream, on the part of the plaintiff, either by appropriation or by adverse user. It is alleged, in effect that, for a period of more than thirty years prior to the commencement of this action, the plaintiff, his grantors and predecessors in interest, operated and were the owners of a grist mill, located in Nephi, on Salt creek, and during such period were the owners of a sufficient water right in the stream to operate it; that they had the free and uninterrupted use of the water during that period, except the interference therewith by the defendant since 1894; that during 1894, and since, the defendant wrongfully and unlawfully diverted water from the mill which was necessary to operate it, causing injury to the plaintiff; and that it threatens to continue to do so. Ownership, invasion of right, and injury are clearly and distinctly alleged, and a cause of action is stated, at least, in general terms, although there is no distinct allegation as to how the plaintiff became the owner of the water right, 41 L. R. A.

—whether by appropriation, adverse user, or purchase. Under the general allegations, this could be shown by proof. If the defendant desired a more specific and definite allegation of ownership, showing the nature thereof, its remedy was by proper pleading. Having failed in this, it cannot now be heard to complain. Mangum v. Bullion Beck & C. Min. Co. 15 Utah, 535. We are of the opinion that the allegations of the complaint are sufficient to withstand a general demurrer.

Counsel for the appellant next insists that the findings and decree are "wholly wrong in basing the plaintiff's rights upon his adverse use of the water," there being no evidence showing such use. This assumption that the plaintiff's rights are based on adverse user is warranted neither by the pleadings nor by the findings and decree. In his complaint his rights are based upon ownership since about 1852, the time Nephi was settled and the first mill erected. From the findings of fact it appears that, by certain conveyances, executed to him by persons owning a right to use of water of Salt creek for milling purposes, and by actual appropriation and use thereof, the plaintiff became the owner of the right to use a portion of the waters of that stream, and ever since has been the owner thereof, and used the same to operate his gristmill, and so used it until interrupted by the acts of the defendant of which he complains. The decree on this point is in harmony with the findings. Thus plaintiff's right is evidently based upon appropriation, purchase, and use.

But it is contended that all the water of Salt creek was appropriated for irrigation, domestic, and culinary purposes by the first settlers of Nephi, in 1852, before the first mill was built, and from this it is argued there was no water flowing in the stream which was subject to appropriation by the owners of the mill, and that consequently their use of the water was simply permissive, and ripened into no right which the owner could enforce in law. It may be that the nineteen families, who in 1851 or 1852 first settled the town of Nephi, in beginning to reduce a few arid acres of land to a state of cultivation and productiveness, appropriated, as stated by some of the witnesses, or attempted to do so, for agricultural, domestic, and culinary purposes, all the waters of Salt creek, a stream which has since been found to be amply sufficient to supply a town of considerable population,—hundreds of families,—for the same purposes, and, in addition thereto to irrigate large bodies of arid lands. Possibly with the limited knowledge of irrigation in those days, those few people, in an attempt to irrigate their lands, turned all the water of the stream out of its natural channel, and thought they appropriated it; but even if such be the fact, it does not necessarily follow that it was all "appropriated," within the legal sense of the term. Appropriation of water does not mean merely the diverting of it, but includes its use for some beneficial purpose. The appropriation, intention of the appropriator, use, and beneficial purpose, are the tests which determine the rights acquired by the diversion of a stream. This is so under the statutes, and the use may be for domestic purposes, irrigating lands, propelling machinery, and the like; that is, the water may be applied to any useful purpose. Utah Comp. Laws 1888, § 2780 (14 Stat. at L. 253).

The object and intention, under the law, in diverting water, must be to apply it to some useful purpose, and, if by means of ditches more is diverted than is necessary for such purpose, the excess cannot be regarded as a diversion for a useful purpose; for, as matter of fact, such excess merely runs to waste, and its diversion cannot result in a vested right. If, therefore, A, who owns and intends to irrigate but 1 acre of land, diverts all the water of a natural stream, which is sufficient to irrigate 2 acres, he obtains a right only to sufficient water to irrigate his 1 acre, and B, who also owns an acre, may appropriate the excess. If, in this arid region, the law were otherwise, it would be a menace to the best interests of the state as well as to its citizens, because it would enable a few individuals, or association of individuals, by diversion of water in excess of use, to greatly limit the area of the public domain which could be cultivated, and thus deprive the state of its revenue, and citizens of homes within its borders. This is exemplified in the case at bar, where nineteen families settled upon public lands, and are now represented as then having, in cultivating a comparatively few acres of land, diverted all the water of the stream, which was then and is now sufficient to irrigate thousands of acres, and to supply the inhabitants of the city of Nephi with water for culinary and domestic purposes. No such extravagance in the use of water was ever intended by the enactment of the laws relating to the appropriation and use of water in the arid belt of the country. The extent of the appropriation is limited, no matter how much water may have been diverted, to the quantity necessary for the purposes for which the appropriation is made, and the intention to apply it to some useful purpose, without unnecessary delay, must also appear, in order to confer upon the appropriator a vested right thereto. If there is no intention on the part of the appropriator, to apply the water to such purpose, within a reasonable time, there is no valid appropriation, and the water remains subject to appropriation by others. So, where there is more diverted than is necessary for the object of the appropriation, there can be no intention to apply the excess to a useful purpose, and such excess remains subject to appropriation. In Kinney, Irrigation, § 150, it is said: "This intention goes to the very foundation of the act of appropriation, and must be evidenced by a constancy, or steadfastness of purpose or labor, as is usual with men engaged in like enterprises, who desire a speedy accomplishment of their designs." In Ortman v. Dixon, 18 Cal. 84, it was said: "The measure of the right, as to extent, follows the nature of the appropriation or the uses for which it is taken. The intent to take and appropriate and the outward act, go together. If we concede that a man has right by mere priority to take as much water from a running stream as he chooses, to be applied to such purposes as he pleases, the question still arises, What did he choose to take? And this depends upon the general and particular uses he makes of it. If, for instance, a man takes up water to irrigate his meadow at certain seasons, the act of appropriation, the means used to carry out the purpose, and the use made of the water would qualify his right of appropriation to a taking for a specific purpose, and limit the quantity to that purpose, or to so much as necessary for it." So, in Nevada County & S. Canal Co. v. Kidd, 87 Cal. 282, Mr. Chief Justice Sawyer, after reference to a number of cases, observed: "The doctrine is that no man shall act upon the principle of the dog in the manger, by claiming water by certain preliminary acts, and from that moment prevent others from enjoying that which he is himself unable or unwilling to enjoy, and thereby prevent the development of the resources of the country by others. Anybody else may divert and use all the water be it more or less, that a prior claimant is not in a present condition to use, and by lack of diligence on his part in pursuing and perfecting a prior inchoate right, many acquire rights even superior to his." Kinney, Irrigation, §§ 151, 153; McKinney v. Smith, 21 Cal. 374; Combs v. Agricultural Ditch Co. 17 Colo. 146; Maeris v. Bicknell, 7 Cal. 262, 68 Am. Dec. 257; Nevada Water Co. v. Powell, 34 Cal. 110, 91 Am. Dec. 685; Simpson v. Williams, 18 Nev. 432.

The principles thus referred to apply with much force to the case at bar, where it is manifest from the testimony that, if the first settlers diverted all the water of Salt creek, they diverted vastly more than was necessary for the uses intended, and therefore the respondent and his predecessors in interest had a right to appropriate, for the purposes of the mill, what was not applied to some useful purpose by the settlers within a reasonable time after their diversion. If they only appropriated a portion of the stream, which seems to be the case indicated by the circumstances disclosed in the record, then the owners of the mill could appropriate the remainder, or so much thereof as was necessary for the use intended by them. In either event their appropriation was lawful. From these considerations, and in view of the testimony in the record, it is quite clear that the findings and decree of the trial court are substantially correct, being fair and proper deductions from the evidence.

It is also insisted that the mill was built subject to the right of the appellant to change its place of diversion. This is conceded by counsel for the respondent as to the quantity of water which had been appropriated above the mill and used by the appellant and its predecessors in interest prior to the appropriation for mill purposes by the owners, and we do not see that this concession can injuriously affect the rights of the respondent, because he does not claim that the water to which he is entitled for his manufacturing purposes had been appropriated and used by the appellant, and then returned to the stream, but that the appellant had no right to divert it above the mill, and never did appropriate it, except below the mill, after it had answered his purpose. Where a prior appropriator of water merely changes the place of diversion without causing injury to a subsequent appropriator, the subsequent appropriator has no cause of complaint. It may be otherwise, however, when the subsequent appropriator is injuriously affected by the change. In the case at bar, the appellant cannot change the place of diversion of water, which it appropriated subsequently to the location and erection of the mill, in such a manner as to prevent the water, to which the respondent is entitled, from flowing through his mill. The appellant and the respondent are each entitled to the use of a certain portion of the stream, and neither can change the place of diversion so as to injuriously affect the rights of the other. The law, however, is well settled that one who is entitled to the use of water flowing in a stream may change the place of diversion if such change causes no injury to the rights of others previously acquired. In Kinney, Irrigation, § 154, the author says: "When water has been lawfully appropriated, the priority thereby acquired is not lost by changing the use for which it was first appropriated and applied, or the place at which it was first employed, provided that the alterations made from time to time shall not be injurious to the rights acquired by others prior to the change." In Butte Table Mountain Ditch Co. v. Morgan, 19 Cal. 609, it was held that, where a person appropriated and diverted water of a stream at a certain point, he could not afterwards change the place of diversion to the prejudice of the rights of a subsequent appropriator. The court said: "The rule is that the change must not injuriously affect the rights of others." In Junkans v. Bergin, 67 Cal. 267, it was observed: "Undoubtedly one entitled to divert a quantity of water from a stream may take the same at any point on the stream and may change the point of diversion at pleasure, if the rights of others be not injuriously affected by the change." So, in Proctor v. Jennings, 6 Nev. 83, it was said: "The rights of each successive person appropriating water from a stream are subordinate to all those previously acquired, and the rights of each are to be determined by the condition of things at the time he makes his appropriation. So far is this rule carried that those who were prior to him can in no way change or extend their use to his prejudice, but are limited to the rights enjoyed by them when he secured his." Black's Pomeroy, Water Rights, § 69; Fuller v. Swan River Placer Min. Co. 12 Colo. 12; Kidd v. Laird, 15 Cal. 162, 76 Am. Dec. 472; Ramelli v. Irish, 96 Cal. 214; Lobdell v. Simpson, 2 Nev. 274, 90 Am. Dec. 587; Columbia Mining Co. v. Hotter, 1 Mont. 296. The cases of Fuller v. Swan River Placer Min. Co., Kidd v. Laird, and Ramelli v. Irish, were cited by counsel for the appellant in support of their contention here under consideration. Upon examination, however, it will be found that they all support the doctrine, above stated, that one who is entitled to the use of water of a stream may change the place of diversion if the rights of subsequent appropriators are not affected by the change. Counsel for the appellant also cited the case of Last Chance Min. Co. v. Bunker Hill & S. Min. & C. Co. 49 Fed. Rep. 430, and maintain that it illustrates the proposition that, "where water is used for domestic and irrigation purposes, the place of diversion can always be changed." That portion of the opinion quoted in their brief, and on which they rely as illustrating their position, appears to be simply dictum. The portion which is authoritative is covered by the syllabus, which is by the court, as follows: "The appropriator of water, to be used at a specified place for the purpose of operating machinery and other works, after so using it and returning it to its original channel, cannot change the place of use, to the damage of a subsequent appropriator lower down on the stream." The proposition of the appellant in the case at bar, that it has the right to change the place of diversion, must therefore be limited to instances where the change does not injuriously affect the rights of respondent.

It is further contended for the appellant that an affirmative issue of equitable estoppel was set up in the answer, and that the failure of the court to find upon such issue was error. If it were conceded that such an issue was contained in the pleadings, still the failure to make a finding thereon would not be reversible error, because such finding, under the facts and circumstances disclosed by the evidence, would necessarily have been prejudicial to the appellant, and the facts found are sufficient to sustain the decree. Maynard v. Locomotive Engineers' Mut. L. & A. Ins. Assn. 16 Utah, 145; Groome v. Ogden City, 10 Utah, 54.

The appellant also complains of the admission of certain oral evidence relating to the grant of a right of way to convey water to the mill in 1854, to a municipal record, and to ownership of a mill by repute. Inasmuch, however, as there is ample proof in the record, unassailed, to support and justify the findings and decree, and as this was a cause in equity, we do not regard it important to determine the competency of the evidence to which the objection refers.

It is further urged in behalf of the appellant that the findings respecting the quantity of water to which the respondent is entitled during the several periods of the year are not justified by the proof, and that such quantity was decreed to him without any basis therefor in the evidence. It appears in the testimony that the declination of the mill race or flume has not been changed since 1862; that the size of the flume is the same as it was before; that it required about 15 or 16 inches in depth of water, running in the flume, to operate the mill at its full capacity; and that during the winter months the mill was always run at its full capacity. There is also evidence showing the condition of the stream, and how the mill race was operated during the other seasons of the year; and, without further reference in detail, we are of the opinion that the findings are not subject to the objections thus interposed, in view of the fact that provision is made for a division of the water between the parties, within a given time, after notice of the decree, and, in case they cannot agree, then for determining by measurement the quantity of water to which each party is entitled. We do not deem it important to discuss the other questions presented, although they have not escaped our notice. We find no reversible error in the record.

The judgment is affirmed.

WISCONSIN SUPREME COURT.

Tabor THURSTON, Recept.,
v.
BURNETT & BEAVER DAM FARMERS' MUTUAL FIRE INSURANCE COM-PANY, Appt.

(.....Wis.....)

- *1. Under the rule that where the language of a contract is plain and unambiguous, and where words or terms in a contract may be reasonably construed in either of two ways but extrinsic evidence is not resorted to for the purpose of aiding in the construction, the proper construction of the contract is for the court. The proper construction of language in an insurance policy, to the effect that "fires caused by the use of steam engines on the premises insured, other than threshing-machine engines using coal for fuel with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire," was a question solely for the court.
2. Such clause prohibited the use of wood, except to efficiently start combustion in the coal; the use of wood thereafter was within the excepted risk; and when wood was so used, up to a short time before the fire occurred, such fire was not caused by an engine "using coal for fuel with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire," because coal was the last fuel put into the firebox before the fire occurred.
3. The evidence being to the effect that wood was used to make power for a considerable length of time, and then coal was put into the furnace as needed, and as a helper, for about fifteen minutes, which disappeared before the fire occurred, such fire was clearly within the excepted risk, and there was no question on the subject to be left to the jury.

(February 8, 1898.)

APPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the Circuit Court for Dodge County in favor of plaintiff in an action to compel payment of the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

Statement by Marshall, J.:

Action to recover on two policies of fire insurance. The property destroyed was grain in stacks. The fire was started by sparks from a threshing machine engine in operation on the premises. A by-law formed a part of each contract of insurance, which was as follows: "This company will not hold itself liable for loss caused by the use of steam engines on the premises, except steam threshing engines using coal as fuel, with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire." The principal disputed question on the pleadings and evidence was whether the fire occurred through a cause not covered by the contracts of insurance, by reason of the by-law referred to. A special verdict was ordered, containing questions covering the subject in dispute, such questions being as follows: "(1) What was being used for fuel in the engine when the stacks of wheat were destroyed? (2) Was more wood used in the engine than was sufficient to kindle or start the fire in the engine? (3) At the time of the fire, was wood being used to produce power to run the engine?" The court instructed the jury, among other things, that there is not any great conflict in the evidence. "The question is, Do you find for the plaintiff or the defendant? If the plaintiff was using, at the time the fire occurred, wood, for the purpose of producing power to do the threshing, he cannot recover. If he was only using wood for the purpose of kindling or starting the fire, if it had got down, he can recover." In respect to the second question the court said: "You are to determine from the language what was intended,—what is the fair, reasonable, ordinary meaning of the language used? You are to say as to what it means,—the ordinary signification among men. What does it mean to kindle or start a fire?" In regard to the first question the court said it was the only vital question in the case. "What was being used when the stacks of wheat were destroyed,—wood, coal, or both? That second question presents the subject more decidedly; and the next question throws some light on the dispute." The court later said, "The meaning of the first question is, What was in the fire box at the time the fire occurred?"—and, generally, said that the three questions were practically the same. "Were they using wood to kindle or start up the fire, or to produce power?" That the jury should first determine in their minds, as if there was no special verdict, whether the machine, under the evidence, was being run in accordance with that provision of the policy, or in violation of it. And further said, "When you get the question settled, reduce your answers to writing, to the questions, so they will conform to the real spirit of the contract." All the questions, and those upon which the right to recover depended, were answered in favor of the plaintiff. Numerous exceptions were filed to the charge, and there was a motion to set aside the verdict as contrary to the evidence and to grant a new trial, made, denied, and the ruling duly excepted to. Judgment was rendered in plaintiff's favor, from which this appeal was taken.

Messrs. Sawyer & Sawyer and H. K. Butterfield, for appellant:

The court erred in submitting to the jury the construction of the policies. Where the terms of a written instrument are clear and unambiguous, it is the duty of the court to construe it, and its submission to the jury is reversible error.

In giving a construction to the policy, the court should be guided in view: (1) Of giving to the words their popular, ordinary meaning, according to the common and approved use of language; (2) of giving effect to the intention of the parties adopting it, provided it can be done consistent with the rules of language and of law.

When a policy of insurance contains contradictory provisions, or has been so framed as to leave room for construction, rendering it doubtful, it is its language which the court is invited to interpret, and it is both reasonable and just that its own words should be construed most strongly against itself.

Marshall, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

Fires caused by the use of steam engines on the premises insured by the defendant, other than threshing-machine engines using coal as fuel, with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire, were excepted out of and not covered by the contracts of insurance. Such excepted fires cannot be included by judicial construction or by the verdict of a jury, without reading into the contract language the parties clearly did not put there. Neither courts nor juries are permitted to do that. The meaning of the term "coal as fuel, with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire," was the important question on the trial; such meaning appears to be plain and unambiguous; no extrinsic evidence was admissible to explain it, nor was any such evidence received or offered. The case comes clearly within the rule, that where language is plain and unambiguous the apparent import of the words must govern, and the rule that where there is no uncertainty as to the meaning of the words used in the contract and where such uncertainty exists, but there is no extrinsic evidence or circumstance bearing on the subject to be considered in determining the meaning attributed to them by the parties when the contract was made, the proper interpretation of the words and construction of the contract are solely for the court. Ganson v. Madigan, 15 Wis. 146; Murphy v. Weil, 92 Wis. 467. Therefore the trial court erred in leaving the construction of the contract to the jury.

As indicated, no difficulty is perceived in determining the meaning of the term in question, when it is kept in mind that plain language, used in such connection as to leave no room to say, reasonably, that the parties might have intended either of two meanings, the apparent import of the words as generally understood must govern. Story, Contr. § 780; Mississippi River Logging Co. v. Wheelihan, 94 Wis. 96. In such cases, the rule that all ambiguities, obscurities, and uncertainties in a policy of fire insurance are to be resolved most favorably to the assured, has no application whatever.

The words "coal for fuel, with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire" meant that wood was permitted to be used, only with coal, and for the one purpose of igniting the coal by aid of the more combustible quality of the wood, and that when the coal was once sufficiently ignited the use of wood was no longer allowed. The clause did not permit the use of wood exclusively for a considerable period of time to produce power, or at all for that purpose, and if wood was nevertheless used to produce power, either alone or with coal, for two or three hours or for half an hour, and then only coal was fed into the fire box for fifteen or twenty minutes, the latter circumstance did not render the engine, one using coal for fuel, with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire, within the meaning of the policy. Such a construction would do violence to the language used by the parties. It would not be construction at all, but the making of a contract not contemplated by the parties at the outset. If, after sufficient wood was used to kindle or start the fire, wood was used to operate the engine, in whole or in part, even though coal was the last fuel fed into the fire box before the loss occurred, the engine was manifestly not one using coal for fuel, with sufficient wood to kindle or start the fire, but was an engine using wood and coal for fuel to produce power.

With the foregoing construction of the contract of insurance, we turn to the consideration of the exception to the ruling of the trial court, refusing to set aside the verdict and grant a new trial.

The evidence is practically undisputed that in the forenoon, and for a short time after the noon hour, the engine was operated by the use of wood exclusively as fuel. It was then moved to the place where the fire occurred, by the use of wood as fuel. During the day, up to the time of the fire, the engine stack was guarded by a screen on account of the use of wood for fuel. The machine was started and run at the setting where the fire occurred, for half an hour, with wood for fuel exclusively.

A man was then sent for coal to the coal wagon, which had not been moved up from a previous setting. He brought one lump. Part of that was used before the fire occurred, which happened from fifteen to twenty minutes thereafter. The engineer testified that he sent for the coal because he thought it would be a helper; that he could keep up steam with wood, but thought that it was nice to have a little coal as there was plenty of it; that there was always some wood in the fireplace. There was much other evidence, but none to materially vary the foregoing. True, the engineer said that when he got the fire fit to burn coal he burned coal exclusively, but it is undisputed that he kept up steam with wood thirty minutes, or thereabout, before any coal at all was used; in fact, that he had been using wood exclusively during the whole day, up to the time that the one lump was brought to him about fifteen minutes before the fire occurred; that the coal wagon was left back at another setting; that the only fuel at the scene of operations for use, except that carried on the engine, none of which was used, was a pile of wood; and that there was some wood in the fire box all the time down to the instant the fire occurred.

In the light of the foregoing, and the correct construction of the contract of insurance, argument is unnecessary to show that the finding of the jury, that no more wood was used with the coal than was sufficient to kindle or start the fire, was contrary to the undisputed evidence. The fire was started in the engine before it was moved to the setting; power was produced by the use of wood exclusively in moving the engine and in operating it till a few moments before the fire occurred, and coal was then used, broken off of the one lump, as a helper. Plaintiff failed to establish any liability on the policies. When the evidence was closed there was no question, really, for submission to the jury. The inferences from the evidence, that more wood was used than was necessary to kindle or start the fire, were all one way.

The judgment of the Circuit Court is reversed, and the cause remanded for a new trial.

SPRING GARDEN INSURANCE COMPANY, Appt.

(155 N. Y. 389.)

1. The total destruction of a building within the meaning of an insurance policy means its complete destruction as a building, but not necessarily the absolute extinction of all its materials, or even that no part of it can be left standing.

2. Insurance on a leasehold interest against the total destruction of a building which will terminate the lease gives no right of recovery when the roof is burned off, the interior destroyed, and the woodwork, sashes, and glass gone, while the iron front is considerably damaged, but the foundation and four walls remain substantially intact, and the building can be repaired for but little more than one third its value.

A PPEAL by defendant from a judgment of the General Term of the Supreme Court, First Department, affirming a judgment of the New York County Circuit in favor of plaintiff in an action brought to enforce payment of the amount alleged to be due on a policy of fire insurance. Reversed.

The facts are stated in the opinion.

Messrs. Michael H. Cardoso and Edgar J. Nathan, for appellant:

The contract of insurance was enforceable only in the event of the "total destruction" of the premises, and there was no total destruction within the meaning of the policy.

A judgment for the tenant, necessarily involving and absolutely dependent upon an adjudication of the fact of total destruction, cannot be sustained, and the case was improperly submitted to the jury.

Total loss means, not that the materials of which it is composed were annihilated, but that the building, though some part of it may remain standing, has lost its identity and specific character as a building, and instead thereof has become a disintegrated mass, or so far disintegrated that it cannot be properly designated as a building.

Huck v. Globe Ins. Co. 127 Mass. 306, 84 Am. Rep. 373.

O'Brien, J., delivered the opinion of the court:

The defendant insured the plaintiff's leasehold interest in a building in the city of New York in the sum of $2,500 for three years against total destruction of the building by fire. The premium charged was $18.75. The plaintiff's right to recover depended upon the fact alleged that the building was totally destroyed within the meaning of the policy. The following is the condition of the policy which described and limited the defendant's liability in case of fire: "It is a condition of this insurance that, in case of such destruction by fire of the above-named premises, that the lease held by the assured shall be by its terms and in fact canceled, this company shall be liable to pay an amount not exceeding the sum hereby insured." This condition limits the plaintiff's right of action to a case where the lease becomes canceled by its own terms in consequence of the destruction of the building by fire. In order to see when and under what circumstances the plaintiff's estate terminated, we must have recourse to the lease of the premises between himself and his landlord. It contains the following stipulation: "And it is further agreed between the parties to these presents that, in case the building or buildings erected on these premises hereby leased shall be partially damaged by fire, the same shall be repaired as speedily as possible at the expense of the party of the first part; that, in case the damages shall be so extensive as to render the building untenable, the rent shall cease until such time as the building shall be put in complete repair; but, in case of the total destruction of the premises by fire or otherwise, the rent shall be paid up to the time of such destruction, and then and from thenceforth this lease shall cease and come to an end: provided, however, that such damage and destruction be not caused by the carelessness, negligence, or improper conduct of the parties of the second part, their agents or servants." The lease contemplates and provides for three contingencies which might occur during the term: (1) Partial damage by fire, (2) such extensive damage as to render the building untenable, and (3) the total destruction of the premises by fire. In the latter case only does the estate of the tenant, which was the subject of the insurance, come to an end. Hence the learned counsel for the plaintiff is obliged to concede that there can be no recovery on the policy in this case unless the building was in fact totally destroyed within the meaning of the policy. The learned trial judge submitted that question to the jury as one of fact, and a verdict was found for the plaintiff.

The only question in the case necessary for us to consider is whether this finding is sustained by any evidence, or, rather, whether there was any evidence given which warranted the submission of the question to the jury as one of fact. The building was six stories high in front and five in the rear, with an iron front, the side and rear walls being of brick. It was about 72 feet wide and 90 feet deep. It was practically an entirely open building inside, used for warerooms and upholstery and furnishing department. The lease was dated February 8, 1888, and ran to the plaintiff for ten years, the annual rental being fixed at $8,867.30. The fire occurred on the 23d of November, 1892. The plaintiff had a stock of furniture in the building at the time, which was insured for $73,500. There is no substantial dispute in the evidence with respect to the condition in which the building was left by the fire. The roof was burned off, and the interior destroyed; woodwork, sashes, and glass were gone; the iron front was considerably damaged; but the foundation and the four walls remained substantially intact. It was shown that the sound value of the building before the fire was about $90,000; that the expense of repairing the building, putting it in at least as good condition as it was before the fire, was about $32,000; and the estimate of mechanics who offered to repair the building was considerably less than the latter sum. The inside of the building was to be rebuilt. There were some holes in the rear wall, and the brick in some places was somewhat damaged. In order to make the repairs, a few courses of brick had to be taken from the top of the rear wall, probably about 15 or 16 inches. A new cornice was put on, and some of the arches over the windows had to be repaired. Without going into minute details, it may be stated that the owner put this building in substantially as good condition as it was before the fire for the sum of $31,905. This included plumbing, gas fitting, heating, two elevators, ironwork for the front, plastering, repairing the brickwork, removing rubbish, and taking down such parts of the walls as had been injured. A building worth about $90,000 before the fire was thus restored for something more than one third of that amount.

The question is whether, upon this state of facts, the jury could have made a finding that the building was totally destroyed. We think that, under the circumstances, the case should not have been submitted to the jury, but that the court should have held, as matter of law, that there was not a total destruction of the building by fire within the true intent and meaning of the policy. A total destruction, within the meaning of the policy, must mean the complete destruction of the insured property by fire, so that nothing of value remains of it as distinguished from a partial loss, where the property is damaged, but not entirely destroyed. This does not mean that the materials of which the building was composed were all utterly destroyed or obliterated, but that the building, though some part of it may be left standing, has lost its character as a building, and, instead thereof, has become a broken mass, or so far in that condition that it cannot properly any longer be designated as a building. When that has occurred, then there is a total destruction or loss. A total loss does not mean an absolute extinction. It is not necessary that all the parts and material composing the building are absolutely and physically destroyed, but the inquiry always is whether after the fire the thing insured still exists as a building. Wood, Ins. §107; 2 May, Ins. p. 967, § 421a; Ostrander. Ins. 2d ed. p. 670, § 610; Biddle, Ins. § 1875; Joyce, Ins. §§ 3025, 3030; Beach, Ins. § 890; Black, Law Dict. Total Loss; Judah v. Randal, 2 Cal. Cas. 325; Williams v. Hartford Ins. Co. 54 Cal. 442, 35 Am. Rep. 77; Seyk v. Miller's Nat. Ins. Co. 74 Wis. 67, 3 L. R. A. 523; Harriman v. Queen Ins. Co. 49 Wis. 71; Hamburg-Bremen F. Ins. Co. v. Garlington, 66 Tex. 103, 59 Am. Rep. 613; Oshkosh Pkg. & P. Co. v. Mercantile Ins. Co. 81 Fed. Rep. 200, 204.

In this case it is undoubtedly true that the building was damaged to such an extent as to render it untenable, but to say that it was totally destroyed, when the owner restored it for about one third of its original value, would be to entirely disregard controlling facts. Some just or reasonable principle must be applied to the facts in this case in order to determine whether there was, as the plaintiff claims, a total destruction of the building, and it is not unreasonable to apply the doctrine which prevails in marine insurance with respect to the total loss of the ship or vessel insured. There it is held that the ship is a total loss when she has sustained such extensive damage that it would not be reasonably practicable to repair her. The ordinary measure of prudence which the courts have adopted is this: If the ship, when repaired, will not be worth the sum which it would be necessary to expend upon her, the repairs are, practically speaking, impossible, and it is a case of total loss. This is said to be the English rule. Moss v. Smith, 9 C. B. 103; Manning v. Irving, 1 C. B. 176; Rossetto v. Gurney, 11 C. B. 186, 187; Grainger v. Martin, 2 Be-t & S. 487, 488; Adams v. Mackenzie, 13 C. B. N. S. 442. The American rule recognizes the same principle, but fixes upon a different amount of expense as giving the right to abandon. If the expense of repair will exceed half the value of the ship when repaired, she is considered a total loss, and may be abandoned. Great Western Ins. Co. v. Fogarty, 19 Wall. 640, 22 L. ed. 216; Wallerstein v. Columbian Ins. Co. 44 N. Y. 205, 4 Am. Rep. 664. A total loss or a total destruction takes place when the subject insured wholly perishes, or its recovery is rendered irretrievably hopeless. Burt v. Brewers' & M. Ins. Co. 9 Hun, 383, Affirmed 78 N. Y. 400. A constructive total loss, which enables the owner to abandon the ship, takes place when the subject insured is not wholly destroyed, but its destruction is rendered highly probable, and its recovery, though not hopeless, yet exceedingly doubtful. Burrill, Law Dict. Total Loss; Arnold, Ins. 990; 8 Kent, Com. 818, 820, 821. The jury could not be permitted to find, in a case like this, that the building had been totally destroyed because the interior and the roof were gone. Those parts of the building could be readily supplied. Nor is the verdict for the plaintiff warranted by the fact that the ironwork, cornice, and some of the brick walls had been damaged. The important and fundamental fact still remained to confront the jury at every stage of its investigation that the foundation and four walls of the building were still substantially intact, and that it was possible, by the expenditure of less than $32,000, to make it as good a building as it was before the fire had occurred. So we think that the facts in this case required the learned trial judge to direct a verdict in favor of the defendant, and the exception to his refusal of the defendant's request to that effect was well taken.

The judgment should therefore be reversed, and a new trial granted; costs to abide the event.

MINNESOTA SUPREME COURT.

City of RED WING, Appt.,

v.

Oliver M. GUPTIL, Resp't.

(.....Minn.....)

The city of Red Wing is authorized by its charter to maintain an action to com-Headnote by START, Ch. J.*NOTE.—Injunctions by municipal corporations against nuisances affecting public morals, peace, and good order, and health and safety.

- I. Public morals, peace, and good order.
 - a. Intoxicating liquors.
 - b. Public amusements.
- II. Public health and safety.
 - a. In general.
 - b. Burial grounds, etc.
 - c. Hospitals, etc.
 - d. Garbage, etc.
 - e. Sewers and drains.
 - f. Trade or business.
 - g. Buildings and other structures.

Upon the question of municipal power over nuisances affecting public morals, decency, peace, and good order, see note to State v. Kerstendiek (1.a.) 39 L. R. A. 520.

The question of municipal control over nuisances relating to public health and safety will be found in note to Harrington v. Providence (R. 1.) 38 L. R. A. 305.

Jurisdiction in equity in suits by municipalities against nuisances in general will be the subject of a subsequent note.

L. Public morals, peace, and good order.a. Intoxicating liquors.

The keeping of a saloon contrary to law is generally punishable as a criminal or quasi criminal offense against the state or local laws, and its suppression is therefore not generally a matter of equitable relief, yet it has been stated that the fact that the keeping of a saloon contrary to the provisions of the statute is a criminal offense does not take away the jurisdiction a court of equity might otherwise exercise. State, Vance, v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 726, 42 Am. Rep. 182. In this case the suit was brought by the state at the relation of the county attorney.

So, it has been further stated that the fact that public nuisances, with all their constituent effects, are public offenses, is a very strong reason why courts of equity should take jurisdiction of such nuisances, and suppress and enjoin them, provided no other adequate remedy exists. State, Vance, v. Crawford, 28 Kan. 726, 42 Am. Rep. 182.

In this case, the court refused an injunction in the name of the state at the relation of the county attorney to restrain the defendant from the further continuance of a certain illegal liquor saloon, upon the ground that the statute declaring the offense to be a nuisance provided a complete and adequate remedy, and not upon the ground that the question involved the commission of the criminal offense, but at the same time the court admitted that there might be instances where the statutory abatement might not be sufficient, in which cases the remedy by way of injunction might be resorted to.

In Carleton v. Rugg, 149 Mass. 550, 5 L. R. A. 193, the proceedings were instituted under Mass. Stat. 1887, chap. 880, § 1, which gives pel the owner of any building or place, which is a nuisance affecting the comfort and convenience of the public, to remove or abate the same, although such nuisance is not injurious to the public health.

(May 13, 1898.)

A PPEAL by plaintiff from a judgment of the District Court for Goodhue County in favor of defendant in an action brought to enjoin the supreme judicial court, and superior court, jurisdiction in equity upon information filed by the district attorney, or upon petition of not less than ten legal voters of any town or city, setting forth the fact that any building, place, or tenement therein is resorted to for prostitution, lewdness, or illegal gaming, or used for the illegal keeping or sale of intoxicating liquors, power to restrain, enjoin, or abate the same as a common nuisance, and also power to either of said courts to issue an injunction for that purpose. The court held the statute to be constitutional, and not in conflict with article 12 of the Declaration of Rights, as the mere fact that the keeping of a nuisance is a crime does not deprive a court of equity of the power to abate the same. The above statute only sanctions proceedings in equity at the suit of the attorney general, or of not less than ten legal voters of the town or city, and it would therefore appear that all proceedings in equity under such statute would have to be taken in the manner therein declared, and that a municipality could not proceed thereunder except in the name of the attorney general or of ten legal voters of the city or town.

In State, Circuit Attorney, v. Uhrig, 14 Mo. App. 413, the proceeding was in the nature of an information in equity on behalf of the city to procure an injunction against the keeping of an unlicensed dramshop, on the ground that it was a public nuisance, but the court refused the injunction upon the ground that the proceedings were to restrain an offense of a criminal nature to which jurisdiction in equity had never attached.

The New Hampshire Laws of 1887, chap. 77, enact, § 1: "Any building, place, or tenement, in any town or city that is resorted to for prostitution lewdness, or illegal gaming, or that is used for the illegal sale or keeping for sale of spirituous or malt liquors, wine, or cider, is declared to be a common nuisance," and, § 2: "The supreme court shall have jurisdiction in equity, upon information filed by the solicitor for the county or upon petition of not less than twenty legal voters of such town or city setting forth any of the facts contained in § 1 of this act, to restrain, enjoin, or abate the same, and an injunction for such purpose may be issued by said court or any justice thereof."
